Inaugural Address of President Marcos, December 30, 1965

INAUGURAL ADDRESS

INAUGURAL ADDRESS

OF

HIS EXCELLENCY FERDINAND E. MARCOS

[Delivered at the Quirino Grandstand, Manila on December 30, 1965]

Mr. Chief Justice, Mr. Vice-President, Mr. Speaker, My Countrymen:

Sa bisa ng inyong makapangyarihang hatol at sa pamamagitan ng mabiyayang tangkilik ng Dakilang Maykapal, narito ako ngayon sa inyong harap sa pinagkaugalian nang ritwal sa pagtatalaga at pagsumpa sa tungkulin ng isang bagong halal na Pangulo.

Sa kapasiyahan ninyong ito ay muli pa ninyong pinatunayan na matatag at matibay ang pagkakataanim ng mga ugat ng demokrasya sa sinapupunan ng bansang ito. At sa bisa ng kapangyarihang ipinagkaloob sa inyo ng mga batas ay naisasagawa nang mapayapa at maayos ang pagsasalin ng kapangyarihang pampamahalaan.

By your mandate, through the grace of the Almighty, I stand here today in the traditional ritual of the assumption of the Presidency.

By your mandate, once again you have demonstrated the vitality of our democracy by the peaceful transference of governmental authority.

It is but fitting and proper that this traditional ritual be undertaken on this sacred ground. For sixty-nine year ago today, a young patriot and prophet of our race fell upon this beloved soil. He fell from a tyrant's bullet and out of the martyr's blood that flowed copiously there sprung a new nation.

That nation became the first modern republic in Asia and Africa. It is our nation. We are proud to point to our country as one stable in an area of instability; where ballots, not bullets, decide the fate of leaders and parties.

Thus Kawit and Malolos are celebrated in our history as acts of national greatness. Why national greatness? Because, armed with nothing but raw courage and passionate intelligence and patriotism, our predecessors built the noble edifice of the first Asian Republic.

With the same reverence do we consider Bataan, Corregidor and the Philippine resistance movement.

Today the challenge is less dramatic but no less urgent. We must repeat the feat of our forebears in a more commonplace sphere, away from the bloody turmoil of heroic adventure – by hastening our social and economic transformation. For today, the Filipino, it seems, has lost his soul, his dignity and his courage.

We have come upon a phase of our history when ideas are only a veneer for greed and power in public and private affairs, when devotion to duty and dedication to a public trust are to be weighed at all times against private advantages and personal gain, and when loyalties can be traded in the open market.

Our people have come to a point of despair. I know this for I have personally met many of you. I have heard the cries of thousands and clasped hands in brotherhood with millions of you. I know the face of despair and I know the face of hunger because I have seen it in our barrios, huts and hovels all over our land.

We have ceased to value order as a social virtue. Law, we have learned successfully to flaunt. We have become past masters at devising slogans for the sake of recorders of his history but not for those who would live by them in terms of honor and dignity.

Peace in our time, we declare. But we can not guarantee life and limb in our growing cities. Prosperity for all, we promise. But only a privileged few achieve it, and, to make the pain obvious, parade their comforts and advantages before the eyes of an impoverished many. Justice and security are as myths rendered into elaborate fictions to dramatize our so-called well-being and our happy march to progress.

But you have rejected all these through a new mandate of leadership. It is a mandate that imposes a change of leadership in this country, and to me, as your President, this mandate is clear – it is a mandate not merely for change. It is a mandate for greatness.

For indeed we must rise from the depths of ignominy and failure. Our government is gripped in the iron hand of venality, its treasury is barren, its resources are wasted, its civil service is slothful and indifferent, its armed forces demoralized and its councils sterile.

But we shall draw from our rich resources of spiritual strength that flow from this place of martyrdom.

We are in crisis. You know that the government treasury is empty. Only by severed self-denial will there be hope for recovery within the next year.

Our government in the past few months has exhausted all available domestic and foreign sources of borrowing. Our public financial institutions have been burdened to the last loanable peso. The lending capacity of the Central Bank has been utilized to the full. Our national government is indebted to our local governments. There are no funds available for public works and little of the appropriations for our national government for the present fiscal year. Industry is at a standstill. Many corporations have declared bankruptcy. Local manufacturing firms have been compelled to close or reduce their capacity.

Unemployment has increased. Prices of essential commodities and services remain unstable. The availability of rice remains uncertain. Very recently the transportation companies with the sanction of the Public Service Commission hiked their fares on the plea of survival.

I, therefore, first call upon the public servants for self-sacrifice. Long have we depended upon the people. In every crisis, we call upon our citizens to bear the burden of sacrifice. Now, let the people depend upon us. The economic viability of the government and of the nation requires immediate retrenchment. Accordingly, we must install without any delay a policy of rigorous fiscal restraint.

Every form of waste – or of conspicuous consumption and extravagance, shall be condemned as inimical to public welfare.

Frugality with government funds and resources must be developed into a habit at every level of the government. High public officials must themselves set the example.

One of the most galling of our inherited problems is that of lawlessness. Syndicated crime has been spawned by smuggling. The democratic rule of law has lost all meaning and majesty, since all men know that public officials combine with unscrupulous businessmen to defraud government and the public – with absolute impunity. The sovereignty of the republic has never before been derided and mocked as when the lawless elements, smuggling syndicates and their protectors, disavow the power of laws and of our government over them. This is the climate for criminality. Popular faith in the government deteriorates.

We must, therefore, aim quickly at the establishment of a genuine rule of law. We shall use the fullest powers of the Presidency to stop smuggling and lawlessness.

I, therefore, call upon all to join hands with me in maintaining the supremacy of the law. To those flaunt the law, I say: this is my constitutional duty and I am resolved to perform it. But it is not mine alone but yours. For whether Filipino or alien you survive under the mantle of protection granted by our laws. I am pledged to execute the law and preserve the constitution of our republic. This I shall do. And if need be I shall direct the forcible if legal elimination of all lawless elements.

Our social policy will seek to broaden the base of our democracy. Our forefathers built a democratic republic on an extremely narrow social and economic base. The task of our generation is to broaden this base continuously. We must spread opportunities for higher incomes for all. But we shall encourage investment to insure progressive production – the true answer to our economic ills.

Our people sought a new administration in the expectation of a meaningful change – certainly a bolder, more courageous approach to our problems.

They must have believed that we can provide this new outlook, and perhaps the passion for excellence – the motive force for greatness.

We shall provide this approach, the necessary change of pace, the new outlook that places large demands and large challenges before the nation. The human person is unique in creation. Of all organisms, it is he that develops in proportion to the demands made upon his abilities. That is true of individuals and I hold it to be true of nations.

Recently, we have come to realize that economic planning is as essential for freedom as political planning.

Before today we had squandered the energies and resourcefulness of our people. In the government we saw a crippling hesitancy and timidity to face the facts of our times and to boldly provide the initiative.

We cannot afford to rest on the shock of our perceptions, nor on the outrage even of our painful admission of the facts. We shall have to restore into our life the vitality which had been corroded by our complacency.

In international affairs, we shall be guided by the national interests and by the conscience of our society in response to the dilemma of man in the 20th century.

The Filipino today lives in a world that is increasingly Asian as well as African. Asia claims one-half of all humanity, and this half lives on a little over one-sixth of the earth's habitable surface. Africa's millions are also now coming to their own. Recent events have shown the willingness of our Asian friends to build a bridge to us. We can do less than to build strong foundations at our end.

Today, as never before, we need a new orientation toward Asian; we must intensify the cultural identity with ancient kin, and make common cause with them in our drive toward prosperity and peace. For this we shall require the understanding of ourselves and of Asia that exceeds acquaintance; we require the kind of knowledge that can only be gained through unabating scholarship on our histories, cultures, social forces and aspirations, and through more active interaction with our friends and neighbors.

What threatens humanity in another area threatens our society as well. We cannot, therefore, merely contemplate the risks of our century without coming into any on our own. Wherever there is a fight for freedom we cannot remain aloof from it. But whatever decision shall have to make shall be determined by our own interests tempered by the reasonability of that patriotic position in relation to the international cause.

This nation can be great again. This I have said over and over. It is my article of faith, and Divine Providence has willed that you and I can now translate this faith into deeds.

I have repeatedly told you: each generation writes its own history. Our forbears have written theirs. With fortitude and excellence we must write ours.

We must renew the vision of greatness for our country.

This is a vision of our people rising above the routine to face formidable challenges and overcome them. It means the rigorous pursuit of excellence.

It is a government that acts as the guardian of the law's majesty, the source of justice to the weak and solace to the underprivileged, a ready friend and protector of the common man and a sensitive instrument of his advancement and not captivity.

This vision rejects and discards the inertia of centuries.

It is a vision of the jungles opening up to the farmers' tractor and plow, and the wilderness claimed for agriculture and the support of human life; the mountains yielding their boundless treasure, rows of factories turning the harvests of our fields into a thousand products.

It is the transformation of the Philippines into a hub of progress – of trade and commerce in Southeast Asia.

It is our people bravely determining our own future. For to make the future is the supreme act of freedom.

This is a vision that all of you share for our country's future. It is a vision which can, and should, engage the energies of the nation. This vision must touch the deeper layers of national vitality and energy.

We must awake the hero inherent in every man.

We must harness the wills and the hearts of all our people. We must find the secret chords which turn ordinary men into heroes, mediocre fighters into champions.

Not one hero alone do I ask from you – but many; nay all, I ask all of you to be the heroes of our nation.

Offering all our efforts to our Creator, we must drive ourselves to be great again.

This is your dream and mine. By your choice you have committed yourselves to it. Come then, let us march together towards the dream of greatness.

Speech of President Marcos before the Chamber of Commerce of the Philippines, April 20, 1966

Speech
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines

[Delivered at the Social Security System Building, April 20, 1966]

IT is a pleasure for me to appear before this admittedly prestigious group of business leaders in the country, in whose hands lie to a great degree the economic development of our country. I have taken time out from the routine "of government in order to participate in the clarification of the policies in which, not only you but also the entire nation and our friends in the world are interested in.

Three months ago, I appeared before Congress and spoke of the crisis that confronts us—a crisis that was many-sided, a crisis in the private sector, a crisis in government: a government that was bankrupt and a private sector in which many industries faced imminent collapse. Trade and commerce was sluggish and the rule of law in shambles in many parts of the country.

I said then that there was a general demoralization and that the principal challenge was a challenge of confidence, confidence in the government and, more than this, confidence in ourselves. I believe that in the last three months, your government has grappled firmly with this problem and met this crisis resolutely and placed it under control.

On the part of the government, the collection of income has improved, the moral tone generally has been raised in the conduct of government. With respect to confidence, I feel that there is an increasing tide of faith not only in the government, but more important than this, faith in ourselves, faith in the people to surmount all obstacles to our progress. It will not be correct to say, of course, that we have overcome or recovered from the crisis for it is not so. There are still great problems facing all of us but we have reversed the trend and the forces of recovery have stopped it.

From the Bureau of Census and Statistics and other sources of data, comes the conclusion that business has picked up quite considerably since January this year. Taking one example, the textile industry which is considered to be one of the most distressed industries. We note that it now has production of cotton and fibers amounting to 63,889,656 square yards for the three months from January to March this year. Last year, production in the same period was 41,082,000 yards. Thus, there has been an increase of 22 million yards and this increase represents 55.5% for the same period.

Employment in the textile industry for the same period has risen by 54.4%.

In the investment field, the period January to February this year had a total number of 1,786 single proprietorship, partnership and corporations.

Establishments engaged in commerce which, by the way, includes supermarkets and groceries referred to in some reports, have increased by 9.4% in number. In terms of actual investments, mining registered an increase of 19.7%, manufacturing, 1.7%; construction 406.6% electricity, 110.5%; and miscellaneous 95.4%. The number of great structures, especially for March alone this year has exceeded by more than 60% that of January and February. These totals indicate a rapid rate of business establishments being formed.

The overall employment level in October, 1965, was 94.0% of the total labor force but as of March this year, is has reached the level of 94.4% It can be concluded that we have not only absorbed the year's increment of labor but have also absorbed some of the unemployed carried over from previous years.

The nation has arrested the economic and social downturn and it is possible to state now that there is an initial momentum for new advance. But there is something to note. In the past several years, the hardships in the economic field were felt mostly by Filipino firms, also by our countrymen in business and industry with their meager capital base. The crisis in financing has hurt most deeply the struggling infant industries, many of which are owned and managed by our countrymen. The program of rescuing these industries is in the nature of salvage operations for the viable Filipino industries and these industries represent the heroic efforts of men and women in our country for the past several decades to build the base of modern Filipino economy.

I, therefore, believe that our government must exert all efforts to help rehabilitate these industries and put them back on their feet. The alternative is to see all these gains of many years in the struggle for economic independence dissipate on this single period. But these reforms should not only stimulate industries but trade just as well for trading activities have suffered from the scarcity and high cost of credit as everyone knows, especially in the provinces. And these conditions tend to paralyze the Filipino small merchant not only in the provinces, in the towns and in the barrios against their better placed alien competitors.

While I have spoken of this crisis many times, it is only before such distinguished leaders in business like you that I can set aside the histrionics and drama of public speaking and eloquence, and paint you the hard realities of our economic life and, with you, draw the conclusions in a cold, objective and dispassionate manner. For, emotion, so you always repeat, has no place in business. If this is so, let us in cold blooded manner look at the problems of businessmen today.

And, I would like to look at this from the viewpoint of a student of business. What actually is the relationship between the private sector of business and government? I would like to speak today on this concept of an active partnership between government and the private sector of our Republic. It is perhaps a truism but nevertheless true and pertinent to observe that we have a strongly symbolic relationship between government and business of the private sector and an improvement or deterioration of one sector affects to that extent either the improvement or diminishes the position of the other and we saw this under previous administrations. We saw the deterioration of the position of the economy, the position of the government, affects the private sector and the desperate efforts to recover the position of government also causes the discreditation of the Filipino businessman.

It is under this concept, therefore, that the present administration has consistently reaffirmed the resolutions of this relationship and has oriented its anti-smuggling, its tax collection and refinancing campaigns and projects accordingly.

In the continuation of this concept of active partnership, I can assure you now that your government will continue to protect the Filipino businessman and promote his better economic and financial position. But the role of government is not to supplant the private sector. It is merely to augment the efforts of our businessmen, for economic development in our society of free enterprise is the primary responsibility of the private sector. However, it is the government's duty to participate actively in this venture by assisting directly in building up productive capacity through the establishment of economic public works facilities. Another major contribution is direct financial assistance and indirect financial help by means of monetary credit and fiscal policies designed to benefit productive private industries. So what has your government directly done in the last three months in the past? Allow me to outline them for you.

First, stabilize for the time being credit arrangements with the International Monetary Fund which have been restricted but without the crippling restriction of the ceiling on the Central Bank's domestic efforts. Ever since our relationships with the International Monetary Fund, I believe it is only now, this year, that the ceiling has been lifted.

Second, The exchange rate of the peso to the dollar has been maintained, so much so that this exchange rate continues to follow a definite trend of stabilizing the levels, lower than those obtaining in the immediate past. The present exchange rate, according to the Central Bank, is 3.894 to the dollar where it was 3.94 or 3.95 in December, 1965.

Third, the level of international reserves continues to rise to heights which far surpassed previous levels. Reserves of the Central Bank as of March stood at about $195 million compared to $136.6 million in March, 1965 and $140 million in December, 1965. The reserves net of commercial bank obligations for February, furthermore, were more than double the average level for April and May, 1965.

Fourth, the unrelenting pressure brought down on smuggling activities both of the technical and outright varieties has definitely slowed down outward remittances for invisibles as well as exerted pressure on international reserves and exchange rates. More specifically, textile mills which only recently could afford to operate only one shift twice weekly, now operate under three shifts a day.

Fifth, the removal of opportunities for graft which in the past prejudiced legitimate traders. We have initiated measures to allow for payment of customs duties through agent banks. Electronic data processing equipment and facilities for processing and recording trading documents are now being used by the Customs Bureau to safeguard the interests of both the government and business.

Sixth, initial steps have already been implemented to improve the financial position of the government financial institutions, like the GSIS, SSS which is our host, or the DBP and the PNB, to enable these agencies to already loan financing commitments to provide agriculture, trade and industry.

Seventh, the Committee in Loans and Investments has submitted its proposal to extend financial assistance through the DBF for the rehabilitation of distressed industries. The three major components of this program, of which you are aware, are the Securities Marketing, Investments Refinancing and Foreign Exchange Financing. They are substantially adequate to bring about the rehabilitation of variable industries now saddled by imbalance and disruptions in their financial structures.

Eighth, We still maintain and continue to maintain fiscal prudence and restraint in government expenditures as an underlying policy in the projected operations of the national government, without sacrificing much in public service or facilities required for growth in productive capacity. This policy insures that the balanced budget with respect to current expenses will be achieved. Together with our policy on national debt program that what money is borrowed will be used only for development projects, and government operations, our corresponding need for funds will no longer compete with the private sector for available credit.

Ninth, in the past, businessman engaged in supplying materials, equipment and supplies to the government have been hesitant to continue their operations because of difficulty in collection and the additional cost this represents. In turn, the government has suffered because it has not always obtained the best prices. We have now completed the necessary studies and are about to implement the appropriate measures to improve, modify and simplify government purchasing and supply procedures.

Tenth, and I presume what may constitute the most important aspect of the problem, from the viewpoint of businessmen. The Central Bank—your government—has instituted policies and measures to ease credit restrictions in order that private industry may be able to secure financial resources essential to building up production levels and with this the incomes and employment in the industrial sector.

a) The rediscount rate which has remained unchanged in the last four years has substantially lowered in January this year from 6% in December, 1965, to 4.3/4% today.

b) The computation of the rediscount ceiling of commercial banking system was modified so that ceilings are not now based on net worth as of Dec. 31, 1965 but instead March 31, 1965. Moreover, quota for rediscounting rates was raised from 50% of net worth to 125% which is 25% more than what you asked for in your president's letter of January 8, 1966. Fifty percent of this, of course, goes to commercial loans, 50% for production loans and 25% exclusively for rice and corn loans.

c) Local reserve requirements on savings deposits in commercial banks are lowered by 20%, that is: from 10% to 8%.

d) Local reserve requirements on time deposits summarily lowered from 10 % to 6% on time deposits with maturity within 30 days, and from 10% to 5% on time deposits with maturity beyond 30 days.

e) Special time deposits on imports were scrapped thus releasing the required assets against these deposits.

What do all these measures spell out?

These credit relaxation measures have generated immediate effect on bank reserves: combined excess and potential reserves of the commercial banking system have increased by as much as P120 million in January and February. The revision of rediscount ceilings raised the amount of Central Bank credit available to domestic commercial banks by another P21 million; and the lifting of special time deposits against imports will generate an additional P13 million to bank reserves. These will increase credit availability to banks by P400 million which if multiplied, one and a half times at the most or half a billion considering possible inability of banks to utilize the full limit of their capacity.

These are the major policies and the practical measures that the administration has carried out and implemented to fulfill our part of the partnership in the growth of the Philippine economy. Even now we await congress actions for relaxation in measures pending before it designed to provide economic incentive to private industries to expand and to extend adequate protection to the constant requirements of consumer welfare, to those domestic industries which strictly need this temporary assistance.

Further to this we have adopted a policy of encouraging pioneering projects in specified industries. But we are now adopting also administrative measures that subsequent overcrowding or proliferation will be prevented. It has also been observed that substantial portions of import payments last year went to semi-processed raw materials estimated at anywhere from 47% to 55%, meaning that we have devoted most of our imports to assembly plants or packaging industries. We will study the adoption of such measures that may be needed to shift this emphasis from packaging or assembling into basic manufacturing concerns and we cannot very well notice the other problems in the area of industry—the alien control of several industries being only one of them. However, I can repeat this, that the government can extend only so much help and the rest will have to be done by the ones more than personally affected, you in the private sector.

The government makes no claim of holding the secret to business success, or even to national prosperity. But it believes that working under the system of partnership I have alluded to in the government, hardwork, initiative, perseverance, and confidence will prove that the steps taken are in the right direction.

The government is prepared to come up today with definite proposals. We will organize, or we have or are organizing three committees: the Export authority is in the process of organization, the Customs Advisory Council is partly organized, and the Tax Advisory Council is already organized. Of importance to all of us is the fact that in these councils that affect business in the most sensitive areas are represented such associations or organizations like the Bar Association, the Chamber of Commerce, Chamber of Industries, the Producers Group.

Now I ask your president and officers to give your organization's nomination for your representative to the Customs Advisory Council.

This is the summary of what the administration has done and what it plans to continue, so long as it enjoys and receives the people's mandate. But what must be resolved now is not what the government will do. What must be resolved now is what shall be the response of the private sector to the measures that have been taken. We develop self-reliance after this transitory period of government assistance or weaken in its resolve to be independent and self-sustaining, hopelessly dependent upon subsidies and the protection granted by the government.

The challenge is, therefore, clear, not only to participate by passive acceptance of what the government has done, but perhaps actively to participate in these reforms or recommended norms and procedures of the public-private sector relationship, not only to secure the foundations that have already been established but to pioneer in the development of those areas of economic activity that are crucial to national growth.

The government stands committed to the protection and assistance of Filipino businessmen and today or any other day, I do not hesitate to repeat this commitment to each and every one of us but neither should I hesitate to ask you leaders of the business community to do your own part in this partnership.

I ask you to embolden yourselves and confront the future in the manner most befitting to the national temper, with optimism, with confidence. And I conclude with the hope that response to the basic challenge will be of the same measure, doing justice to yourselves and to the entire nation.

Thank you and good day.

Address of President Marcos on Independence Day, June 12, 1966

Address
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
On Independence Day

[Delivered on June 12, 1966]

Ang Dakilang Pamana

MAY KASABIHAN ANG matatandang Pilipino na anila’y “ang hindi lumingon sa pinanggalingan ay di makararating sa paroroonan.”

Ang salawikaing ito ay butil ng katotohanan na napulot nila sa kanilang mga karanasan. Ito ay butil ng karunungan, butil ng buhay na natutuhan nila sa kanilang karanasan at mga pagpapakasakit at inihahandog sa atin na kanilang mga anak sa hangad na kung sakali ay kapulutan natin ng ating ikagiginhawa.

Ang salawikaing ito, ay bahagi ng mga pamana ng lahi na hindi natin malilimutan.

Ang hindi lumingon sa pinanggalingan ay di makararating sa paroroonan. Oo nga po’t nagmamadali tayo sa pagtungo sa buwan, nguni’t pagdating doon ay ano ang ating gagawin? Hindi po ba’t kailangan lumingon tayo ng kaunti sa ating iniwanang lupa at baka mayroon tayong nalilimutang mahalaga sa ikapa-panuto ng ating buhay sa buwan?

At sa mga Pilipino ngayong gaya natin na naghahangad ng bago at lalong malaking kadakilaan, ay di ba kailangang balingan natin ang kadakilaan na ipinamana sa atin ng mga nauna sa atin?

Kaya’t bayaan ninyong sariwain natin ang kadakilaang naganap nuong ika-12 ng Hunyo ng taong 1898. Sa makasaysayang pook nang Kawit, ay tumayo si Heneral Aguinaldo bilang kinatawan ng Bayang Pilipino ng panahong yaon, gaya ng pagkatawan ko sa Bayang Pilipino sa panahon ngayon. Humarap siya sa bayan at sinabi niyang dumating na ang sandaling pinakihihintay ng buong bansa.

TAGPO SA BALKONAHE

At sa mga sandaling yaon ay iniladlad sa kauna-unahang pagkakataon ang Bandilang Pilipino kasabay ng pagtugtog sa kauna-unahan ding pagkakataon ng Pambansang Awit ng Pilipinas. At sinasabi ng ilang nakasaksi sa araw na yaon ng ating kadakilaan, na matagal ding naghari ang dalisay na katahimikanna wala kang maririnig kundi ang paghikbi ng ilang kababaihan at ang pagtulo ng luha ng lahat ng may malambot na puso sa harapang yaon. At sinasabi din na bagama’t walang bakas ng luha ay nagniningning naman ang mga mata ng mga mabunying Heneral Emilio Aguinaldo at Heneral Artemio Ricarte, ang Vibora, na nasa balkonaheng ito noon.

Every year we gather here, my beloved countrymen, in obedient response to our memory of this nation’s labors toward the fulfillment of independence. The occasion being what it is, to say nothing of our times being what they are, it might do well to involve ourselves in a kind of introspection. He who does not look back had better watch out — he may not know where he is going. The paradox is one of the wise sayings that our forebears have handed down to us. Long before the age of radar and psychoanalysis, folk wisdom, of which we have our abundant share as a people, has pointed to this way of gaining self-knowledge.

It was at my instance that we chose “Our Heritage of Greatness” as the theme of this year’s observance of Independence Day. Imagine this entire nation, nearly thirty million strong, putting aside its mundane preoccupations on this day and letting its mind dwell instead on its inheritance of greatness and, consequently, on its destined preeminence in me family of nations!

It is my task as a leader to generate a consciousness of that heritage, to let you look back at the road we have travelled as a nation and to point out some significant facts about this experience. Before your award to me of your mandate to lead this nation as your President, this idea of greatness was one of those thoughts that inspired my efforts. Through mile after mile of country roads, from barrio to barrio, my tireless feet took me to your homes, and in the warmth of your welcome, I knew that my inspiration was right. One thought struck me, and it was this: That never was there a time when so much could be done for our people. After this few months in office, I have become convinced that never has there been a time when our people can prove themselves able to do so much for their country.

I see this from the way we have lived, in substance as well as in form, the precepts of democracy as we have acquired them from our forebears. The concept of the barrio elder sitting in council to resolve problems on the village level we have fashioned into the sophisticated system of government with the most efficient features of western-type democracy, accommodating at the same time our idiosyncrasies as a people of Malay stock. Our sense of justice, embodied by our untutored ancestors in the Code of Kalantiyaw, we have refined with adjustments and accretions from the best that can be derived from Greco-Roman civilization and thereof.

With democracy we have stabilized our society, affording each individual the scope of action to enable him to seek self-fulfillment — an approach to the pursuit of happiness which, happily in our tradition, is related more to the well-being of the many rather than the self-indulgence of a few. Our revered heroes, Rizal, Bonifacio, Mabini, Del Pilar, and all the rest, were men imbued with this idealism. They have left us a definition of what individual self-fulfillment means, and that it is a coin whose two faces are service and sacrifice for love of country. This is the cash that fills the coffers of our moral reserves; these are the assets in our central bank of national morality.

The world today around us is not as comfortable as we would want it to be. Our own society is plagued by innumerable ills — let us face it. At every turn we find corruption, an evil which in my Administration we shall endeavor to stamp out. We cannot close our eyes to graft, to violence, to dissipation and waste of our private and national resources. The newspapers, radio, and TV keep us more than fully informed of the sad state of affairs. As your chosen leader, I deem it my duty to be more sensitive about these matters than the average citizen. At the same time, it is also my duty as your chosen leader to understand why we have come to such a state and to prescribe ways and means to improve the moral climate of our time.

This much I say: That thanks to the freedom of the press that guarantees the fullest performance of press and mass communications media, there is no dirty linen that cannot be aired in public, no skeleton that can be hidden indefinitely in the closet. Our awareness of the crises situation in our society is an awareness that comes from freedom, and so long as we keep it that way we can be sure of correcting injustices, punishing the guilty, tempering the excesses of abusive forces, and encouraging good works. Only freedom can guarantee the promptness and efficacy of our response to the evils in our present society. I am unashamedly proud of our press and information agencies, and unembarrassedly, I am inspired by our public opinion — so sensitive and pertinent in its sense of urgency, sometimes in its near desperation, which I take to be a mark not of defeat but of courage and deep devotion to the interest of our national welfare.

Sometimes I cannot but ask myself this question: If our times have become as evil as people say they have why do we manage to go on? Ours is one of the most stable nations in our region of the world. We were the first nation to win our independence from a colonial power in Asia, and we have kept in, thank God, through the more difficult years of world history. Why? We emerge from the seventeenth century, with the minimal inconvenience to our private as well as public interests. Why? What winds have swept away other nations of the world and yet have spared us? What seaworthiness we have displayed! Why? What ballasts did our forebears provide for our ship of state, what sturdy keel and hull did those builders use?

And I feel I have the answer. Our concepts of justice and democracy are two of those materials with which our forebears built this nation. And to these they have added the family and an unfailing love of God. If we have been spared the disasters that most modern nations have had to undergo, it is because we have avoided the tampering and accommodations that willfully, and often perversely, have been employed in desperate attempts to perpetuate power on the part of those few who rule and turn into slaves the millions whose ignominy it is to obey.

It is no accident of rhetoric that our constitution calls upon Divine Providence as a force in our society. Only recently this nation celebrated the 400th anniversary of the coming to these islands of Christianity, an event that is reflected in every gesture and thought of our people. I dare say this has been our source of strength, and through good times as well as bad we have been enabled by it to face up to our responsibilities and preserve our cherished institutions.

Consider the Filipino family. Its bonds of love and harmony have been a puzzle to many. Modern sociology cannot seem to understand the sources of its unity. Unemployment, even hunger and, regrettably, violence, are as unto mortar that holds the pieces together. The enemies of our way of life have tried and will fail to undermine it, to unknot the ties with irreligion and economic insecurity: and doubtless we shall see more of these attempts as our population increases and material difficulties arise.

But history is on our side, and the tradition of strong family ties runs thick in our blood. In the foxholes of Bataan, I might say, we were so caught up by patriotic fervor that we fought for sheer love of country. But when the invaders began to violate our women, murder our loved ones, and starve our little brothers and sisters, and finally, during the occupation when mothers had to gather their brood in the safety of evacuation camps in the hills, the guerilla's immediate concern was his family, it was for his loved ones that he braved dangers and, often death itself. It is the sum of that devotion that we sometimes call patriotism, and when we add to that our heritage of justice and democracy we get the grand total, which we call love of country.

I sometimes wonder where our Rizal and Mabini would be but for their known love for their families, and I wonder what our generations of youth would be like were such examples as those of our national heroes not deeply ingrained in their minds. In other societies, a deliberate and programmed destruction of the family as an institution has been attempted in the interest of a social order believed to bring about an abundance of material benefits. Those societies, as we know, have miserably failed.

Our heritage is an open book that describes in terms of our national experience the concepts of justice and democracy, of family and love of God. The letters are writ large, my beloved countrymen, and we cannot fail to read their meaning clearly. When we think, as on this occasion, about the blessings of independence, we are compelled indeed to turn to the text that our experience has set down for us. To read and reflect upon the message therein is to be inspired.

Few nations on this earth have enjoyed greater blessings than ours, my beloved countrymen. Ours is the duty to deserve them, the responsibility to enrich and ennoble them in terms of our own personal behavior, and, further, ours is the obligation in gratitude to turn our thoughts time and again to the Almighty, whose guiding hand leads us ever forward. And to do this is to live to the fullest our heritage of greatness.

Marcos, F. E. (1978). Presidential speeches (Vol. 1). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Address of President Marcos on the conferment of the Doctorate in Civil Law on him, September 19, 1966

Address
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
Before the members of the faculty and student body of Michigan State University on the conferment of the Doctorate in Civil Law on him

[Delivered on September 19, 1966]

President HATCHER and Mrs. HATCHER,
Governor and Mrs. ROMNEY,
Distinguished members of the BOARD OF REGENTS,
Members of the FACULTY and the STUDENT BODY,
LADIES and GENTLEMEN:

For and on behalf of the Republic of the Philippines and the 32 million people of this archipelago, I receive this honor, this degree, that you have awarded to me and in turn, extend to you the gratitude of the people who realize only too well that the fountainhead and the source spring of liberty can be found in this kindly land, the United States of America.

I have journeyed ten thousand miles across the Pacific and your beautiful land on this state visit. But as a frustrated student seeking a doctorate in the United States of America, this to me is the highlight of the entire visit; frustrated because I must explain that the war interfered with my plans to take a doctorate from an American university. Now, truly, I can say I have come full cycle and I have returned to the day when I hoped that I would enter the faculty of the University of the Philippines and teach law instead of practice law and government as I am doing now. Which is better, I will leave for posterity to determine.

Frankly, I have no regrets whatsoever, although I still maintain that intellectualism, scholarship, education, may be the answer to all the perplexing problems that agitate the whole world.

It has been said by a great mind that education is Internationalization; it militates against the narrowness of perspective that leads towards parochialism. In fact, it has been called the enemy of nationalism. In the modern world, where men face the dilemma of nationalism and internationalism, certainly education perhaps points the way towards a solution.

I bring to you also the greetings of a people who know that the University of Michigan stands as the source of many of the men from whose hands have come the guidance of our educational institutions; not only from this university but from the State of Michigan, rather, have come men who helped mold the democratic institutions that we have in our country today. I come to acknowledge our indebtedness to the University of Michigan. I come to acknowledge our indebtedness to the American people.

I am happy that I have been given the occasion to speak. If you will allow me, I will speak of the Philippines today, and the Philippine experiment in democracy, because I gather that there is a debate raging in academic circles as to the capacity of the underdeveloped country to accommodate democracy; or, stated the other way around, whether democracy can succeed and thrive in an underdeveloped country. I understand that there is a claim that because of the culture, the heritage, the temperament, the civilization of an underdeveloped country, democracy cannot succeed. There are others, too, who say that because the rapidity of economic development which is the center and realm and objective of every underdeveloped country, democracy must for the moment be dispensed with, ergo, arriving at the conclusion that despotism is a necessary step towards development before democracy.

There is a third school of thought which states that democracy, even in such countries as the Philippines has not been properly assimilated and has not become a part of the social organism, that it can be lopped off without any effect whatsoever on the body politic.

I do not take part in this debate because I consider it academic. I consider that we have established and proved that democracy can, and will succeed in underdeveloped countries as the Philippines. If Vietnam is the testing ground for the new weapon of communism, war by proxy, the national liberation war, subversion through the utilization of indigenous forces within a country sought to be subverted, then the Philippines is a testing ground for this principle and this idea—whether democracy can succeed in an underdeveloped country.

I say this debate is academic because from our point of view, democracy has succeeded in the Philippines, an underdeveloped country. It may be presumptuous for me to speak for all of Asia, but after conferring with the leaders of Asia, I think I speak for each and every one of them. Japan is experimenting with democracy and, notwithstanding the fistfights in the Diet, and the use of the judo and ju-jitsu, I understand, even karate, in their debates, for me this is the basic and fundamental acceptance of the idea of democracy. In fact, there is such a tolerance of honest dissent, which to me is often the test of the existence of freedom and democracy—that President Eisenhower was not able to visit Japan.

There is, of course, the statement of some leaders of India that democracy does not allow such a rapid development that often it is necessary to adopt a modified form of centralized and authoritarian government in order that we may speed up reform or change development programs, which is the obsession and preoccupation of all underdeveloped countries.

This may be true but the conclusions finally arrived at is that ultimately and at last the wave of the future in Asia is democracy. For, as we in the Philippines feel, there can be no return of the harsh and exacting conditions that was colonialism, and yet authoritarianism may be colonialism in some other form. In our point of view, authoritarianism and colonialism are faces of the same coin because they invoke the inquisition of power, for one single objective and, perhaps without allowing and accommodating honest dissent.

In the Philippines, which I have called the proving ground of democracy, I know that there have been many mistakes or failures, both in the economic as well as in the political fields. I know, too, that perhaps you have heard that while the term underdeveloped is some kind of abstract political jargon to make in the United Nations, the term underdeveloped can mean almost anything.

To us, underdeveloped is a term that is viscerally fought. It may mean, as it often does mean, one meal a day. It may mean slabs and dwellings of packing crates. It may mean disease congenital. It may mean ailments of babies still unborn. It may mean blindness without even learning to read one line of the printed word. It may mean despair.

But underdeveloped as the countries may be, there is a greater hunger within the hearts of the men in Asia. It is not a hunger of the body; it is a hunger of the spirit, the desire to rise up to the fullest measure of human dignity and human equality after the long, centuries of colonial enslavement.

Despotism, therefore, is anathema to most of Asia. Let me tell you, too, of the history of my people. There are diggings right now going on, especially those headed by Dr. Fox, the archeologist, in Palawan, which indicate that long before Christ there was a civilization that thrived in that part of Asia. Dr. Fox said there will be consternation among the intellectuals if this is brought out, but consternation or not, we are proud of the fact that the history of the Philippines antedates my namesake, Ferdinand Magellan, Ferdinand Magellan who was supposed to have discovered the Philippines after the Philippines was already inhabited by the Filipinos.

Can the abstraction of democracy have any meaning in a setting of hunger, disease and ignorance? Can freedom of speech mean anything to one who may not know where his next meal will come? Your experience in the Philippines has demonstrated that it must mean something. When the stars and stripes for the first time in the history of your nation was trodden to the ground and there was no hope, when the only possible future, immediately as well as distant, was death, terror, punishment, torture, and the loss of honor, many men staked their lives, their honor, their illusions and dreams for their belief in democracy and in freedom, not necessarily because you were returning to the Philippines or that you were going to be victorious, but because despotism is not acceptable to the Filipino People.

Has democracy really succeeded in the Philippines? Not more than five years after you acknowledged and recognized the independence of the Philippines, communism mounted one of the most serious revolutions, rebellions, against the Republic of the Philippines. All over Asia, then communism was militant and aggressive, seeking to subvert and destroy all democratic institutions. In 1950, in Malaysia and everywhere in Asia, while your foreign policy was oriented towards Europe by the Truman Doctrine in Greece and Turkey, while, then apparently you had abandoned Asia, President Truman was taken aback by the boldness of communism in Korea in 1950. And under the hag of the United Nations and 15 other countries, the Philippines included, the United States again sent troops to Korea.

It is not necessary for me to say that at that time, when we sent troops to Korea, we were fighting for our own survival in our own homeland because about 20,000 to 30,000 troops and communist were bearing arms against the government, with a timetable: November, 1951 to take over the central government of the Republic of the Philippines.

We did not seek the aid of America, the powerful, notwithstanding the existence of her bases there—in Subic Bay, Sangley Point, Clark Air force Base, Camp John Hay and others. We fought them with our own troops and perhaps this is the only case in Asia that with its own troops it met and overcome this danger posed by a strong military group and, having done so, set the pattern for the conquest of similar rebellions. First, of course, by the policy of military might, total force against the ideological combatants and, secondly, total friendship and economic development for the followers and the misled.

And so, today, your experts study the affairs of government in the Philippines and the events that occurred in the period from 1946 to 1951 or during those five years of rebellion of the Hukbalahaps, the armed elements of communism in my country, to find out what the solution was and to discover how the Philippines succeeded in maintaining democracy even against the aggressive onslaught of communism, supported by Asian communism from across the China Sea.

If there is any other danger that the Philippines has met and not overcome, I have not seen it. Of course, there is much to be done. There is corruption, weakness, there is smuggling, criminality. But these are not exclusive to the Philippines. It is true of every democratic country. Whether developed or not, the difference merely is in degree.

I wish to inform you that we have succeeded in meeting all these dangers and thus, as we stand before the world today, the Philippines, from whence I come from, whose shores have long been washed by the tidal ebb and flow of empire, stands with pride. The Filipino people and their neighbors for centuries imbibed the surging cultures, the Arabic, Hindu, and the Chinese, and later received generous injections of western civilization through the Spaniards and much later the Americans.

In 1896, the Philippines was the first in Asia and Africa to mount a rebellion against colonialism, against a monarchist regime, the Spanish regime. In 1898, it was the first nation in Asia and Africa to declare the existence of a republic. It has sought and fought for freedom. It is totally committed to freedom.

I, therefore, maintain and submit that democracy has survived. We survived and continue to exist despite the underdeveloped conditions of the Philippines. It had better succeed in the Philippines, for if democracy does not succeed in the Philippines, then what are we fighting for in Vietnam? What are we fighting for in all the countries where we meet communism frontally, in those underdeveloped countries where communism may seek to undermine existing authority?

We are in Vietnam for one purpose and that is, grant to the Vietnamese the option of choosing exactly what kind of a government and what kind of a society they wish to establish in their own country, in their own land, and for no other purpose. If, therefore, we grant them such an option, and it is predestined and known that choosing democracy they will fail, then we are fighting for a mirage, an illusion, and all the dying, all the blood, all this savagery and brutality that we are going through in Vietnam will be for nothing.

And, so, I come to you with a message, and that is: that the 32 million people of the Republic of the Philippines, extending to you their thanks for your guidance in the past, for your participation in this partnership, in the present, in the arduous activities of intellectualism, stand pledged to freedom. We stand by freedom, live by freedom and dream of freedom. And they'll make of the democracy that they have received from you, not only an illusion and a mirage, but make of it a government, a way of life that shall assure for them not only survival but progress, even under the threat of total destruction.

Again, I say thank you for all the good deeds you have done in the Philippines, for all the aid that you have extended. A number of the doctors that I know in the Philippines hold doctorate degrees from the University of Michigan under the Barbour Scholarship. I understand from President Hatcher and Mrs. Hatcher that they were given a dinner by almost 24 Barbour scholars who had been here. They have authorized me to extend to you their gratitude.

I repeat, intellectualism, education is an internationalizing agent. In the Philippines, therefore, we are seeking the wider horizon of progress, seeking the ancient springs of our national identity in Asia, participating in the destiny of Asia without forgetting, however that it is a part of the world and that it is a sister republic to the great Republic of the United States of America.

I, therefore, again say thank you from these 32 million people who have complete trust and faith in you and the American people, in whose hands lie the salvation of all humanity. And, I have previously said that do what you may, you cannot avoid and escape responsibility, that responsibility imposed upon you by the inexorable verdict of destiny. You are the trustees of human civilization and, as trustees of this modern civilization, you must therefore protect that civilization. Whether by your military might or by the extension of your more benevolent influence through intellectualism and scholarship, as trustees, you must protect the civilization which you have protected in the last two global wars.

We extend to you the hope that you can participate further in this pursuit. The Philippines, the Filipinos have a special place for America in their hearts and they are proud that they are counted as friends and allies of the great American nation.

To all of you, therefore, Mrs. Marcos and I extend our gratitude for your hospitality. Your hospitality certainly exceeds our capacity. It is my hope that our nation, which has a moderate claim to hospitality, will have an opportunity to reciprocate this generosity which you have extended to us.

I shall carry the doctorate with pride and bear its responsibility with resolution, knowing that it comes from distinguished men and scholars and, if the problems of Asia may perplex me, I shall turn to it for inspiration. If the night is too dark and the burdens of state too heavy.

I shall find strength in this award that you have given me. If in the confusion of the world today I should be misled I shall return to the right path knowing that intellectualism, scholarship which you have extended to me so benevolently today is still the hope of all mankind.

I shall bear this doctorate degree that you have given me and place it at the altar of freedom of our people and, placing it before them, I know that all the more, we shall have a freshness of resolution to maintain freedom, human dignity, which is the ultimate of all goals that we can aspire for.

Thank you and good day.

Address of President Marcos before the UN General Assembly, September 21, 1966

Address
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
Before the UN General Assembly

[Delivered in New York, September 21, 1966]

Mr. President,
Mr. Secretary General,
Distinguished Delegates to the General Assembly of the United Nations Organization:

Allow me, first of all, Mr. President, to extend my congratulations to the General Assembly for its wisdom in having elected you to preside over the deliberations of the 21st session of this Assembly. That a distinguished son of Asia should be chosen to preside over and assume this position of responsibility at this time seems to be in the fitness of things. For, in the past several months the grave threats to peace and challenges to the authority of the United Nations have come from Asia and Africa. It seems fitting, therefore, that the earnest search for the solutions to these grave problems that we are confronted with be undertaken under the leadership of an Afghan diplomat and leader whose native land, lying athwart the intercepting lines of power and dominion in the very heart of Asia, is specially interested in mitigating conflict and promote the healing of the wounds of Asia as well as of the world.

Distinguished delegates of this Assembly: This is not my first time to speak from this podium. This hall is not unfamiliar to me for on many an occasion I had represented my country here as a delegate. It is my privilege to speak before you now as the leader of 32 million people of the Republic of the Philippines.

I come from that Asian country whose shores have been washed over many centuries by the tidal ebb and flow of empire. Its people, those that inhabit the land, come from forebears who have been able to share with their neighbors a cultural inheritance that was enriched by the Arabic, Hindu and Chinese civilizations. On this oriental base, a nation was born that would ultimately be influenced from the West, first from Spain, and next from the United States. This was the country that in Asia and Africa was the first to mount an anti-colonial revolution in 1896 and 1898, to install and proclaim a republic.

These are the credentials of my country. But I wish also to state that in 1946, the United States of America recognized our political emancipation and since then my country and my people have sought the ancient springs of their national identity and sought to be identified with Asia, seeking to help in the molding of the destiny of Asia.

It is quite apparent that the second half of the 20th century virtually characterized itself as a new century and it was ushered in by a radical decade and properly, perhaps, it may be said that this new century that was to distinguish the climate of the post-war world was properly presided by the spirit of internationalism. And so great and large a symbolic significance was given to the organization of the United Nations in 1945. Its intentions proclaimed the controlling interests of the new politics as the rejection of war for the settlement of international disputes and the promotion of peace on a universal scale.

This Charter thus became a new decalogue of a new faith in a new century and yet, before the actual term of universal peace could even be articulated properly, there was discord among the nations, especially among the big powers, themselves who have been so instrumental in organizing the United Nations. The ideal of unity itself was seriously challenged and the disagreement within this Assembly led to the organization of blocs, and in the reality of international community, the organization of fields of influence.

And the General Assembly seemed to mirror the reality of these seemingly irreconcilable divisions. Instead of the one world which the Charter had affirmed, there was a progressive fragmentation of the nations along ideological, social and economic lines. There was a so-called Free World as there was a Communist World. There was a world of the big powers and a world of the satellites. There was a Western World and an Eastern World. And, now, there is a developed, and an underdeveloped, world.

These terms are not merely verbal for it is evident that the conceptual divisions of our universe are indicated in corresponding situations and real distinctions. And, one of the most ironic facts of our civilization is that while yearly we convene here in the General Assembly to speak of peace, we have witnessed the proliferation of nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction. Nations and powers seemed to be bent on increasing their capability for war rather than in utilizing their strength for the attainment of international peace.

And, I can safely say that perhaps we have gone back to the heresy of traditional politics that in order to achieve peace we must prepare for, and even wage war. Against this background, therefore, I come from Asia like many of you, and the question is posed: What then is the destiny of Asia? The destiny of Asia is, I believe, the destiny we can share with the whole world, but more specifically with the developing nations in Africa and Latin America: to attain the goal envisaged by the Charter of the United Nations of social progress and better standards of living and wider freedom.

The last World War, while preserving the freedom of the European peoples, also led perhaps unintentionally, to the liquidation of colonialism, and one billion eight hundred million people emerged as free nations. Out of these, eighty five per cent or one billion five hundred million are in Asia, mainly on the Chinese mainland, the Indian subcontinent, the Indochinese and Malay peninsulas and the two archipelagoes of Indonesia and the Philippines, as well as the Middle East.

It was an essential condition for the survival and progress of these liberated nations that they have an opportunity to control their independence and establish a political and social institution as they may decide for themselves and of their own free choice and to cooperate with others in the maintenance of peace in this world.

And so, today, we are faced with Vietnam. The case of bringing the war in Vietnam to the conference table is beyond dispute and all of us must give loyal support to any attempt to arrest the deterioration of this conflict into a war of catastrophic proportions.

I am happy to note that the secretary general has taken steps along this direction. It is unfortunate that his efforts have not been properly supported. For several months now, since February, several Asian states, my country among them, have attempted to bring about a dialogue between North and South Vietnam. Perhaps it is now time to consider what I had suggested before and that is, the possibility of the organization of a political counterpart of the UN-controlled ECAFE within the framework of the United Nations. This would be an organization that would frankly recognize and accept the diversity of political beliefs in Asia. This would be a political forum where urgent issues like Vietnam could be referred to.

There are other forums of this nature in other areas of the world but unfortunately up to now there is no such forum in Asia. And the principle that the Asian peoples themselves have the inescapable obligation of providing Asian solutions to Asian problems is at once so just and indisputably right that no country, no nation, not even Hanoi and Peking, probably, can help but be under strong moral obligation to relax their hostile attitude. At least, this is our fervent prayer.

Not so long ago, the Soviet Union achieved an effective diplomatic maneuver by negotiating the Peace of Tashkent. The effort, while it served no special interest for the Soviet Union, contributed vitally to the peace and stability of the Indian sub-continent.

In the spirit of that achievement, may I reiterate the appeal of the nations of Asia with which we have dealt—Malaysia and Thailand among them— and the other countries, that all Asian countries, or countries of Asia for that matter, and all other countries of the world including the Soviet Union, act with equal boldness and imagination by calling a new Tashkent for Southeast Asia to end this brutal war in South Vietnam.

For we have in Vietnam today, a people who, for 25 years have gone through suffering and war, and have more than earned their right to be left alone, to be free and to live in peace with their neighbors. And yet, without their participation and through no wish of their own, they had been chosen as the testing ground for a new dogma of universal and perpetual revolution—war by proxy.

We have watched this from, a distance, knowing the meaning of subversion and intimate with the cruel connotations of guerrilla war and insurgency, and we suffered with Vietnam. The Philippines has sent a 2,000-man civic action group to South Vietnam. They are composed of engineers and a security force. The objective is not war but peace. The task of the unit is to work for reconstruction, not for destruction, and it is in accordance with the traditions of my country. For 15 years now, we have been sending to the Indochina peninsula doctors and nurses to succor the sick and help the needy people of the towns of Vietnam and Laos. We do not wish to add to the sufferings of the people of South Vietnam. On the contrary, we look forward to a negotiated settlement of this war whereby the North and the South, and their allies, would agree to a cessation of hostilities until such time as the Vietnamese people, as a whole, can freely determine their own destiny in accordance with the enshrined principle of self-determination.

To the great powers directly or indirectly involved in that conflict we appeal—to bear in mind constantly the primary responsibility for keeping the peace and to use their strength and resources not to advance their own particular political hegemonies or their special economic interests, but rather, the welfare of mankind.

For it staggers the mind to consider the cost of the Vietnam War, in terms of human, natural and financial resources. If these resources were harnessed to constructive ends they would be large enough to reverse the negative results so far of the United Nations Development Decade.

This, however, suggests the possibility that the proposed Asian peace conference will include not only the establishment of a truce but also consider the formulation of concrete proposals that would not only repair the material damage caused by the war but also organize and finance projects for the improvement of the region, like the Mekong River development project. There is a substantial reservoir of good will to sustain such a cooperative effort, as is shown in the reaction of Asians toward the Asian Development Bank with headquarters in our city of Manila, and by the ready acceptance of the Honolulu Declaration of social revolution of Vietnam, even as violence now continues in that country.

These are not the only developments that light with hope the gloomy picture of Southeast Asia. In the space of a few months, normal relations have been restored between my country and Malaysia, between the Philippines and Singapore. Through Asian diplomacy and responsibility, in which my country happily participated, the Indonesian konfrontasi with Malaysia has been dismantled and today Indonesia's responsible leaders give assurances of their wish to return to the United Nations. As an Asian leader, and in representation of all those who have missed the wisdom of Indonesia's counsel in international relations, I hope that Indonesia may soon return to the fold of the United Nations.

Indonesia is the largest and most important country, perhaps, in the Southeast Asia region. Its absence from the councils of the United Nations had left a void in our midst. It has much to contribute to the day-to-day activities of this organization as well as to its future development based on the lofty ideals embodied in the charter of this organization. As an ancient nation proud of its distinctive national identity and its priceless heritage of centuries-old culture, Indonesia is also devoted to the principles of self-reliance and self-help, and is determined to make its full contribution to the peace, freedom and progress not only of Asia but of the whole world.

We look forward, therefore, to the return of Indonesia to the United Nations family, as a neighbor, as a brother nation, and as an ally in the age-old, world-wide struggle in behalf of the freedom and dignity of man.

Despite the grave problems that beset our region, we feel that we must soon approach a watershed which will be when there will be moderation on the part of everyone, especially among those who seek to encourage subversion, and when everyone, especially in Asia, will be willing to live in tolerance and in peace with his neighbor.

The United Nations was conceived as a force for international peace and security. For twenty years, it has endeavored to mediate between the East and the West, between rival blocs, and in recent years, this rivalry has largely abated in Europe. But now it has exploded in Asia and Communist China is one of the protagonists. Regretably, the question is not even on the agenda of the United Nations and I feel that it has thus evaded its primordial responsibility under the Charter.

In the second instance, the United Nations is a force for greater equality in the world. It has vital responsibilities for the speedy grant of independence to colonial and dependent territories. It seeks to stop the violation of human rights wherever they may occur, including all forms of racial discriminations, especially its most virulent manifestation, apartheid, and to narrow the widening gap between the rich and poor nations of the world. For one of the most serious problems the United Nations, and for that matter, all countries, will soon face, is the long range problem of the bipolarization of the world all over again into rich and poor nations, along the lines of colonialism, for the rich nations are the old colonizers and the poor nations are the old colonies.

Whatever may be said of the achievements of the United Nations in the field of decolonization and promotion of human rights, as our distinguished Secretary General well said more than once forcefully, the Development Decade now in its sixth year is moving backward instead of forward. And the tragedy of it is that we continue to debate. Debate may help mitigate conflict thus enabling the United Nations to serve as a force for peace, but it cannot surmount the Great Divide between the rich and the poor nations. Only through effective action can the United Nations be able to become a significant force for the greater equality that we seek in this world.

The United Nations is not a world government, and the General Assembly is not a world parliament. But when we contemplate the problems of the war in Vietnam, Southern Rhodesia, Southwest Africa, the stubborn issues of disarmament, and even the continuing financial crises that beset the United Nations, all of these becloud its future. One could almost wish that the United Nations were indeed a world government and that the General Assembly were a world parliament.

But the reality is that the rules for amending the Charter insure that under present conditions, the United Nations will never be a world government. What then is the alternative?

For the present the choice seems to be to candidly accept the fact that the United Nations is a tool for diplomatic negotiation fashioned by 118 nation-states, each jealous of its national sovereignty. To promote the derogation of national sovereignty in favor of the collective authority of the United Nations, this would appear to be the limit for efforts to strengthen the United Nations at the present time. It would imply the readiness to discuss the question of Vietnam regardless of the misgivings and reservations of certain nations. It would mean the sincere support of measures to impose obedience on members of the United Nations. It would involve patient negotiations, the tedious, the tiring step by step attempt to try to achieve in one magic stroke the grand design of complete and universal disarmament not by, simple, practical plans to attain this ultimate objective. It would mean readiness to forego winning mere debating points that we try to do here, in favor of making one gesture, one heartening gesture of faith in the organization, and solidarity among ourselves by helping to bail out perhaps the United Nations from the crippling and humiliating insolvency which faces it.

And all of us have a role to play and a contribution to make in this undertaking. For the United Nations itself, may I say, there is a clear and admitted need to protect this organization, improve the techniques employed in its manifold operations, and to bring to its work, particularly in developing countries, a greater sense of mission and dedication.

And now, perhaps, it is time to speak of the review and revision of the Charter of the United Nations, already years overdue and which perhaps can no longer be deferred. A whole new world has emerged since 1945. And the Charter should faithfully reflect the realities and the vital merits of this new world. Only thus can the United Nations become an instrument fully responsive to the aims and aspirations of the member nations.

And, to the developing countries, including my own, I would, speaking from the heart, address the following-appeal: Let us redouble our efforts at self-help with the aim of reducing to the absolute minimum the burden which our need for economic aid imposes on the United Nations, and on the developed countries. Let us exercise our right to do our utmost for the well-being of our own people. But after having done that which is humanly possible for our own people, for the economic and social development of our country, if there should remain a vital margin between success and failure, between poverty and prosperity which is not within our capacity, no matter how heroic our efforts may be, then let that margin, but that margin alone, be the measure of the demand which we would then make in good conscience upon the international society.

Let us, through the practice of social justice, and deliberate fostering of civil liberties, mitigate as much as possible the social tensions among our own people and by that much reduce the sum total of the tension that beset our world.

Let us compose our own differences and resolve our own quarrels peacefully and justly, thereby eliminating the areas of conflict in our neighborhoods. Let us remove from the agenda of this General Assembly as many of the disputes as we ourselves can settle.

Let us act with sincerity and firm purpose to avoid or put an end to small wars which have a way of growing into major international crises. There is intrinsic merit in the task of putting our own house in order. It is also an act of wisdom for if we small nations cannot settle our own quarrels, the big powers will come in and settle it for us.

Let us not underestimate the inherent value of the cumulative effect of small contributions to peace, and a recent example comes to mind. I have already referred to the dismantling of the konfrontasi between Indonesia and Malaysia. Rising above both pride and protocol, the Indonesian Government put an end to its armed konfrontasi with Malaysia, by means of a peace agreement under which there were, as the Indonesian foreign minister observed, and I quote "no winners except the Malay people," to which both Malaysia and Indonesia belong, and, happily to which the Philippines also belongs.

As a result, the political climate in our immediate vicinity was transformed almost overnight from one of tension and conflict to one of peace and enhanced prospect for fruitful cooperation. This change for the better has not brought any headlines, nor any front page news, as has the war in Vietnam, but it has brought forth something significant—that there is a nucleus of peace and stability in a sea, an area, of crises and conflicts.

By itself, such a nucleus of reconciliation might not have much of an impact, but if it could have counterparts in other areas of the globe where local conflicts are still amenable to neighborly solution, the total effect might be of considerable contribution to the peace of the whole world.

And, finally, conscious of our righteousness, the righteousness of our cause, but cognizant also of the need for a new brotherhood of man, let us leave the past behind and meet other countries halfway whenever they should come forward in a sincere desire for joint endeavor in building a more stable, more secure and more prosperous world.

And now, in all sincerity and with due respect to the requirements of propriety, permit me to address an earnest appeal and plea to the developed nations, especially the big powers.

We ask the big powers, first of all, to make yet one final and all-out effort to break the political stalemate in order that they might be able to discharge their primary obligation under the Charter to insure world peace and establish a workable system of collective security.

Secondly, to devise an effective system of international control leading to the eventual elimination of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction.

Thirdly, to complete their program of disarmament which would enable them to fulfill their promise to use part of the savings accruing from the termination of the armament race for the acceleration of economic and social progress throughout the world.

Fourthly, to use the United Nations as a major instrument in a concerted effort to arrest economic bipolarization of the world into the rich and the poor nations.

Fifthly, to complete the liquidation of colonialism and remove the last vestiges in a world that has no longer any place or justification for it, and Finally, to remove the developing regions, once and for all, from the arena of the cold war where there is no place for small nations, and give them the time to establish stable conditions, and grant them the assistance that small nations need for peaceful growth.

All these we must do even as we endeavor to sharpen the United Nations into a tool for diplomatic negotiations for I cannot believe that we are a race of beings doomed by the death-wish and irresistibly drawn to self-destruction and to disaster. Rather, let us demonstrate that we are intelligent human beings, because I think we have skill and will enough to use the United Nations to insure not only man's survival but also his growth and development.

And, in the earnest effort to achieve these goals, we have enjoyed in the United Nations for the past five years, the wise and dedicated guidance of Secretary General U Thant. For reasons that do him honor as a man of conscience and a man of peace, he has declined to offer himself for a second term. While respecting the reasons he has given, we would invoke those very reasons in asking him to stay. For the office of Secretary General is a unique priesthood of selfless service and sacrifice. At certain times, it may become an office of indefinite tenure. Such a time is now. Secretary General U Thant has served the cause of peace in many ways. Let us, in one voice, ask him to stay with us a while and by so doing, perhaps perform his greatest service to mankind. And, having asked this of him, let each member in turn candidly examine his conscience and let every government ask itself what it has failed to do in the past for the United Nations, and what it can do today and tomorrow, so that a man of principle like Secretary General U Thant, in conscience, may agree to continue serving our organization.

The challenge is not to any one great power alone, not to the United States only, not only to the Soviet Union. This is a challenge to the entire community of states, for the problems of world security and development transcend regional boundaries. Their effects and implications, for good or ill, are global in their dimensions and they hammer home in crisis after crisis the one central fact of our existence: that our world is one, in technology, in economics, in vulnerability to the atomic weapons of war, in long-term welfare, in the ultimate destiny of the human species.

The time lag between awareness and action on the implications of the irreversible oneness of our world cannot be extended indefinitely without mortal danger to mankind. Before it is too late, a worldwide framework of peace, orderly cooperation and co-existence must be built enabling East and West, North and South, to work together, and together enrich and prolong man's life span on earth.

Only in the larger context can lasting solutions be found to the problems of the world.

With profound gratitude, Asia, and the whole world of course, acknowledges the great achievements recorded by the United Nations during the first 20 years of its existence. In any history of our time, pride of place must be accorded to the invaluable services of the United Nations

In an age less convulsed than our own by revolutionary changes, these far-reaching achievements might have proved sufficient unto themselves. But our times and the state of our world demand much more of the United Nations; they require nothing less than the full implementation of the Charter and the realization of the United Nations' maximum potential for universal peace and human betterment.

And, in the accomplishment of this task, herculean by any standard, the threat of atomic annihilation by mistake or miscalculation imposes an almost impossibly short deadline.

We stand in danger of failure to meet this deadline unless we can summon the energy and the will to match the magnitude and urgency of the challenge with a response both timely and adequate. We cannot defer much longer the decision as to the kind of a world we really want but can only postpone, and only for a relatively short time, the fateful day of reckoning.

Shall we permit in defiance of the clear dictates of wisdom the permanent division of the world into rich and poor nations, with all that such a tragic cleavage portends for the future of mankind?

The crisis in Asia warns us to pause and reconsider our position while there is yet time to change course.

Do we really want a growing world secure in its peaceful pursuits, co-existing in harmony and moving confidently towards a better life for all? Do we truly want the kind of world blueprinted in the Charter not as a distant realm nor as an illusion but as an attainable destiny within the framework of the United Nations?

Let every nation examine its own conscience and answer the question.

This session may be the final one opportunity for redemption, for the time of decision is upon us. We must act in concert. We must act decisively. The imperatives of survival dictate no other course. Let us say and proclaim that man once more is the master of our race and not slave of his own heritage.

Speech of President Marcos upon acceptance of the degree of Doctor of Laws, Honoris Causa, September 26, 1966

His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines

Upon acceptance of the degree of Doctor of Laws, honoris causa, from the East-West Center, Community of Hawaii

[Delivered in Honolulu, Hawaii, September 26, 1966]

Chancellor Jones,
President Hamilton,
Governor Burns and Mrs. Burns,
Distinguished guests,
Ladies and gentlemen:

I accept this degree and this honor for and on behalf of the Filipino people. I shall hold this award and offer it at the altar of our freedom, a freedom which is symbolized by the diversity, the liberty, enjoyed in this state and in the entire United States of America.

For, as I have repeatedly stated, in this kindly land of America lies the fountainhead of many of our liberties. It is from America whence came the general impulse that was to allow a new birth of freedom in the Pacific. Truly the Philippine Republic is a sister of the Republic of the United States of America.

To this great country belongs the prior honor and credit for having initiated one of the glories of our age, which is the widening of the horizons of freedom and the emergence of sovereign nations throughout the world. One point eight billion people came to know freedom after the Second World War.

For your noble experiment in democracy in the Philippines had rendered untenable colonialism, not only in Asia and Africa but everywhere else. Thus, as I accept this award, I am reminded of the very essence of democracy.

As I came in, I noted that the Philippines does not have a monopoly of placard-bearers and demonstrators. I noted that there was a plea on a placard calling for peace in Vietnam. This has been my purpose and objective. It will be noted that when I spoke before the General Assembly of the United Nations, as well as in the United States Congress, I said then that we sent the engineer construction battalion with security troops with one directive, one order, and one objective; and that is to go on a mission of peace. They go to reconstruct what has been destroyed. They go to seek the rehabilitation of what has been wrecked, the physical symbols of the freedom that must be given a people to determine for themselves what society and what government they will establish in their own land, an option which is sought to be preempted by a power strange to and outside South Vietnam.

Today, at 11:30 this morning, I issued a call to six nations for a summit conference or a conference of all the heads of state of the six nations that participate in the South Vietnamese conflict, namely: the head of state of South Vietnam, Thailand, South Korea, Australia, New Zealand and the United States. It is my pleasure to announce here that South Vietnam, Thailand, and South Korea have previously agreed to this arrangement and while the date set, October 18, may be somewhat awkward for some nations like the United States, in view of the approaching elections. I just received word that the Prime Minister of Australia has willingly agreed to attend the conference if it is set on October 18 of this year. It is my intention to hold the conference either in Manila or in Baguio City, the latter our summer capital.

I did speak to President Johnson about the necessity of immediately taking steps to attain peace in South Vietnam, either by negotiations directly or through the intermediaries whom we have approached. It is my belief that President Johnson will attend this conference and through this forum on this occasion of the awarding of the Doctorate of Laws on my humble self, I appeal to the President of the United States to attend the conference on October 18, 1966 in Manila.

This conference will, of course, reassess the present positions of the allies of South Vietnam in this war. But emphasis will be laid on the non-military, the non-violent aspects of the South Vietnamese crisis. It is my hope that the principal purpose will be to adopt a common stand in order to attain the final objective of peace in South Vietnam. But beyond this, for the question of South Vietnam does not answer the question of stability in Southeast Asia, or in Asia, or for that matter, the whole world, beyond this it is necessary to plan and envision not only rehabilitation but also regional cooperation with the support of this great power, the United States of America, in order that there may be an economic development in accordance with the Honolulu, Declaration of a social revolution in the whole area of Asia.

It is my hope that this conference will, during the period of two or three days, be able to arrive at definite plans for regional cooperation, economic, mostly, and social. It is my hope that emphasis will be placed on civic action in South Vietnam.

The Philippines has a history of fighting communism. For if you will remember, when the United States of America dismantled its colonial machinery and proclaimed the independence of the Philippines on July 4, 1946, immediately thereafter, there was initiated a revolution by the Hukbalahaps, otherwise well-known as the Huks, the armed elements of communism in my country. The Hukbalahaps numbered from 20,000 to 30,000 armed men with a base of about a hundred thousand. The Hukbalahaps mounted a rebellion that lasted from 1946 to 1951. From 1941 to 1945, the Filipinos participated in the Second World War. The casualties among our people totalled more than one million Filipinos who died in the Second World War.

The brutality of the Second World War left much anger within the hearts of the Filipinos. There too, was anger in my heart, for I lost my father, who was hanged from a tree, as penalty for my refusal to surrender after the surrender of Bataan and for my insistence in leading a guerilla group in the mountains of Luzon. But this anger was dissipated when this Hukbalahap movement was initiated and rebellion flared up. For the same brutality and the same viciousness that was shown, was demonstrated by our own brothers in this revolution. There was rape, there was pillage, there was burning, there was destruction, there was killing, and there was massacre. And these were all perpetrated by the Hukbalahaps, by the Huks, some of them men who had fought beside me during the war. And so all of us realized then that it was not the nationality of a soldier that drove him to brutality and viciousness but rather the motivations of war. And we realized then that communism, which sought to impose upon us a definite kind of totalitarian and monolithic-structured society and government, was our enemy and as our enemy, we have fought it since then.

There had been efforts to compromise with the Hukbalahaps. I have personally participated in these efforts. But these efforts have always proved in vain. Every time there was an amnesty granted to the Hukbalahaps, such amnesty was utilized by the Huks to consolidate and strengthen their position. No less than five times the Hukbalahaps were given an opportunity to lay down their arms and join the duly constituted government. Lately, too, I sought the counsel of leaders of the Hukbalahaps, disregarding the requirements of security, I have had conference with the leaders of the Huks. But unfortunately, the die-hard and the hardcore elements of communism in my country refused to compromise.

It is for this reason that our position has come clear, and that is to press the battle against the hardcore elements of communism that seek to destroy the democratic institutions of my country, a firm policy carried out by the military. To those who are misled by them, the great majority of our people, the peasantry, to the mass of the people of the Philippines, we will give total friendship, embodied in programs of civic action, rehabilitation, resettlement, improvement of the means of living, increase of per capita income, application of all the scientific and systematic methods of agriculture, for seventy per cent of our people still earn their living from agriculture.

I speak of this because we know communism at first hand. It is my hope that you will never come to know communism as we have known it, that your country will never be infiltrated by the armed elements of communism and that they shall never occupy your towns and your countryside, that you shall never be intimate with the cruel connotations of guerilla war and insurgency, that you will never see your towns, and villages wrecked by the counterparts of the Hukbalahaps.

It is my hope that you will never know the sorrow of your brothers dying by the hands of your own countrymen. For there is nothing certainly more disastrous than for a people to be divided by political ideology. But this precisely is the purpose of communism throughout Asia today.

Throughout Asia, the one single purpose of communism is to infiltrate and divide, and dividing, wreck the institutions established within the country. They cannot export war by exporting men, so they export the idea of perpetual revolution. Perpetual revolution, world revolution, war by proxy, this is the meaning of communism as we see it. And so to my friends in America, I can only say: Listen to those who have met subversion face to face and identified it, isolated it, and known its meaning- Learn from these lessons that come from that area where communism is most active, and learning it, judge for yourself.

But I am carried away by the subject of communism. Allow me now to proceed to acknowledge my indebtedness to the university for this degree and to the East-West Center, a dream that has become a reality. The East-West Center is the meeting of the Occident and the Orient, through scholars and the exchange of scholars. I am happy to note that some of my countrymen, sir, are here in the East-West Center, and some who have passed through this institution.

I extend the congratulations and the thanks not only of my people but also, I am certain of all Asia, for this idea that has been implemented so well.

Indeed, as a great mind has said: "it is education which probably is the answer to human conflicts. It is an internationalizing agent, for the man who has acquired enough education, rises above the national frontiers and feels the well-being or the ailments of a nation that is a neighbor nation as if they were its own."

Thus, we hope success for the East-West Center, We shall pray for this Center and we hope that it shall extend its influence not only here in Hawaii but all over Asia, Let it be the means which shall encourage not only the appreciation of oriental cultures but shall point out the fundamental identification of Oriental cultures with that of the Occident.

Asia has haunted memories of colonialism, I need not go into the centuries of conflict that had been the experience of Asia. That Asia with its 1.5 billion people from the Middle East to the subcontinent of India, to the mainland of China, to the Indo-Chinese and Malaysian peninsulas, and to the two archipelagos of Indonesia and the Philippines. These 1.5 billion people constitute not only a drag on the prosperity of the world but a potential threat. They constitute the dreadful potential of triggering a Third World War. It is, therefore, necessary that the Western world understand Asia and the 1.5 billion people that inhabit it.

Always, Asia will be remembered for the violence of the past several years. It is from Asia and Africa now whence come the serious threats against peace and the challenges to the authority of the United Nations. For sometime to come, Asia will be the focus of attention of the whole world. And thus it is that for some time now, the revolutionary spirit which resulted in the independence of many nations of Asia was identified as Anti-American, anti-colonial.

However, it is a happy development that after the realization of political independence, it was also realized that emancipation would not be equated with economic progress, that it was different from revolution and establishing a government, different from winning economic emancipation. The energies, the enthusiasm, the dedication and devotion of the revolutionary had therefore been rechanneled towards the efforts to attain economic progress. Thus, we need the leaders that have been trained here in the East-West Center. These leaders understand Asia. These leaders will be able to transmit to the Western world the image of Asia and articulate, the true feelings of the Asian who feels that the days of colonialism are over and that for the establishment of a lasting peace and stability in Asia, there must be an understanding between the Western world and the Eastern world, an understanding that has come about between the United States and the Philippines.

We are happy to participate in extending such an agreement, such understanding, to all the nations of Asia and it is my hope and purpose to do my part in clarifying the intentions of the United States, so that these shall be understood in any part of the world.

For the experience of the Philippines in colonialism under the United States has been a happy one. Immediately, the United States did establish the conditions for freedom. There was immediately initiated in 1902 a universal system of education, a system of education, which created a bold, strong, comparatively strong, middle class in my country of technicians, merchants, professionals, entrepreneurs, which now constitute the hope of our people and of my country.

The Filipino nation believes in democracy. For we have organized a government, a Republic, that was patterned after the American Republic. It is a government and a republic which has adopted the principles that are embodied in your Constitution and in your way of life. It is a government that recognizes diversity of opinion and understands that freedom means the capacity for honest dissent and the tolerance of differences of opinion. For the American policy was less repressive than the others. It is the feeling of all Asia that perhaps Dien Bien Phu would never have occurred had the French followed the American colonial policy, or even late in the day, had the French agreed to promise independence to French-Indochina, to the three countries composing it now, at the start of the rebellion against the French colonial regime.

At the same time, it is the belief of the Filipinos that the mainland of China would never have been lost had the leadership of Nationalist China recognized the fact that dissidents and malcontents are always the spawn of poverty, ignorance, and disease, and that concurrently with military victory there must be economic and social reforms. But unfortunately, the Chinese leadership in the mainland of China insisted that these reforms should occur only after the attainment of military victory. It is my hope that the American leadership realizes the importance of these lessons of history in Asia. I am assured, however, after conferences with President Johnson, that the American leadership do recognize the importance of what I have called the second front, the economic front, in South Vietnam.

Because of the mass education system in the Philippines, the Philippines has political stability. Since 1907, by virtue of the Philippine Bill of 1902 approved by the United States Congress, we have been electing our representatives to the House of Representatives of our country. And since 1916, by virtue of the Jones Law, we have been electing senators to our Senate.

I am the sixth President of the Republic of the Philippines. There has been peaceful transference of political power from one party to the other and from one person to another. This certainly indicates that if we are to judge the validity of the political institutions of the Philippines by the test of Aristotle—"the election of magistrates by all, out of all," then the Philippines indeed is a democratic country.

We are proud of this achievement. But in addition to this, there is change and dynamism, which are facts of our national life, and openly, frankly, and in candor, we place before the people the option to choose—the free way of life as against the importunings of communism to world revolution. The true revolution, the revolution that is perpetual, for it constitutes the continuous mobility of elements within our society as in every democratic society, is the revolution which allows those who belong to the lower classes to rise up by sheer competence, and by the development of their God-given faculties, to rise up into positions of leadership. Accident of birth shall not determine nor demean the ultimate achievement and attainment of man, nor prevent him to rise up. And those who are now at the top of the social class can go down only by virtue of the weight of incompetence, of abuse and lack of dedication.

This, to us, is the more important revolution. It is a revolution that exists and continues within our society. For the leaders of my country, the leaders of the Philippines have come from different classes of society, from the lower to the highest. And more often than not, our leaders have come from the lower classes of society. This is the revolution which we offer in exchange for the world or so-called perpetual revolution of communism.

In Asia today, we look around and see fear in the hearts of the leaders of the small nations. For all over the world, it seems as if while the United Nations has been organized on principles derived from the basic ideas of the League of Nations, a dream that died, this restatement of the capability of man to establish a society that shall be able to maintain stability throughout the world, this new decalogue of faith in the new century, this, it seems, is again being challenged.

And while unity is the rallying cry in this organization of nations, indeed the name itself denotes its purpose, that of unity. The world is fragmented into many groups of nations. There are the big powers and satellites. There is an Eastern and a Western world. And now there is a developed and an underdeveloped world. And again we fear a new development. There is a continuous bipolarization, economic bipolarization of the world. And the lines seem to be drawn along the same old lines of colonialism. The nations that are rich are the colonizers, the nations that are poor and becoming poorer are the old colonies. To us, this constitutes a serious threat to peace which must soon be met, confronted not merely contemplated, by the United Nations and by, the individual nations of the world.

Thus it is that when we see the use of force to justify a policy in order to impose a kind of government upon any nation, there is fear within our hearts,, for we know then that we might be returning to the heresy of traditional politics, which is that, in order to maintain peace we must prepare for war or fight a war. In order to attain stability, we must manufacture nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction. Thus it is, we believe that the mortal basis for the presence of the United States in South Vietnam is the question, whether we shall allow might to be recognized as right over again, as it was before Grotius, the father of international law. Shall we disregard this vision of the social and legal visionary? If might dictates what is right, then properly small nations will gather together as satellites around the big powers and as satellites, they must permit the continued erosion of their respective sovereignties.

Thus, we return slowly, step by step, to where we started. To that of dependence upon a strong power. For there is a narrow dividing line between world colony and dependence because of power. The moral basis, therefore, of the presence of the United States in South Vietnam is clear and it is that once and for all, we must determine whether power, military power, will be allowed to dictate what is right.

For if the United States withdraws from South Vietnam, or does not participate in this fight in South Vietnam, then, ladies and gentlemen, we must admit that power and force had dictated and determined the future and destiny not only of one small nation but all other small nations, and all protestations about the existence of an international law will be to no avail-It is also our feeling that the Philippines has more advantages than any other country in the establishment of democratic institutions. It is our feeling that the Philippines must succeed in this democratic experiment. It must demonstrate to the world and to all of Asia that despotism is not a necessary ingredient in the development of a nation and for it to attain economic progress. There is a feeling current among Asian leaders that democracy is inefficient. And that we must telescope in a few years economic development that was arrived at by other countries over several centuries. But the Philippines is certain that even alone in a sea of communist or neutralist forces, it can succeed-At the same time, the presence of the United States of America in South Vietnam is dictated by what we believe is a military basis.

And this has been stated by no less than the heir apparent to Mao Tse Tung, Marshal Lin Piao, who is the prophet of the leader of Communist China and who said: "the rural areas in the world today are Asia, Africa and Latin America and the cities are Western Europe and the United States of America.

In accordance with their experience in the mainland of China, the Red leaders say and conclude that when the rural areas are overcome, the cities will ultimately fall. So even if Asia should first fall, the ultimate objective is the United States of America.

From the view point of necessity, therefore, and from the view point of the military, now is the time to upset this plan of Communist China. For it is possible that if you allow the attainment of political hegemony that is the objective of Red China in Asia, no matter what the differences are between Russia and Red China, inasmuch as they believe in the same political ideology, ultimately these differences will be settled. And the United States will be reduced to a second class power before the might of a united Red China, overwhelmingly dominant in Asia, and a Russia that has all the weapons of mass destruction at its command.

Thus it is that while there are the present commitments in Vietnam, we look beyond Vietnam. I observe and I would like to reiterate that there is no nation in Asia today that can balance the power of Communist China, whether alone or jointly with other Asian nations. Thus it is necessary that during this dangerous security gap, these other nations of Asia must look to another power for the shield of protection. And the only power right now which seems acceptable to Asian leaders is the United States of America. Beyond this question of security and economic development, are the fundamental issues of freedom, dignity of man, and of democracy. And these can be attained after the settlement of the crisis in South Vietnam, but at the same time may I reiterate the warning of history in Asia, that these things cannot be won by military victory. That to preserve the dignity of man, democracy must be made to work, and must demonstrate its capacity to uplift the ordinary human being in Asia, at the same time that military victories are being won.

It is the quiet role of the Philippines today to seek to mediate, to bring about a dialogue between North and South Vietnam through other intermediaries. The Philippines is willing to step back, the Philippines is willing to allow other nations to lead, but certainly the Philippines will take the initiative to bring about a conversation, such a dialogue wherein those engaged in the conflict may determine their respective positions in Asia.

Right now, we don't have the counterpart of the organization of the African states. We do not have the counterpart of the organization of American states. There is no political forum to which can be referred any critical issue like Vietnam. It is my hope that we will be able to organize such a forum.

These, then, ladies and gentlemen, are the ideals that come from Asia. But the ultimate purpose is to build a world for all, a world that shall be dedicated to the future of the human species. It is my belief that all of mankind is wise enough, has enough will to organize itself to meet the dangers that now confront it.

Yes we look towards the day when a more enlightened generation will probably populate the earth, a more enlightened generation that shall do away with the paradox of a world of plenty that has hunger, a world of science that has disease, and a world of wisdom that knows war. This more enlightened generation perhaps is your generation, you, especially who are here in the East-West Center of Hawaii.

It is my hope that your generation will not know the mistakes that have been committed by my generation and the generations before me. We are merely the trustees of human civilization, for we shall transmit it to you ultimately. And transmitting it to you, it is our hope that we shall hand down to you a legacy that shall be better than what we have received from those who have handed it to us, the generations before us.

To each and every one of you of the East-West Center, I wish to quote the oriental philosopher who said: "Make well of this day for every today well spent makes every yesterday a dream of happiness and every tomorrow a vision of hope."

Address of President Marcos on the Manila Summit Conference, October 24, 1966

His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
On the opening day of the Manila Summit Conference

[Delivered at the Congress, October 24, 1966]

As chairman of the Manila Summit Conference of 1966, it is my pleasure to assume this position by the unanimous consent and approval of the members of this conference.

I extend my thanks and the gratitude of my people to the Prime Minister of New Zealand for his generous remarks and to the other members of this conference for their unanimity.

I greet the heads of state and the heads of government who are here as our guests, their ladies, the foreign and other ministers, the distinguished guests and our friends.

For the times are historic and today is a historic day. Perhaps many of us may have missed it, but today is the anniversary of the United Nations Organizations, an organization to which humanity clings its hopes for universal brotherhood, for stability and lasting security for all mankind.

But since the beginning of time, the wisest of men had sought to solve the riddle of peace and failed. And so even today, as if mankind drifts in the sea of inertia, man has problems that are sought to be solved with old solutions, and novel questions are answered with ancient formulas. Man who has mastered the firmament and solved the riddle of the atom still seems to grovel at the feet of his ancient enemies—war, hunger, disease. Man, the master and the king of all creation, is still a slave of his own heritage.

For is it not a paradox that in a world of plenty there is want, in a world of science there is disease, in a world of understanding there is war?

So, today, the seven nations here gathered have come to raise their voices for more food for the needy, for enlightenment for the illiterate and for the cure of the sick, as well as for peace in this world.

Seven nations have come to this ancient capital of our nation, with only one thought in mind, and that is, that on Asian initiatives, we seek to lay the basis for the solution of Asian problems.

This historic occasion is indeed the first meeting of the seven nations in Asia, called upon the suggestion of Asian nations. Today is the first attempt of Asia to initiate such a gathering not only to seek to terminate an existing conflict but to establish understanding amongst men. And at the same time, to arrive at a re-assertion of the ideal and the principle for which humanity may best be remembered in our century, and that is, the acceptance of international responsibility for the entire human family.

For from Asia has come and will come, if not aborted, the gravest threat to mankind. The chronicle of the annals of man may well seek in vain for any other parallel in history. For; this indeed is an occasion in which we seek to advance the frontiers of nobility.

On behalf of my people, therefore, I extend warm and affectionate welcome to each and everyone of the heads of government and heads of state who are here.

I greet President Park Chung Hee of the Republic of Korea.

I greet Prime Minister Thanom Kittikachorn of Thailand.

I greet Chairman Nguyen Van Thieu of the Republic of Vietnam.

I greet Prime Minister Nguyen Cao Ky of the Republic of Vietnam.

I greet Prime Minister Harold Holt of Australia.

I greet Prime Minister Keith Holyoake of New Zealand.

And I greet President Lyndon B. Johnson of the United States of America.

We extend welcome to the members of their delegations, and especially to the fair ladies who are here in this gathering.

The presence here alone of the heads of government and the heads of state is to me a great achievement. That we may meet and seek common council is to me a step-forward as we advance the frontiers of human nobility, and that the greatest nation on earth, the United States of America, has come upon the invitation of the Asian nations, not only to advance the cause of peace but to raise her voice in order that there may be stability in our part of the world; that we may meet the problem of hunger, disease and ignorance which is the cause of discontent; this to me is a tribute to American sincerity and the validity of Asian aims.

The whole world realizes the almost insurmountable obstacles in your respective countries that could have prevented your coming here or could have been utilized as an excuse, a valid excuse for non-attendance. It is, therefore, fitting that I point out that the presence here of – President Johnson is eloquent proof of a momentous factor in the world situations, and that is the generous acceptance of the United States, its enlightened decision to accept its share and participation in the establishment of stability and security in Asia.

For this, Asia thanks the President of the United States of America.

For he has come as he has well said: to listen, to participate, to cooperate. And he has come to expose himself to Asian feelings and Asian thoughts and Asian aims. And this indeed establishes the fact that it wishes to play a constructive role in Asia today as it turns its face towards this area of deprivation.

The participation of the Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand must be noted. For it constitutes a hopeful augury. They are our neighbors by the accidents of geography, but our own brothers, allies, and partners by their own deliberate choice. Developed more than other Asian countries, they are as deeply committed to the freedom and prosperity of Asia and we know that they offer great contributions to the noble objectives of this conference.

The presence here of Chairman Nguyen Van Thieu and Prime Minister Nguyen Cao Ky of Vietnam, President Park Chung Hee of Korea, as well as Prime Minister Thanom Kittikachorn of Thailand certainly indicates the confluence of the vital interests in this conference of the nations that border the Pacific and the Chinese mainland, the area and region which today is the most sensitive and the most important in the eyes of observers of the international scene.

Thailand, South Vietnam, Korea, and the Philippines have suggested that this meeting be called. And it has been agreed that this was the proper forum in which to discuss a common stand on the bitter conflict that now rages in Vietnam. We have been drawn together by the council of faith and hope. And if our will is strong and we dedicate all our resources to this purpose, we will succeed.

The attention of the world is focused upon us, the skeptics as well as the believers. But the men of goodwill of this world pray that we shall be able to raise the conference to the summit not only of hope but also of probability and achievement.

This council must be a council that shall attain better understanding. It must be a council that shall present a plan for a better and more prosperous Asia. It must be a council that shall seek food for the needy and hungry, that it shall establish and fashion a plan for education for the ignorant and illiterate. It must be a council that shall seek the causes of war and attempt to eradicate them. Thus, this council shall be known in history as a council of peace and not a council of war.

For the peoples of Asia have borne the deadly, crushing weight of deprivation for centuries. And in the uncountable millions of heart not only in Asia but all over the world, there is a unifying reason, there is the deep tender yearning for a little more stability and a little more comfort and food.

The world needs peace. But if Asia must be saved, we must establish peace in Asia. Asian nations have had a surfeit of violence and war. Their deepest longing is not only for security and stability. Their deepest longing is to be able to work without any threat of reprisal, to sleep without any fear of death, to care for their young without any fear of separation, and over and above all, to be able to choose their own kind of government and their own kind of society.

But on the other hand, the peace that Asia seeks is not the peace of betrayal nor of death. It is a peace that would allow an option to each and every country, whether Asia or not, to choose its own form of society, an option to freedom and liberty, the liberty and freedom that will allow the full development of God endowed faculties to each and every man.

Understanding will come not as a victory of one side of a conflict but as a victory for all, in which all humanity can share, and this is the dream that we seek. Thus, the objectives of this conference are those that have been set. Vietnam, Korea, Thailand and the Philippines have suggested this conference as perhaps the first painful step that we must take in order to attain the dream that I speak of. Before we can realize negotiations with the Communists, it is necessary that the allies of South Vietnam and South Vietnam itself come together and adopt a common stand. It is necessary that the seven nations in Vietnam fashion a plan for the development of Asia that shall eradicate the causes of war not only in Vietnam, not only in Asia, but throughout the world.

We extend a hand conciliation across the China Sea from this coastal city to North Vietnam. But it should respond and it should respond not with the usual spate of slander but with some manifestation of goodwill. The good faith of the nations here has been manifested by the fact that we have not waited for such response from the enemy to start these deliberations.

The conference shall proceed in disregard of invectives from our detractors, nor of the sarcasm of our detractors. We shall proceed and seek to attain these noble objectives that we have set for ourselves. We hope that this conference shall present a general disarmament plan for the development of all of Asia and all the countries of Asia. We hope that in any gathering that involves Asia, Asia shall be consulted. For there is a fresh new wind that sweeps over the face of Asia; its peoples are more perceptive, its leaders are more dedicated, passionately, to the interest of their people; and Asia can no longer accept western formulas without questioning or participation. Asia hopes that it shall be given participation in the determination of its own destiny.

The Asian Development Bank now rises to my mind and reminds me that perhaps the charter of this bank may well be the Magna Carta of Asian prosperity and stability. If we unite behind this idea, the Asian Development Bank may well be the beginning of a new and prosperous Asia. It may well illuminate the causes of war. It may well be the starting point for the eradication of the causes of war. It may well exterminate such causes and ultimately bring about only the prosperity of Asia but also the stability of the entire world.

However, experience has taught us that the pursuit of goodwill is a long and tedious process. This conference is but the beginning of such a process. Realities also compel us and caution us to understand that miracles cannot be attained within the short span of these two days of conference. However, the stakes in Vietnam go beyond Vietnam, go beyond Asia, into the world and, therefore, we must persist upon this search for universal brotherhood.

And if we shall be able to fashion a plan to illumine these causes of war and bring to the attention of all the nations and peoples of the world such causes, we shall move forward towards the ideal of universal brotherhood.

So, today we are here to seek a new summit in the world's aspiration for a life without war. No conference of heads of state has set a more noble vision nor a more urgent one. Let the historians, therefore, record that we have gathered here to meet this challenge and that we have done our share in the pursuit of the ideal of a universal brotherhood. The skeptics and the fatalists know not the agony in Asia but we do. And so gathering all our strength even as against a world of discouragement, we shall accept the odium and the stigma that our detractors would seek to attach to this pursuit of universal brotherhood. And doing so, we can only say that no man quiet his conscience unless he pursues with vigor every opening and opportunity that is granted him as an avenue for the attainment of peace.

And so today, let the historians also record that with a prayer in our hearts we come to articulate the vague, groping yearnings of the mute, silent and suffering multitudes of the earth; the multitudes that do not participate in grave decisions, perhaps have no interest in the causes of conflicts but still must suffer the casualties of war. For these multitudes, we come to offer and will offer the best that is in us, all that we can muster of human courage, human wisdom, human resourcefulness, human ingenuity, human love, human compassion; and beyond this, no mortal on earth can offer more.

To each and everyone of you again I say, greetings, “mabuhay“, and thank you.

Speech of President Marcos at the opening of the 1966 Asian Ministers of Labor Conference, December 12, 1966

His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the opening of the 1966 Asian Ministers of Labor Conference

[Delivered at the Social Security System (SSS) Conference Hall, December 12, 1966]

Secretary Espinosa;
Distinguished delegates of this Asian labor conference; Your Excellencies, Diplomats, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen:

It is my honor and distinct pleasure to be able to welcome you personally to the Republic of the Philippines which is honored by your presence and by your selection of Manila as the site of your conference.

I understand skepticism has been expressed over the results of this labor conference in Asia, inasmuch as Asia presents some of the gravest problems in manpower employment, which prevails all over the world. Asia, which has more than half of the world's population, certainly is beset by the similar problems of unemployment of lack of development capital and lack of a systematic approach to the confusion that has arisen out of the sudden evolvement of independent countries in our part of the globe. But certainly I feel that Asia can contribute constructively to the problems of labor and to the systematic solution of the inadequacy in the employment of our human resources.

It has been said that Asia today, with its teeming millions of impoverished, ignorant and diseased peoples, constitute the gravest threat to the peace of mankind. It has been said that as long as this problem of Asia and Africa remains unsolved, there will be no peace in the world. Therefore, the problems of labor and unemployment may well be the key to the peace of the world. I cannot, therefore, overstate the importance of your conference today. I can only hope and pray for the success of this gathering.

It has been said, and perhaps properly, that the Western world developed its technology and its present state of affluence through the exploitation of human resources. It has been said that the industrial revolution of the world has resulted in human wreckage. If this be so, your new mission and mine, the mission of the ministers of labor, is to establish the delicate balance between development and human welfare. For your countries and mine are countries lacking in the available capital resources and funds for development. It is a test of the statesmanship of all the ministers of labor to establish such a balance for their respective societies and their respective governments.

In our respective societies, we may discover that all the available funds that we may have should be utilized first for development, but not as an end; rather, economic development should be used ultimately as a tool for the reestablishment of social justice. At the same time, as we utilize our available capital resources for economic development, and ultimately for the attainment of social justice, let it not be forgotten that we must have welfare, too, jointly with economic development, and that we must have welfare and social justice without pricing ourselves out of international competition. We must have social justice without killing individual initiative.

This, too, is one of the gravest problems that you and I face. The administrator of government, as well as the statesman and the leader in labor, must study the complexities of such problems.

There is a new dimension in government all over the world today, and that is the establishment of the human factor in all kinds of development—political, social and economic the human factor that looks to the individual and individual dignity as the ultimate aim of all societies, the human factor that establishes the right and the capacity of man to develop his entire, available genius and strength in accordance with his own best efforts and energies. We must establish an industrial revolution without exploitation, it is true, but in establishing an industrial revolution' without exploitation we must not destroy either the means by which we can attain such an industrial revolution.

We must tame the machines in order that we may not leave on the road of progress human wreckage that was the price paid in the past by the development of modern societies. I will not go into the different aspects of this problem which I am sure properly grasped in your able hands in this conference. Suffice it to say that in my country, in our country, the established assistance of social security and the system of welfare programs are aimed at recreating a new society.

In our country, as in yours, agriculture is the main source of livelihood of the great majority of our people; anywhere from 60 to 70 percent of our people earn their livelihood from this sector of our economy. On many an occasion I had stated that many of our countries must look to agriculture first and its development in order to improve the living conditions of most of the people. But ultimately and at last, the final objective must be a balanced and industrial economy—a balanced agro-industrial economy for it is only industry, probably, that can absorb our unemployed and our underemployed.

In the Philippines we have the strange spectacle of the family system absorbing the unemployed and underemployed of our country. Sociologists, political observers and economists have often asked me why, if there are so many unemployed in our country, why there is not a more palpable manifestation of this unemployment? And the answer is, the family system, the close family ties tend to make a built-in welfare service for the unemployed and the underemployed.

But before long, we must attend to the unemployed and the underemployed through a more systematic approach. Thus, we have established, I repeat, a social security and welfare program in the Philippines. The Social Security System, started in 1957, now covers about 1,500,000 workers. It is my hope that before long this will be doubled, and that before the end of my term, the system will cover about one-half of the entire labor force of the Philippines.

In the past several years, in meeting claims for death, old-age and illness benefits, the Social Security System has paid P250 million. Now, we are studying the possibility of social security, or insurance against unemployment. If these studies indicate a financial capability of the Social System to pay for unemployment, I shall immediately direct that unemployment be taken under the wing of the Social Security System of the Philippines.

I repeat, you and I are faced by the dilemma of growth. This dilemma is the choice between development and welfare. We all want to grow, we all want to progress. Economic development is a means by which we must progress. But economic development, I repeat, does not mean the adoption of mere technology, without humanity and without compassion. On the contrary, all efforts of man must be aimed at human welfare and this means compassion. It is therefore time for us to tame technology, tame the machines and utilize our manpower in such a way that we shall not only develop our economic system but develop a manpower that is alert, effective and certainly humane members of the human society.

This, then, is the new mission that you and I have. I repeat, we create our respective societies. However much you and I may differ in the approaches, in our ideologies sometimes, ultimately and at last, your aim and mine is the upliftment of all of humanity. But we must start. With our own peoples, and our own race. I shall start with mine. You start with yours. But in so attempting to solve our own national problems, you and I must gather in consultation, at conferences like this; and gathering, seek to establish a basis for such consultations in order that you and I may unite to attain this new dimension in our societies and in our efforts to honor the human factor in economic development.

I am certain that all the peoples of Asia look towards you, and perhaps all the peoples of the world will look towards you. I repeat, in the improvement of the living conditions of the laboring, teeming millions of Asia lies the peace of the world, and let no man in any manner mistake this as a presumption, or imposition upon any of the leaders of the world today. It is a statement of fact, which has been accepted by all thinkers and observers. With the teeming millions lies the key to peace, in the long run, of our world; and upon you lies the burden of establishing not only the confidence but also the effectiveness of the labor system in our respective societies.

So, I must say that if this be so—that ultimately the establishment of peace in the world lies on your shoulders, it is, indeed, a heavy burden for every minister of labor to carry. But I am sure that on your shoulders this burden will prove to be very light.

THE RETURN OF ECONOMIC CONFIDENCE AND ACHIEVEMENT

It is an experience to come face-to-face with the human aspect of the Philippine economy. I see before me a consortium of all the business interests in the country today. Among all of you, officers and members of your organizations, the four great and influential organizations that have to do with trade, banking, industry and agriculture, you personify, through a diversity of points of view, alliances, and interests, the vitality of our economic system. This occasion, therefore, serves to remind us that competition is one of the cornerstones of our economic system, and that radical differences, both in thinking and practice, are signs of economic health. As President of the Republic, I sometimes find myself presiding over the resolution of these differences, balancing factions, factors, and forces, in the light of what experience, judgment, and perception regard as the national interest. This has not always been an easy or pleasant task, but I believe you will agree with me that it is a necessary one. Without the exercise of economic statesmanship on the part of government, the freedom of economic enterprise that we cherish so much may well flounder through anarchy. There cannot be freedom without order; the fact that we speak of an economic system implies that we recognize a principle of order.

PRINCIPAL TASK OF ADMINISTRATION

This administration, upon its assumption to office eleven months ago, immediately recognized that its premier task was to restore order, not only in government but also in the economy. Expressed in another way, we understood that the people's confidence in government depended in large measure on the capacity of its leadership for rational decision. As I told a similar audience six months ago when I discussed the government's proposals on industrial protection, economic policy was never well-defined in the past, and if there had been any definition at all, it was inefficiently directed. The importance, therefore, of reason and sanity in government policy-making cannot be overly emphasized, for this capacity reflects its sense of justice, and what is more vital, its grasp of the problems that beset the nation.

I do not have to add that the survival of economic enterprise depends to a large extent on the rationalization of government. And that however open and free our economic system may be and could still hope to be, it can only operate effectively with a government that knows its mind.

THE CRISIS SURMOUNTED

When I took over at the beginning of this year, the feeling that pervaded the business community was one of gloom and despondency. Some business firms had already closed shop; others were in distress; while still others were in a state of suspended animation.

The international reserves of the country were at rock bottom.

The upkeep of the government machinery was on a day-to-day basis. All that while the government was subsisting on borrowings from Central Bank funds because government revenues have dipped alarmingly as a result of unabated smuggling and the uncontrolled corruption and pilferages in the Bureau of Customs.

Today I feel I can be privileged to state here that in a period of less than a year we have decisively reversed the dangerous downward trend. And now we are accelerating our movement.

I shall not make a catalogue of the economic ills that aggravated the national crisis eleven months ago. You all know them from hard personal experience. Your own business might have been one of those threatened with extinction. I will only say, as a preliminary observation, that the crisis has been surmounted. There are two reasons for this. Firstly, there is the generosity of the Filipino people themselves in wishing well, and cooperating with, every new administration. Secondly, there is the administration's resolution to stand by its commitments to the Filipino people. In a moment, I shall elaborate on this resolution in so far as it affects the Philippine economy.

But I must say in all candor that the crisis we surmounted in the last eleven months should be considered in the light of our continuing vicissitudes as a developing nation. We surmounted a crisis brought about by past mismanagement; on the other hand, the crisis of development remains.

To generalize, our businessmen and industrialists have been most favored in the first year of this administration. The anti-smuggling drive, the refinancing of distressed industries, the clean-up in the Bureau of Customs and the Bureau of Internal Revenue—which is a continuing process, and the maintenance of monetary stability by way of fiscal restraint in government, alongside with the relaxation of credit, have given new life to moribund industries as they have, on the other hand, expanded the horizon of thriving industries. The best proof, I think, is that textile factories are now operating twenty-four hours a day when before they used to run only three times a week on a single shift of eight hours a day. Moreover, there is an undeniable atmosphere of confidence in the business community, which is all the more reassuring considering the feeling of desperation and near-panic in some sectors of the economy eleven months ago.

Let me consider the measures I cited in some detail.

ANTI-SMUGGLING DRIVE

At that time, in my inaugural address, I called for a hard campaign against smuggling. What, then, has been done in this area?

Early in the year, the department of finance started its campaign against all forms of smuggling, principally against technical smuggling in the port of Manila and other ports, and the smuggling of “blue seal” cigarettes from Borneo and Sabah. This was done in cooperation with elements from the Armed Forces of the Philippines. Moreover, three entities were organized to support the anti-smuggling drive. These were the Anti-Smuggling Action Center, or the ASAC, and the Claims, Adjudication and Disposal Administration, or the CADA. The function of the CADA is to centralize the disposition of seized, confiscated and abandoned goods and to expedite the payment of rewards to informers. Finally, there is the action group, under the Office of Secretary Eduardo Romualdez, which has recommended to the Commissioner of Customs the collection of deficiency customs duties and taxes totalling more than a million pesos on undervalued importations. The action group has organized an intelligence network in sensitive ports abroad.

The CADA has sold more smuggled goods this year than all the four years of the previous administration. From April 1 to November 29, 1966, an eight-month period, it realized nearly P11 million through public auctions and negotiated sales of disposable goods.

The ASAC reported that from June to October this year alone, P116 million worth of smuggled goods, coins, and cigarettes have been confiscated. I think it is safe to say that the government has been able to secure that much in market volume for domestic manufacturers of cigarettes, textile, radios, and other appliances.

Certainly, the industries that were hurt most by smuggling were the major beneficiaries of the anti-smuggling drive.

On the other hand, we have prosecuted and are still prosecuting big-time smugglers, as anyone can see from the report of the department of justice. In our cities, 259 cases are pending trial while 60 others are either under investigation, pending decision, convicted, or pending pre-investigation, the cases amounting to a total of 319. In the provinces, there are 201 cases, 149 of which are pending trial.

I want to take this opportunity to express my sincere admiration for the cooperation of the courts in the anti-smuggling drive. All the courts and the government prosecutors, in response to our appeals, have given preferential attention to smuggling cases. I am particularly reassured by the recent decision of the Court of First Instance of Batangas convicting six smugglers of blue-seal cigarettes with an appraised value of P213,388.76 and imposing a heavy penalty of ten years imprisonment and a fine of P3,000.00 for each of them. The accused in this case were apprehended on September 10, 1966; the information was filed with the court on September 14; the case was submitted for decision on November 11; and the decision was promulgated on November 29, 1966, or in less than two months and a half from the filing of the case.

Similar convictions have been obtained in the Courts of First Instance of Manila and Antique. Decisive action has led to the forfeiture of smuggled goods aggregating half a million pesos in value on board the SS Argo the seizure proceedings have been instituted for the confiscation not only of the goods but of the ship itself and other watercraft. A SAL plane that landed blue seal cigarettes in Quezon province has already been forfeited by the port collector. These few cases will suffice for illustration.

But I think far more reassuring than all these punitive actions is the new sense of self-esteem that has been evoked in the citizenry by the anti-smuggling campaign. For the first time, a citizen is made to feel remorse over smoking smuggled cigarettes—the odium of such an offense against the national community has become clear and unmistakable. This is heartening for the future of our democracy, for only a citizenry with a high level of civic responsibility can operate successfully a democratic type of government. This is a historically verifiable fact. Before I took over the administration, the smoking of blue seal cigarettes was a status symbol. Now each and every man goes out of his way so that he is smoking cigarettes with the proper seal paying taxes to the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

MONETARY AND FISCAL RESTRAINT

The increase in revenue collections, however has not encouraged the administration to abandon its fiscal discipline. As a matter of fact, government borrowings from the Central Bank have been reduced and rationalized. For this year this administration's net borrowings amounted to only P90 million. Compare this to the P320 million borrowed for the same period last year. Moreover, the National Treasury, from February 16 to July 26 has paid the Central Bank a total of P250 million representing its used over-draft line. It should be noted that this payment was made from the cash receipts of the National Treasury and not by immediately opening a new overdraft line, as had been the practice in the past.

From here on, inflationary borrowings for the current expenditures of the National Government will be minimized and will only be resorted to when there are pressing demands for the financing of productive investment projects. To this end, the sum of P30 million was borrowed to finance priority irrigation projects.

Unlike before, the National Government does not compete with the private sector for credit.

CREDIT AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

The National Government, far from competing with private enterprise, has instead taken positive steps of assistance. This year, the Development Bank has implemented this administration's program of rehabilitating distressed industries. I think you will agree that this swift and decisive yet well-considered solution to the crisis of business can be regarded as a compliment to Filipino imagination and sophistication in economic management.

Through conventional and security financing method, 1,354 agricultural and industrial enterprises have received P255.2 million. Of this figure, P53.5 million represents investments in seven temporarily distressed but basically viable industries. Seven other similar cases involving P85.5 million are now under study.

The support for the refinancing program comes from the DBP public offering of P100 million worth of progress bonds. That in over a month's time, P97 million worth of bonds have been sold in Manila and the provinces should demonstrate to everyone the confidence of our people in the economic leadership of the National Government.

There is the reduction by the Central Bank of legal reserve requirements for banks by altogether lifting the reserve requirements on special time deposits and increasing the rediscount ceiling of commercial banks. These measures alone can increase commercial bank reserves by P687.5 million.

The immediate effect of these measures is to release the former stranglehold on credit, and to expand money supply by the approximate annual rate of 11 per cent. By year's end we expect the money supply to increase to the level of P3.404 billion.

Finally, the Department of Finance has launched the treasury bills program in order to establish a private market for government securities and to develop a source of non-inflationary borrowings for the National Government. Response from your sector has been favorable. The sale of the bills at a discount through the establishment of a competitive rate thus assures ready funds available for the government during seasonal lags in revenue collections. Above all, it proves an efficient instrument for monetary authorities in regulating the rate of money creation through open market operations.

CREDIT PRIORITIES

I believe you will agree that the government's financial policies are much clearer and better defined today. This is readily apparent from the clarity of the priorities that have been laid down to guide the direction of the government's investible funds.

We must admit the fact that government financial institutions have developed into significant instruments of capital formation for our economy. In a capital-starved economy, the scarce resources available must be husbanded carefully so as to yield the maximum benefit for the people. You know as well as I do that the uses of such investible funds in the past had been determined more by political expediency than the hard consideration of the public interest. Up to this moment, the government continues to feel the unwanted burden of P410 million in losses incurred by the RCA, the NAMARCO and the NA-WASA during the previous administration. This represents their combined obligation to the PNB, a veritable millstone which will drag the feet of our economic progress in the next ten years.

My concern today is to allocate such funds to economic undertakings that are deemed to be of strategic importance in our economic development. As a part of the renewed emphasis on the development of our rural areas, we are allocating highest priorities to the Agricultural and Food-Processing Industries. This program has a direct bearing on our national self-sufficiency in food, which is an overriding, historic challenge to our national self-esteem.

AGRICULTURE AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

Of course many decisions and measures taken by the government, though crucial for the whole nation, seem peripheral to, or remote from your places of business and your vital interests as businessmen. Actually these decisions shape the social climate in which business must succeed or fail.

In this class of decisions are the measures so far taken by the government to stimulate agriculture and bring about Land Reform and Community development. In the long run the success of these undertakings will be as crucial for industry as for the nation itself. There can be no prosperous industry based on a weak or stagnant agriculture.

In the field of community development, whose ultimate aim is to build up habits of self-reliance in the barrios, I am glad to note that in the ten-month period this year, 18,471 purely self-help projects have been generated and completed. The record for Fiscal Year 1964-1965 was only 9,214.

We have achieved spectacular results in agricultural research. From the white ivory towers of science we have brought the exciting discoveries to the muds of the rice fields. The IRRI miracle rice, which produces six to seven times more than the ordinary rice seeds, is now in seedling farms for ultimate distribution by the end of this Fiscal Year to every farmer who wants it.

Due to price support program, we have produced this year a huge surplus of corn. There is a clamor to allow its exportation.

Due to the same program rice producers received P4 more for each cavan of rice of the 30 million that are bought and sold in the market. This funnelled a total of P120 million into the agriculture sector.

The increased emphasis on assistance to small farmers is apparent from the fact that in a ten-month period this year, the Agricultural Credit Administration loaned out P17,011,118.00 to the small farmers, compared with P10 million in the preceding year, or an increase of 58 per cent. The increase indicates as well the stepped-up activity in Land Reform in Central Luzon.

LAND REFORM

We have enlarged the application of the Land Reform Law I have declared the second district of Pampanga a Land Reform Area. Our experience in this district will determine the extent and depth of future decisions on Land Reform. However, I note, with satisfaction that the principal goals of Land Reform are being achieved in Pampanga. Before long we might widen the areas of Land Reform in the country.

I will ask you to note that one of the cardinal objectives of the Land Reform Law is to divert idle capital from the land to industry. A medium was required to carry this out, and hence, the Land Bank has been organized and activated. Land Reform then is an essential policy tool as much for social justice as for economic development.

WORK OF THE FOUNDATIONS

One basic weakness of our economy is the inadequacy in infrastructure or the basic foundation—roads and bridges, irrigation, piers, power. Partly to blame for this has been the incredible inefficiency and waste of public works funds. For instance, one study shows that for an expenditure of P500 million, or half a billion pesos, in the previous years, the government had only 70 kilometers of road to show for it. (Figures subject to verification)

I am proud to report before you that in a period of three months alone we have cemented 110 kilometers of national roads more than what was cemented in four years before me. We are moving with might and main in this direction.

We have now harnessed the armed forces for this purpose. While there was only one engineer construction battalion previously, we have seven in being today, with 60 percent of their equipment complete, furnished from our own funds. We shall organize by next year five more engineer construction battalions, equipment from our own funds or from the Military Assistance Program of the United States government. The speed with which the AFP Engineering Battalion finished the concreting of a portion of Highway 54 late this year is a preview of what the Engineer Construction Battalions can accomplish. And the speed at which the Guadalupe Bridge was finished as a contract under administration perhaps and with the help of the Department of Public Works also indicates the speed with which the government projects will be terminated all over the country.

ADMINISTRATIVE REFORMS

We are improving our outmoded government administrative machinery, which was a principal obstacle in the past. We are now updating our Administrative Code. We have evolved a Development Council. We have established a central control system for all on-going development projects, a central communications system and a central equipment center. We have already reorganized the important Bureaus of Customs and Internal Revenue. We are steadily hacking away at governmental red tape. These reforms should exert a salutary effect on the government's relations with business and the general public.

STABILIZATION MEASURES

Finally, we have established and strengthened the peso. The Central Bank has been able to reduce its rates from P3.905 (buying) and P3.913 (selling) during mid-December last year to P3.895 (buying) and P3.90 (selling) at the end of October 1966.

However a recent drop from $200 million in August to $171 million at the end of November in our international reserves has been noted. This has been caused, as already explained the other day by the Secretary of Finance, partly by seasonal factors and partly by the repayments for dollar loans used to finance rice importations in previous years in the amount of $7.4 million. It is also partially traceable to the payment of Philippine Government subscriptions to the International Monetary Fund and the Asian Development Bank in the amount of $10.5 million as well as repayments on drawing from the IMF of $1.2 million. What is significant however is the fact that we are expecting from veterans claims and from war damage payments additional resources.

And the downward slide has been reversed this month. Thus the Central Bank's portion of the reserves which stood at $162 million out of the total combined reserves of $171 million at the end of November has risen in two weeks by $7 million to $169 million.

Over-all, the country's international transactions for the first eight months of this year have brought a surplus of around P111 million compared with P45 million for the same period last year. It's all in your books, I am sure.

FOREIGN TRADE

In this connection, I would like to report that the unfavorable trade balance in previous year's has been reversed. The total value of our foreign trade has increased from $1,575 million in 1965 to more than $1,685 million at year's end, representing an increase of 7 per cent. An increase of 14 per cent in the value of our exports and only 1 per cent in the value of our imports account for this significant expansion in our foreign trade. At the close of this year, we expect the balance to register $55 million in our favor as against an unfavorable balance of $40 million last year.

During the year, we also concluded two trade agreements, one with the Benelux countries and another with Indonesia. Several Filipino entrepreneurs are now in Indonesia, engaged in establishing joint business ventures with their Indonesian counterparts.

We have sent trade missions to Europe and Asia and received foreign trade missions from Italy, the United States, Japan, Korea, Pakistan, Indonesia and Thailand thus facilitating and expanding contacts between foreign and local businessmen.

PROTECTION TO FILIPINO INDUSTRIES

Finally, this administration has extended specific protection to Filipino business enterprise. Since early this year, the Department of Finance has taken steps to protect local basic industries faced with unfair competition from imported goods through dumping or otherwise irregular import practices. In five separate decisions, the Department of Finance imposed anti-dumping duties on undervalued imported flour, polyvinyl chloride resins, and caustic soda.

The textile industry is now protected from unfair competition through stricter control measures, firstly, through the enforcement of revised valuation on imported remnants, used clothing and impregnated fabrics of US origin, and, secondly, through measures calculated to prevent diversion of imported embroidery and garment raw materials by tighter control of the operations of Embroidery firms by the Embroidery and Apparel Control and Inspection Board.

We have also cracked down on industries enjoying simultaneous tax exemptions under the new and Necessary Industry Law (R.A. 901) and the Basic Industries Act (R.A.3127)

This protective mantle of government includes, of course, the cottage industry, whose development we have tried to intensify.

Arrangement has been made for the entry, duty-free, of Philippine traditional cottage industry products into Australia

Through an agreement with Japan, a technological and development center, specializing on cottage industry has been set up with Japan providing P500,000 worth of machinery and equipment. At the same time, an institute for small-scale industries has been established at the University of the Philippines under an agreement with the Netherlands. Both the center and the institute will provide training for Filipino producers and executive in the cottage industry.

FOREIGN INVESTMENTS

This brief account of how the Philippine economy is going and what this administration has done for private enterprise necessarily raises certain searching questions about the future.

The President of the Philippine Chamber of Commerce has called attention to the two principal problems which must be solved within the next few months or within the next few years. These are our relations with Japan, especially reparations, and loans under reparations and also trade agreements that will take the place of the Laurel-Langley Agreement.

You will remember that a committee is now working in Japan, a commission that is represented right now by Ambassador Jose Laurel, III. A Philippine panel has gone to Japan but action on certain questions has been deferred in view of the political situation in that country at the time.

At the same time, in accordance with the communique arrived at between the Philippine and American presidents, we are to organize a Phil-American Commission before the end of June, 1967. This Commission will study the trade agreement that will take the place of the Laurel-Langley Agreement.

It is quite apparent, therefore, that within the next few months, we must make very difficult decisions. In making these decisions, I will as usual rely on you and your organizations.

I believe you are with me when I claim that we have managed to extricate the nation from the lethargy and near chaos of previous years.

To take one singular example, while the supply of credit is expected to increase, it must still be complemented by an increasing amount of capital for investment requirements. The four-year economic development program projects the total required investments for the next four years at P20.3 billion, a rather large amount for a developing economy like ours. An investment gap, therefore, of F3.2 billion is expected, and must be covered by financial sources other than domestic.

It is unquestionable that foreign investment is necessary and even a critical factor in economic growth. It cannot be shrugged away by wishful thinking about our ability to finance our developmental requirements.

But in seeking foreign investments, let me say this now, clearly and firmly- We are now going to sacrifice the well-being of future generations of Filipinos for the undeniable benefits of foreign investments at this stage of our economic history. We do need foreign investments, but we need them as partners, partners enjoying certain guarantees and incentives consistent with our national economic interests and national dignity.

GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS

So much for what government has done and is doing for business. What, may I ask, has business done for government? The time has come for all of us to confront this crucial question. There was a time when you could say in all sincerity that the business of business is business, but in the modern world, government is everybody's business.

Let me say here and now that private enterprise is not only the economic concomitant of our political system; it is intrinsic in our culture. Private enterprise, to the popular mind, stands in shining contrast with the experienced inefficiency and corruption of government. Many a politician has achieved success on the promise (sometimes fulfilled) of running the government as efficiently and as honestly as a private corporation. I believe that this is due to the initiative, enterprise, and dynamism of our great entrepreneurs. It is a rich heritage.

However, I begin to fear that this reputation of business is becoming a useful myth, at best a weapon for coercing government in yielding to the demands of the profit motive. For like all sacrosanct principles, the freedom of enterprise based on the profit motive can be abused to the extent of disgracing the very principle itself.

Certainly, the wanton denudation of our forest, the corruption of government officialdom either through acquiescence or initiative in graft to be ahead of competition, the hoarding of goods and the manipulation of prices, are perversions of the legitimate pursuit of profit. I do not claim any originality for this observation, for I remember it was a prominent businessman himself, one of your peers who denounced sometime ago what he called "the economic underground." The painful thing is that this underground operates on the surface of our national life, respectably.

It does not only engage in dubious business practices; it also deals unfairly with labor. It has infected the business community to the extent that the illegitimate has become legitimate, the immoral moral.

TAXES FOR THE POOR

Let us take a specific area: taxes. It is alarming, if it not ridiculous, that there are actually certain businessmen who believe that free enterprise includes the freedom not to pay taxes to the government. I do not think that the majority of our businessmen seriously accepts this as an article of faith, but there are those among them who behave as if they do.

I said at the opening of my speech that I was face-to-face with the human aspect of the Philippine economy. I purposely left out, for the duration, the vital sector not strictly represented here: the Filipino masses. They are the ones who shoulder the burden of taxation, paying taxes to the government in innumerable ways.

I am, by virtue of their mandate, also their representative here, and I appeal to you to exert your personal influence and institutional power to balance private gain with the public interest. While there are still alternatives, I ask you to reassess your purposes and review your obligations to the society in which you thrive. Your organizations are expressly dedicated to uphold the highest ethical standards in business; this shows that you are cognizant of your social and national responsibilities.

Let an entire nation witness the deeds promised by the ideals.

Lest there be any misunderstanding. I want to make it clear that I intend no distinction between businessmen and industrialists, on the one hand, and the Filipino people, on the other. The very measures taken by this administration to protect private business and to promote business enterprise should preclude any misunderstanding.

But when the well-being of private business does not reflect on the living conditions of the masses, either through dubious practice or through unresponsiveness towards its obligations ,to the national government and finally to the national community, then private business will constitute a class separate and apart from the people. If that should come to pass, we shall lose not only our economic freedom but those very freedoms we have abused in our ruthless pursuit of gain.

A NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

The building of a nation demands not only the imagination and direction of leadership but the enthusiastic support of all. No leadership can protect the interests of the few without incurring the resentment of the many. Those who thrive in our free society have an obligation to keep it free and progressive through the diligent exercise of their responsibilities.

You and I know that political and economic power in our democracy depends on popular support. They stand on the vast shoulders of the people, and there they shall remain for as long as the people recognize their legitimacy. But this legitimacy is conditional: its beneficiaries must promote the welfare of all.

THE BUSINESSMAN AND THE NATION CLAIMS UPON HIM

I believe that, relying on your own characters or bylaws, which emphasize your positive obligations to the national community, you can convince the nation of your capacity to raise your own standards of responsibility and responsiveness to national problems. The chief virtue presumed of such trade groups as yours, in fact, is that you voluntarily take up the burden of policing your ranks and raising your standards of usefulness and service to the community.

What your respective characters fail to state is that at this stage of our national development, you, as leaders of Philippine business and industry, including agriculture, are in the role of trustees not only of your own business interests but also of the public interest. This relationship with the public interest is clear in the fact that our government has habitually exercised the sovereignty of the people in behalf of Filipino businessmen. This is the implication of our retail trade nationalization law and similar laws. That a special reciprocal obligation exists on the part of business towards the people cannot be doubted.

In the light of such reciprocity, when Filipino businessmen commit such economic crimes as hoarding and profiteering against their own people, they must surely be engaged in a form of treason. This, at least, cannot be said of alien businessmen, for their allegiance to the Philippine flag cannot be presumed. I am tempted to say that when Filipino businessmen, quick to invoke the use of national sovereignty in their behalf, withhold taxes due to the people, they are similarly exposing themselves to the charge of betraying their own country.

THE BUSINESSMAN AS PATRIOT

These are harsh words, but I think in saying them we help clear the air. The Filipino businessman in the eyes of the Filipino people is not only one engaged in profit-making, but also a kind of surrogate for the whole race in the” task of demonstrating our national competence in business and industry. It is as such that the role of businessman is so much admired and respected in our country today, to a degree unmatched in any other country in Asia with the possible exception of Japan. The Filipino businessman is deemed to engage in a patriotic mission as well as business for profit: he is a symbol of the struggle for our economic independence. He represents our groping for the ability and competence we need to face and master the complexities of modern life.

In fairness to the Filipino businessman, he has, as a whole, proven himself worthy of this historic role. The speed and resolution with which we confronted the crisis of the economy during the past eleven months, and overcame it, is a compliment not so much to the government as to the collective competence of our Filipino management talent. For the government’s policies are to a large extent drawn from the counsels of your own respective organizations, and must reflect, in the end, the level of sophistication and competence of our own Filipino business community.

The resolution of the economic crisis and the experience of the past eleven months as a whole show that we can, if we set our minds to it, achieve results normally deemed beyond the capacity of the nation to attain. This experience of competence has enriched the national self-esteem. It also has enhanced the image of the Filipino abroad before all men of goodwill. These initial results cannot but hearten us. I think that working together, you and your government can surpass our own joint record in the new year now before us. I ask your cooperation not only with the government but also with the Filipino people.

Speech of President Marcos on the Inauguration of Asian Development Bank, December 19, 1966

His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
On the Inauguration of Asian Development Bank

[Delivered in Makati, Rizal, December 19, 1966]

THE ADB: CORNERSTONE OF A NEW LIFE IN ASIA

The Filipino people are proud to share with you on our native soil this historic moment in the life of modern Asia. The inauguration of the Asian Development Bank will surely be remembered as one of the most auspicious events in the history of the region. None can doubt its relevance to the mighty stirring towards a new life of progress and dignity in this oldest of continents. And I shall add that this event is auspicious not only for the people of Asia, but also for the peace of the world.

For the Philippines, the creation of the Asian Development Bank is specially significant. The choice of the Philippines as the permanent site of the bank enhanced the national prestige. It is a recognition of the stability of our political structure, the soundness of our social and economic institutions and the ability of our people.

We take pride in having played an important role in the organization of the bank, and in having been chosen as the host country for its offices. Our pride must be tempered, however, with the awareness that our participation, and the honor and recognition accorded our country carries with it certain responsibilities. We shall meet these responsibilities.

AN INSPIRED VISION COME TRUE

The opening of the ADB proves that the forces working for cooperation and fraternity between nations should never be underestimated. The ADB only yesterday was but an inspired vision. Today, we are inaugurating the bank. We are giving the world the first concrete manifestation of regional economic cooperation in Asia.

That such can already be done in the world's vastest and least homogenous—region, compliments the maturity and open-mindedness of the Asian nations. But it is also a tribute to the perfectibility of human cooperation in general, in spite of the vast differences that separate us culturally and politically.

COMMITMENT AGAINST POVERTY, IGNORANCE AND DISEASE

But even with their prophetic insights none of the Asian visionaries could foretell that in a few decades this great regional project—the Asian Development Bank could already materialize. We also know that the obligation of developed nations to help the less developed nations in 'their own development is a relatively new and revolutionary idea in history.

We know, however, the proximate causes of the success of this great idea of the ADB. We know the ADB could rise today only because the ground had been well prepared for it during the past 18 years of the life of the ECAFE. This Commission of the United Nations brought together Asian governments closer to each other than anything had done before. In this regard, we are obliged to cite Mr. U Nyun, secretary general of the ECAFE, who has probably done as much as any other man to bring forth the Asian Development Bank.

This day marks the beginning of a new era in the solidarity of the region. The interest and participation in this new institution of countries outside the ECAFE region is an indubitable proof of the vision and statemanship of leading countries outside this continent.

The list of member countries suggests that the Asian Development Bank is not a mere regional bank that its name might imply. Its membership, covering 19 countries within the ECAFE region and 12-non-regional ones, in fact constitutes the biggest difference from other similar organizations. (They are Afghanistan, Australia, Cambodia, Ceylon, Nationalist China, India, Iran, Japan, Korea, Laos, Malaysia, Nepal, New Zealand, Pakistan, The Philippines, Singapore, South Vietnam, Thailand and West Samoa. The non-regional member countries are Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, West Germany, Italy, The Netherlands, Norway, United Kingdom, United States and Sweden.) The mobilization of outside capital for development of Asian economy makes the Bank a unique institution. It may not be inappropriate, therefore, as someone has suggested, to call it a sort of "World Bank for Asia."

Asia with more than half the world population and a steady trend of population growth is at the very center of the world crisis. While the crisis has various visible manifestations, what causes the most concern is the failure of agriculture to satisfy human needs. Looking ahead, the race between agricultural output and population is assuming formidable dimensions.

We Asians are, therefore, particularly happy about the keen interest shown by the countries outside the ECAFE region to help "foster economic growth and cooperation in the region, of Asia and the Far East and contribute to the acceleration of the process of economic development of the developing countries in the region."

Allow me to congratulate the members of the board of directors. Cornelio Balmaceda (Philippines), Byung Kyu Chim (Korea), Masaru Fukuda (Japan), J. M. Garland (Australia), Ng Kam Poh (Malaysia), P.V.R. Rao (India), Khouw Bian Tie (Indonesia), Helmut Abramowski (West Germany), W. K. Wardroper (Canada), and Bernard Zagorin (United States).

At this juncture, I should like to congratulate the Board of Governors of the Asian Development Bank for taking a very wise, healthy and practical step in inviting other members and associate members of ECAFE and other non-regional developed countries which are members of the United Nations or any of its specialized agencies, that have not yet joined the bank, to join it.

I am aware that the Bank will, at this initial stage of its existence, have to face and solve some difficult problems, such as the formulation of policies concerning loans, investment, guarantees and other related problems, not to mention the problems of administration and appointing the right people to the right positions and getting them from as many member countries as possible.

I have no doubt in my mind that these problems will be solved in no time. The Board of Governors did well in entrusting the management of the bank to Mr. Takeshi Watanabe. His qualifications, background and experience eminently fit him for his new position.

What will make the burden of Mr. Watanabe lighter is the fact that he has a board composed of knowledgeable men and experts in their own fields.

I have great hopes that the bank will be a most powerful influence in stimulating economic and social development in this region. But the most important efforts in this direction must come, not from outside the region but from within. Progress is not merely a matter of advice and encouragement or external aid. Real progress can only result from actions within the boundaries of Asia herself, and it is for us Asians to work together for our common good.

POTENTIAL COMPLEMENTARITIES

To pool together our resources for development is undoubtedly a great act of maturity and wisdom. This is not only because most Asian countries lack the capital and the means of development. We also recognize the potential complementarities in our different development programs which can be approached so as to lessen costs and increase the benefits available to the nations concerned.

One of the major functions of the Asian Development Bank is to serve as a medium for bringing over investments from the highly developed countries to the developing countries of the region. In the case of the Philippines, alone, we have projected our need for foreign investments at more than P3.5 billion over the next three years of a four-year program period.

The bank will also help redress the imbalance in foreign exchange prevailing in most Asian countries estimated at from 600 million to one billion dollars. This is the foreign exchange gap involved in economic modernization and the raising of productivity.

MANAGEMENT COMPETENCE

Because it will be mainly managed by Asians, and staffed by Asian experts, the ADB would be to orient itself to the peculiar needs and requirements of the Asian countries. It will help prepare technical studies and proposals for loans among the member countries or governments. I can see a salutary effect arising from this. There will be pressure on member governments to scrutinize more closely and rigorously their own development projects to qualify for assistance, and therefore to raise the level of their own planning and management competence.

But I believe that in the long run the most lasting effect of this bank would be moral, in the sense that it would help spark in all member countries a new spirit of change—of being able to alter their own environments to make them serve the aims of a better and fuller life in dignity and freedom. And it is in this sense that the Asian Development Bank in the end enters the confluence of patriotic ideas associated with the great humanitarian heroes of Asia.

REGIONAL COOPERATION: A NECESSITY

We must at last face the truth that there is no choice for our countries except to cooperate. The World Bank has given Southeast Asia only 5.3 per cent of all loans. The per capita loans from the World Bank on a regional basis are $2.80 to Asia, $3.04 to Africa and $4.20 to Europe. The per capital foreign aid to Southeast Asia is only $2.50 while it is $5.90 to Africa and $5 to Latin America.

The economic development of the Western Nations of Japan took place under different historical conditions when capitalism was in its primitive and notorious stage and completely indifferent to the human wreckage that it left in its wake. Today, most of our countries, irrespective of our stages of development and political beliefs, are signatories to covenants and conventions under the United Nations which bind us to accord to workers the freedom of organization and collective bargaining and the protection of various labor laws. As I have told the Asian Labor Ministers Conference just ended in Manila, the Asian Nations today are in the position of being required to wage an industrial revolution without exploitation, no nation today is permitted to suspend human rights in deference to an urgent period of economic development. The dilemma of modern development in Asia is that it must be pursued hand in hand with the welfare of the poorest people. Implied in this is the renunciation of drastic methods of capital accumulation and formation which served the Western Industrial Revolution so well. Because of this, the Asian countries must turn to each other and to the developed countries of the West for the additional capital they need for their development. Cooperation, therefore, is no longer optional, when one thinks in broad terms, but a necessity imposed upon our countries by the common objective of development.

SURPASSING THE LIMITS OF PEACE

The recognition of this necessity is an act of maturity and wisdom. And I am glad that the non-regional members of the ADB, representing the developed West, are also taking part in this undertaking, ready to share with Asia the experience and the capacities that are the sources of their own development. It is my fond hope that other ECAFE countries such as the Soviet Union will now come into the bank, or at least participate in the development of Asia through the special fund of the bank.

This event is a hopeful sign that once the energies of nations are directed towards peace and progress, the old narrow limits of possible attainment are soon surpassed. The inauguration of the ADB should boost the morale of all who believe in world peace and brotherhood.

Considering that the tensions in Asia remain the gravest menace to world peace, the opening of this great bank directed to the deepest causes of such tensions—mass poverty, ignorance and disease, becomes all the more encouraging and reassuring for mankind.

In conclusion, may I say to the men behind this bank; congratulations and best wishes as you go forth on your historic mission of building a better life for the peoples of Asia.

Speech of President Marcos on Loyalty Day, December 21, 1966, December 21, 1966

EXTEMPORANEOUS SPEECH OF PRESIDENT FERDINAND E. MARCOS AT LOYALTY DAY AT CAMP AGUINALDO QUEZON CITY, DECEMBER 21, 1966

Secretary Arellano,
Gen. Mata,
Speaker Protempore Pendatun,
Secretary Syquiao,
Distinguished Guests,
Your excellencies of the diplomatic corps,
Officers and men and civilian employees of the Armed Forces of the Philippines,
My countrymen:

Today is the 31st anniversary of the Armed Forces of the Philippines. On this day, you and I are called upon to renew our pledge of loyalty to the Constitution and to the Republic. We pledge a constancy and fidelity to our nation and promise to place at the disposal of the humblest citizen the might of the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

On this day, I must express to you my pride in the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

Let us go back to what the Armed Forces of the Philippines had degenerated to sometime ago, not only was there fraternization with the enemies of the state such as the communist and the smuggler, there was actual partnership with them. There was demoralization in the ranks. The armed forces personnel who were supposedly engaged in destroying those who sought to destroy the republic were actually engaged in strengthening these enemies. The Armed Forces of the Philippines that was supposed to block all efforts in the corruption of our people and the destruction of their integrity were the weapons and tools for these harmful objectives. There came a time when there were, beyond these stories, reports circulated all over the Philippines that there were elements in our armed forces that were ready to take over the government of the Republic of the Philippines. From these depths, the Armed Forces of the Philippines recovered itself, stood up, upright and dignified.

Today, the Armed Forces of the Philippines has established the highest kind of efficiency, performance, and professionalism it has ever known in its entire career.

I need not go into these details. But as every citizen of the Republic now stands up boldly and forthrightly criticizes even you who must guard the citizen's right of free speech, there is manifested indeed the attainment by you of the objectives for which we have fought.

And now, with many citizens seeking to establish industries, factories, or other sources of income and agricultural pursuits even in Huk infested areas, it is further demonstrated that your performance of duty has been above average.

From the lonely outposts of Sibutu and Sitangkay in the South, to Batanes in the North, the Armed Forces of the Philippines' soldier has demonstrated his competence and patriotism. And now in the fields of South Vietnam, the Filipino soldier has presented an image of which we can be proud.

The Filipino soldier is a soldier of peace. He is a soldier that does not seek to destroy or kill. He is a soldier that seeks to rehabilitate and reconstruct. The Filipino soldier is the envy of all officials and employees of the government, not because of special favors given him, but because of achievements attained in passionate anonymity.

Was it not only a few weeks ago when the question was raised: Why is it that it is only now that the Filipino soldier has been utilized to build roads, raise schoolhouses, improve irrigation systems? When the cementing of Epifanio de los Santos avenue was finished in a matter of a few days by AFP elements, the work became a symbol of the efficiency and the high standard of action of the military. You have raised a challenge to each and every official and employee of the government of the Republic of the Philippines, a challenge that each and every employee and official seeks to meet.

When the soldiers who were supposedly demoralized, inefficient and corrupt in the central plains of Luzon, sought out and destroyed the Hukbalahaps that sought to wreck our democratic institutions, again the question was asked: Why were not our soldiers committed to action before this?

And the answer is because before this, the policy that directed and motivated the armed forces was questionable. Now, that these policies which you yourself recommended have been reassessed and a new line of action reestablished, you have, first of all, started a cleansing of your own ranks. Your board of generals recommended these elimination actions. Fortnightly, your own men and officers adopted these recommendations and I gave these my clearance.

No man has been recommended to the position of general without the approval of the board of generals of the Armed Forces of the Philippines. No man is being recommended for promotion without passing through the screening board. No man is awarded or commended even by the President of the Republic of the Philippines without the intervention and recommendation of his immediate superiors. The power and prerogatives of command have been reestablished among the officers of the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

While bowing to the superiority and supremacy of civil authority, in accordance with the dictates and command of our constitution, you have been able to maintain the purity and professionalism of the officers and men of the Armed Forces of the Philippines. For this, allow me to extend my own personal congratulations and the congratulations of the people of the Philippines.

For this is not minor achievement. You and I know the obstacles that we have had to fight and are continuing to fight. You and I know the indifference, the inertia, the sloth, the complacency that had infiltrated our own ranks and seemed to overcast the entire nation. We have had to lift not only ourselves, but we have had to lift as well the entire nation with us. And in this task, each and every officer, enlisted man and civilian employee of the Armed Forces of the Philippines must be congratulated. Today, therefore, I have one message to you. And that is, carry on. Carry on and attain the other heights that we have set as our objectives. Our tasks are not yet finished. There are many more obstacles to overcome. There are many rivers that we must cross. There are many beaches that we must take, and there are many forts that we must overwhelm.

I have complete trust and faith in the Filipino officer and the men of the Armed Forces of the Philippines. In you lies the destiny of our country. For it has well been said that you constitute the first mark and symbol of the character of a nation. If the Armed Forces of the Philippines should at any time and any moment become degenerate, then the entire nation and the government degenerates with it.

Stand firm therefore against all importunings that would weaken you, against all temptations that would destroy you and against the insidious infiltration that would destroy and break your ranks.

On my part I can only say that all the powers and prerogatives of the commander-in-chief as the President of the Republic of the Philippines shall be there to support you in your march toward noble achievements.

Message of President Marcos, at the conference with publishers, members of the Board of Censors, other representatives of Mass Media, July 1967

(REMARKS OF PRESIDENT MARCOS AT THE CONFERENCE WITH PUBLISHERS, MEMBERS OF THE BOARD OF CENSORS, OTHER REPRESENTATIVES OF MASS MEDIA)

I THANK you very much for attending this conference. I have seen it necessary to call you because of the fact that the upsurge of crime, characterized by violent and bloody incidents, as well as by the most heinous of crimes, is traceable not only to professional criminals, but also to the younger generation, youths who are still so impressionable, whose moral values are not yet defined, or whose standards are not yet as well established as those of our generation, our age.

You will note that emphasis has been made on responsibility of media which have any thing to do with the dissemination of information. Most important of these, of course, are the newspapers, including the dailies and the weeklies, and such other publications, as the comics. Then, there are the movies, television, and radio, which also reach a mass audience. Ladies and gentlemen, though I have always tried to keep cool under fire, and I might say that this has been noted by many, I have lost my temper in conferences like these. Now, I am greatly concerned with the manner by which the campaign against crime has been conducted by those who would implement the law. The policies are established. You and I know where we are failing. You and I know that we must do something. You and I know that the plans, the policies, the programs have been worked out. They are practical programs, and relevant to present conditions. They are clear, and yet everyday we see violations of these standards of law and order. I will not speak of any specific medium of information. All I would like to say is that you can police yourselves if you want to. May I now ask you to do so?

I do not need to say that, as President, I have certain powers which I can exercise because that would be as if I were talking to children, and I am not talking to children. I am talking to mature men and women who are quite capable of handling this matter without the intervention of the President. That the President should intervene in a situation like this should therefore emphasize the gravity of the problem.

I now identify myself with this crusade, to uplift the standards of morality in the media of mass communications.

Before this, there have been many excuses and apologies to the effect that the law, the rules and regulations do not allow for the use of powers, as for instance the movie censors, to utilize their powers to dissuade producers of movies and of television from exploiting what is malicious, sexual and violent. I do not need to go through the rules and regulations. The rules and regulations are there. The law is very clear. You have adopted as well your own rules and regulations, but which you have not implemented.

Why? Because, perhaps, we are to blame; perhaps you need somebody more powerful to back up your authority, to tell you that the government is dedicated to this particular crusade, and that it will back you to the hilt. Perhaps, you are afraid of damage suits that movie producers may bring against you. Now, I do not think that it is necessary for me to say that you are immune to such damage suits, when you act within the law, and within the rules and regulations. But this I do tell you now—that I will consider it a personal fight, my fight, the President's own cause, if in the exercise of the powers and authority given the movie censors, they should be hurt by any damage suits. I will side with the movie censors, and I will fight to the bitter end anyone who attempts to impose upon you, upon us, the wrong-headed notions of morality.

It is quite clear that the rules and regulations adopted by the movie censors are beyond suspicion or doubts of any kind whatsoever. Official criteria for censorship establish particular rules. Therefore, these norms should be followed. But as a general rule, motion pictures, which a greater number of people see, and speak with extraordinary persuasion, to affect impressionable people, fail in adhering to standards. The more realistic films which appeal, to a greater part, to mature and educated people may be all right for this audience, whose moral values are, in a measure, already fixed.

But motion pictures showing a pattern of human conduct beyond the pale, which reach all classes, including the young who naturally are eager to experience certain things either personally or vicariously for which they are not yet ready, because their standards of morality are still flexible, upward or downward, can be harmful. We are concerned not so much about the materials selected for a story as about the moral treatment of those materials. It is not the theme of a picture that is of major concern but the thesis, not the plot, whether it deals with murder, greed, or lust, but the ethical implications arising from the plot, the action, and the dialogue.

And from there, the criteria go on to say these about objectionable films.

A) Immoral films which serve no other purpose but to satisfy the market for sex; acts of sexual immorality, perversion or lewdness are presented explicitly or implicitly as desirable, acceptable, or as a proper pattern of behavior.

B) Films which show the justification or exaltation of adulterous love, derogation of the institution of marriage. Films which show acts of sexual perversion or lewdness in their entire intent to incite minors to violent, depraved or immoral acts.

C) Films dealing with crime. Films presented in such a way as to glorify criminals or crime, inspiring imitation from potential criminals. Subversive films. Films which on the whole tend to incite rebellion against the state, and involve disloyalty to our political institutions.

D) Films the total effect of which are offensive to any religious institution, in the way they present ministers or priests, for instance, as a comic character. Objectionable scenes off-scene. Scenes which show excessive and lustful kissing, lustful embraces, etc. Scenes which show adulterous and illicit sex acts.

I don't need to go through all these. Brutal killings and excessive cruelty to men, women, children as well as animals are not to be presented in detail. Methods of crimes such as theft, robbery, safe-cracking, dynamiting, and other similar criminal acts, should not be detailed in method. Profit from drugs must not be portrayed.

Other scenes; scenes which tend to create a disrespect for law, constituted authority, unless essential to the plot, should be strictly regulated. Disrespect for the flag, accepted institutions, prominent people, and portrayals contrary to the good customs of the Filipino people such as lack of respect for old folks, irreverence, blasphemy, downgrading love and devotion to family, objectionable advertising, all these are objectionable.

All we need to say, ladies and gentlemen, is that everything that has been prohibited here are being shown in movie theaters and on television today. Everything, but everything, and we are all to blame for this. We cannot face our children. You look at everything that is happening in the Philippines today. Who committed this act of kidnaping and rape, against this actress, Maggie de la Riva? Young kids. I am sure that they learned these techniques from the movies, from television, from the comics perhaps, and they have been emboldened because our society accepts these conditions complacently.

I think it is about time that you and I come together. You are all parents, just as I am. I do not speak only as President of the Philippines. I speak also as a citizen. I think I articulate the sentiments of almost every Filipino right now. If there are those who feel this is not so, that what I feel as a parent is not shared by the majority, then I say they are wrong, and I am willing to take it up properly. I am willing to defend my position in any forum, whether it is before the courts or before the people. But I am sure that you and I are in agreement on this. It is just that we have not set the ground rules, or rather, we had set the ground rules but we have not followed them. Violations of these ground rules have been tolerated.

Now, may I appeal to each and every one of you? May I appeal to the producers? May I appeal to the publishers? May I appeal to the radio commentators to do away now with sex and violence, not necessarily all sex and violence which sometimes are necessary to a plot, but the kind of sex and violence which incites unlawful acts from the younger generation.

May I ask now the movie censors to enforce the standards that they have set and chosen to establish for the movie industry?

I note that the Philippine Press Council has adopted its own standards of morality, and I think it is only proper to call attention to the fact that there is now apparently a new effort on the part of the newspapers to play down crime, and instead emphasize the punishment of crimes. I congratulate the publishers on this, although in the past may I say that the newspapers have not exactly been too cooperative in the war against crime?

I understand that some movie producers have even offered a contract to Santiano. And this was published. Now, what kind of society is this that we are building for our children, for ourselves? We glorify a man, who has been arrested, and charged with killing a woman. And now his name is a by-word because of this publicity. Even children are now familiar with the name. If you doubt me, listen to your own children. Thank God, my children do not read too many newspapers nowadays because they are on vacation, because I would be very unhappy to see my children reading these things in the newspapers.

As for television, did you see the reenactment of this case of Maggie de la Riva? The man in the reenactment was practically nude, and yet this was shown to the public. Now this is something which does not require a board of censors, nor rules and regulations for television producers to follow. This is something which you and I understand.

Now, I ask you, is that the kind of television program that you would want your children, and your wife, and your mother to see?

I am sorry if I raise my voice like this, but I have been under tension ever since all these recent crimes happened. I would like to say that, perhaps, what was lacking was official action. Now, let us therefore agree that from now on we are all on the same side, on the side of the crusade for decency.

May we now agree on this? You are on the side of the crusade for decency, I know. But on whose side are the movie producers? There is a vicious cycle in movies at present. For instance, movie producers say that they will not make money if they do not put in a rape scene or a murder scene. But what happens is that they just speed up the weakening of the morals of our people. Of course, children would want to eat as much candy as they want to, but if you give them nothing but candy, they will merely ruin their health. It is the same thing with morals. With no discipline, children will not grow up into the men and women to whom we can confidently hand over our country and our government. Indeed, the younger generation certainly needs some guidance.

Now, may I ask you to please help in this? It is unfortunate that the President has to participate in such a matter like this, this matter of producing films or clarifying the duties of the Board of Censors. This need to interfere, perhaps, indicates the gravity of the situation. Perhaps this shows that we all must get together now. The parents must get together now. I have no intention of censoring the news media. I have been under attack. I am being criticized by everybody. Yet I had never attempted to do anything against my critics except to say that they should improve the quality of their criticism. That is all and I am certain that anybody is entitled to that.

Now, I am asking you please to improve the quality of the movies, the quality of television shows, the quality of radio commentators. You know that the jokes we sometimes hear on television are not exactly the kind of jokes that you would have your children hear. The television producers say that it is what the public wants. It is what attracts audiences, and so they give this kind of shows to them. The same is true of the jokes of some commentators on radio and TV, but I know good commentators who do not engage in this kind of repartee who do not tell green stories yet they hold their audiences. These jokes may probably be excusable in a men's club, among mature men who understand that this is all a part of the atmosphere in which men gather, and that they do not necessarily affect the character of men, which has already been molded. But such stories certainly affect the character of children.

Therefore, I am asking the Board of Censors to meet with me after this conference. After them, may I talk with the movie producers separately, and also the radio and television commentators? I understand that you have some information that you would like to tell me. If there is such information, please let me know now, because the chiefs of police who are here to confer with me, the chiefs of the NBI, NICA, the PC, who are now organized to fight crime, should be informed as well.

We know that crime is caused not only by the immediate provocations of opportunity and intent, but by the atmosphere itself. Even the economic situation affects peace and order. We know all these, so we have short term and long range plans for fighting crime. The short term plan, of course, involves police action, punishment, proper and speedy justice. We are attending to this now. I assure you that we are utilizing all the facilities at our command. All our resources will be thrown into this campaign. We are now trying to improve the police system. I have asked the metropolitan police to get organized. For want of any personnel that may be considered as capable of dealing with hardened criminals, we have organized a strike force, a strike force that can go anywhere and act quickly to augment local police action. We are now improving the caliber of our police. I am insisting upon the passage of a bill authorizing the retirement of policemen at a younger age. We are releasing about P2 million to standardize upwards the salaries of policemen. In short, your government is doing everything that it is capable of, but it cannot do the job alone. It cannot go on alone.

I beg of you, and I appeal to you, in the name not only of our children but also of the entire Filipino people not only for now but also for in the future. I beg of you, please help us in properly molding the character of our people now. We know and must accept that you are in command of the weapons which can determine the character of our young men and women. Please utilize those instruments for the proper molding of their character.

Yes, I know that the movie industry is a business. You do not go into it for the sake of art, perhaps, but I beg of you to establish a proper balance between business and the future of our country. One need not be considered as more essential than the other. You can have both, I believe, and it is very necessary that we strike a proper balance. The balance had been tilted too much toward sex or violence. Let us achieve a more desirable balance. Please do not wait until the government utilizes its police powers in order to tilt this balance all the way to the other side, because that would be dangerous.

I, as your President, am dedicated to the ideal of democracy, I do not favor using police powers in this matter.

Yes, I was not in favor, for instance, of lifting the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in Central Luzon. I am not in favor of arresting anybody just because I do not like his face. I feel the same way about censorship; I am not in favor of state-directed censorship; once it starts it is difficult to go back. Once the full power of the government is utilized, it is almost impossible to give redress to all those who are aggrieved.

But I know that after this, all of you will take the necessary steps to attain our objective, without resorting to the utilization of the ultimate powers of the government and of the state, which often is attended by violence.

If there are any questions I would like to listen to them. If there are any suggestions, I also would like to listen to them. Please do not feel offended by the vigor with which I have emphasized these points. Please do not feel that I called you here as my guests only to scold you. No, I had never intended to do that.

And please don't hold back just because I am in a temper. You may say: "The President is in a temper and it is not the time to talk to him," But I am available for dialogue now. If there is anything you would like to tell me, please let me know.

Address of President Marcos before the PHILCAG troops in South Vietnam, July 16, 1967

His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
Before the PHILCAG troops in South Vietnam

[Delivered on July 16, 1967]

MARTYRS FOR PEACE

BY

PRESIDENT FERDINAND E. MARCOS

I BRING with me the warm regards of our people. You are not forgotten; in fact, you are remembered with pride and longing. All of us pray for your safe return to the land whence you came:

Your government has sent you on an errand of mercy in a mission of peace. You left your homes and loved ones in the name of that Filipino tradition which is rooted in genuine compassion for all humanity, especially for those who, like our heroic generations, understand history to be the struggle for liberty. You are here to demonstrate the indivisibility of human freedom. You are witnesses to our people's and our nation's enduring commitment to the sacred ideals of peace, liberty, and prosperity as the grand pursuits of mankind.

The Poignant Question of our Time

It has been said that your presence here attests to our nation's involvement in the Vietnam war. I would rather give its precise name; that the Filipino people, through your gallantry and courage, are involved in the agony of the human spirit in Vietnam. For the Vietnam battlelines follow the historical and moral demarcations of light and darkness, freedom and tyranny. These battle lines evoke the poignant question of our time, whether this world of ours can endure half-slave and half-free.

History has long ago condemned the exploitation of man by man; our own times demand the condemnation of the colonization of a people by their own kind.

There is for us no middle ground in the violent issues that rend Vietnam today. Our constitution rules out war as an instrument of national policy, but it does not forbid us to extend our sympathy with those who are in the midst of this beleaguered area of freedom. From our own historical experience, we know how despairing it was to be alone in the fight for freedom; for this reason, we do not wish on our brothers in Asia the lonely fate of the Philippine revolution.

Our Glorious Hour

In that glorious hour of our race, our forebears stood alone. The duly constituted revolutionary government, to put it bluntly, had to go begging for recognition in the embassies of the world. Let not the bitterness of that experience be the lot not of our Asian brothers.

It should be the obligation of civilized mankind to see to it that the bitter experience of history is not repeated in our time.

You were enjoined never to shoot in anger. You come to build, not to destroy; to give life, as it were, and not to take it. But you and I know that you risk your lives in doing so. There have been casualties. But it is a source of pride to our countrymen—and myself personally—that you have never been provoked to return measure for measure.

Indeed, your mission here is not without its sacrificial passions.

A Decision for Liberty

You have been sent by a decision lonely in its responsibility, even while its public discussion had been exhaustive, frank, and wide-ranging. Every Filipino who had anything to say about Vietnam was heard. It remained for me to weigh the arguments for and against; mine was the responsibility for exercising the persuasive force of the Presidency in behalf of what I consider the honest consensus of the Filipino people.

That consensus is a decision for liberty.

I will grant you that your mission of peace is a paradoxical one, for it imperils your life as much as the combatant's. As the saying goes, you sheath your sword in a spot where swords clash in mortal strife. What does that make you then but martyrs for peace?

The critics, who advocate neutrality, do not see this shade, do not care to grant us the validity, the honesty, the delicate equilibrium of our involvement. Why should your very presence here indicate at once hostile intentions? Why should it be an "either/or" of combat or withdrawal? Except for the blood-thirsty, Daniel in the lion's den is not obliged to be the gladiator.

No doubt, your position here is difficult, so difficult an ordeal, in fact, that only an understanding of the issues in Vietnam can sustain and console you. The Issues in Vietnam

The issues are clear, although by no means simple Rhetoric, propaganda, and historical questions have made the issues complicated for most of us. As an American marine is reported to have said once, "How do you tell the good guys from the bad guys?"

There are heroes and patriots on both sides of the barricades. The Vietcong guerrilla has a human face. As a human being he cannot be different from you and me. But as a belligerent, he offers a clue to the true menace, the authentic enemy in Vietnam. That menace the enemy, is the Marxist view of history; in sum, History as Mars.

This view of history divides mankind into hostile camps and people into hostile classes. The very term it uses is martial: "class war." Its idea of peace is the complete dominance of an ideology which crucifies mankind in the cross of the state. Power is its worship. Tyranny its temple.

But its evil is sophisticated, unlike the diabolical evil of old. It disguises itself in the legitimate desire for self-determination of hitherto oppressed peoples. It pretends to champion the rights of those which it desires to dominate. And it is for this reason that even some men of good will are duped by this false messiah.

Freedom Is As Freedom Does

The Vietnamese people want to be free. They want to carve their own destiny. But it must be authentic freedom and genuine self-determination, and these they can only achieve through a government that reflects their general will and aspirations.

But we are properly informed about what a communist government is like. It styles itself "new" or "people's democracy," but we find no evidence of the institutions that make up a democracy. There are no free elections, no freedom of speech, press, and assembly, no machinery for the peaceful arbitration of political grievances. This could not be what the Vietnamese people want, weary as they are of war. The peace that must be restored in Vietnam cannot be a peace of the grave, nor freedom there be the illusion of the chained.

Freedom is as freedom does.

Commitment and Obligation

Our commitment, therefore, in Vietnam is a commitment in history. When we made the Revolution of 1896, we made it for all of Asia. We are obliged, we of this generation, to be faithful to that tradition.

Moreover, our own national interests dictate our involvement as peace-makers. We cannot live as an island of freedom in a sea of tyranny. For that would be the beginning of our own enslavement.

Thus, we are in Vietnam to pursue an honorable peace, a peace that promotes human dignity and freedom. Those who cry "peace" in Vietnam must bear in mind that there are certain conditions in which peace is not worth having.

You are here, my compatriots, to assure the future of freedom as much as for the Filipino generations yet to come as for the suffering people of Vietnam.

I am gratified that you have risen to this challenge without flinching, like the free men that you are, and, above all, like the patriotic Filipinos that you are.

I shall report to our people upon my return that the ramparts of freedom are manned by Filipinos too. Let them be inspired by your courage, so that they too will be courageous in facing up to the challenges that confront our nation.

Speech of President Marcos on the opening of Linggo ng Wikaang Pambansa, August 13, 1968

Kagalang-galang na Ferdinand E. Marcos
Pangulo ng Pilipinas
Sa pagbubukas ng Linggo ng Wikang Pilipino ng Surian ng Wikang Pambansa

[Inihayag noong Ika-13 ng Agosto, 1968]

ANG KAUNLARAN NG WIKANG PILIPINO

Ukol sa pagdiriwang natin ng Linggo ng Wika ay nais kong ikuwento sa inyo ang nangyari sa isa nating kababayang Pampanggo nang pumarito siya sa Malakanyang kamakailan.

Dalawang linggo bago sumapit ang takdang araw ng pagparito niya, ang kababayan nating Pampanggo ay nagpasiyang mag-aral ng wikang Ilokano. Dahil sa ako ay Ilokano, ipinalagay niya na makatutulong ang wikang Ilokano sa kanya sa pakikipag-usap sa akin at sa mga tanod at katulong dito sa Palasyo ng Bayan.

Ganyan daw ang paniniwala niya, ayon sa kababayan nating Pampanggo, dahil noong araw kung ano and kinagisnang wika ng Pangulo ay iyon ang wikang umiiral sa Malakanyang.

Dumating ang takdang araw ng pakikipagkita sa akin ng kababayan nating Pampanggo at siya nga ay naparito.

Ang unang tanod ng Palasyo na kanyang aasalubong ay binati niya sa wikang Ilokano, ngunit hindi siya pinansin. Isa pang tanod and binati niya sa wikang Ilokano, ngunit hindi rin siya pinansin. Kaya, sumaisip tuloy niya na mga bastos at walang pinag-aralan ang mga tanod sa Malakanyang ngayon.

Ngunit nangamba rin siya na baka ang pagbigkas niya ng Ilokano ang dahilan ng hindi pagpansin sa kanya. Kaya, marahan at maliwanag niyang inulit ang kanyang pagbati sa sumunod na tanod. Ngunit sa halip na sagutin siya sa Ilokano, ang tanod ay humingi ng paumanhin sa wikang Pilipino at magalang na nagtanong kung ano ang lakad ng kababayan nating Pampanggo sa Malakanyang. Napilitan tuloy ang Pampanggo na magsalita sa Pilipino at nagkaunawaan ang dalawa.

Umakyat sa Palasyo ang kababayan nating Pampanggo. Samantalang naghihintay,ng kanyang takdang oras na makipagkita sa akin, ipinasiya niyang makipag-usap sa wikang Ilokano sa aking mga katulong.

Ngunit gayon na lamang ang kanyang pagkamangha dahil sa ni isa ay walang marunong ng Ilokano sa mga katulong kong nakausap niya. Lumigid siya sa buong bulwagan at pinakinggan niya kung ano ang wikang ginagamit sa mga usap-usapan at natuklasan niya na kung hindi wikang Pilipino ay Ingles ang ginagamit. Walang nag-uusap sa wikang Ilokano doon.

Nang pumasok siya sa aking tanggapan ay binati niya kaagad ako sa wikang Ilokano. Ngunit dahil sa alam ko na isa siyang Pampanggo ay sinagot ko siya sa wikang Pilipino. At pabiro ko pang sinabi na sa Pilipino na kami mag-usap at baka maubusan siya sa Ilokano. At sa wikang Pilipino nga kami nag-usap.

Bukod sa Pilipino ang wikang umiiral sa Malakanyang sa iialim ng kasalukuyang pangasiwaan, sa halip na ang wikang kinagisnang Pangulo o ang kinagisnang Unang Ginang tulad ng kinagawian sa Malakanyang ng nakaraang panahon, ay patuloy na gumagawa ngayon ang pamahalaan ng mga hakbang tungo sa ganap na pagsulong at pag-iral ng wikang pambansa sa buong kapuluan.

Ang isa sa mga hakbang na ito ay ang pagsasalin sa Pilipino ng panunumpa sa tungkulin sa pamahalaan. Dahil dito, buhat sa Pangulo ng Pilipinas hanggang sa pinakamababang kawani ng pamahalaan na kailangang manumpa sa tungkulin ay nanunumpa ngayon sa Pilipino sa halip na sa wikang Ingles o Kastila. Naniniwala ako na ang Pilipino ay siyang wikang dapat gamitin sa panunumpa sa tungkulin sa pamahalaan dahil sa ito ang wikang taal sa ating bansa, dahil sa ito ang wikang ganap nating nauunawaan, dahil sa ang wikang ito ay naglalagos sa ating puso at kaluluwa.

Ang isa pa sa mga hakbang na ginawa ko ay ang pagsasalin sa Pilipino ng bahagi ng Pangulo sa seremonya sa pagtanggap ng mga sugo ng ibang bansa dito sa atin, tulad ng mga embahador, ministro at iba pa. Ang paggamit ng Pangulo ng Pilipinas ng wikang Pilipino sa pagtanggap ng mga kinatawan o sugo ng ibang bansa ay nagpapakilala ng ating pagpapahalaga sa ating wikang pambansa.

Ngunit hindi lamang sa mga seremonya ginagamit ngayon ang wikang Pilipino. Sa lahat ng sandali na sa aking palagay ay lalong angkop at lalong mabisa ang paggamit ng wikang Pilipino, ang wikang ito ang aking ginagamit.

Ang wikang Pilipino ay ginamit din ng ating delegation sa nakaraang kapulungan ng International Labor Organization sa Geneva. Sa pamamagitan ng wikang Pilipino ay nailahad ng ating delegasyon sa kapulungang pandaigdig ang paninindigan ng Pilipinas ukol sa mga isyong pinag-uusapan doon. Isa pa itong patotoo na ang wikang Pilipino ay mabisa at marangal, na hindi tayo magsisisi sa ating hangad na pagyamanin at pairalin ang wikang ito sa buong bansa.

Sa araw na ito ay binabati ko ang Surian ng Inang Wika sa kanyang mga nagawa na, ginagawa at gagawin pa tungo sa pagpapayaman at pagpapalaganap ng wikang pambansa

Binabati ko rin ang lahat ng guro ng wikang pambansa na siyang walang pagod na nagmumulat, sa araw-araw na ginawa ng Diyos, sa isipan ng ating mga kabataan tungo sa pagyakap at paggamit sa wikang Pilipino. Ang mga gurong ito ng ating bansa ang siyang tunay na sandigan ng pag-sulong ng wikang Pilipino.

Inaasahan ko na sa pamamagitan ng pagtutulong-tulong natin ay hindi na malayo ang pagdating ng araw na maaari na nating itigil ang kampanya sa pagpapairal ng wikang pambansa. Ang totoo dahan-dahan nang nararamdaman ng marami sa atin, kasama na ang mga pulitiko, mga mangangalakal at mga lider sibiko, na ang wikang Pilipino ay kailangan nila sa mabisang pagganap ng kani-kanilang mga tungkulin. Darating ang araw, at iyan ay di na malayo, na hindi na natin kailangan na himukin ang sinuman gumamit ng wikang Pilipino. Sila na rin sa kanilang sarili ang magsusumikap na matuto at gumamit nito dahil sa ang paggamit ng wikang Pilipino ay mahalaga para sa kanila.

Isa sa mga pangunahing adhikain ng pangasiwaan ko ang padaliin ang pagsapit ng araw na iyan.

Speech of President Marcos at the induction of the newly elected officers and directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the Philippines, August 30, 1968

His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the induction of the newly elected officers and directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the Philippines

[Delivered at the Fiesta Pavilion, Manila Hotel, August 30, 1968]

BUSINESS AND ECONOMIC POLICY

It is a refreshing experience to come and appear before the Chamber of Commerce of the Philippines. After the vitriolic attacks of my political opponents, the speech delivered here by the new president comes as a diplomatic note. He essayed to explain to me that he had to be candid, and I told him that if all the speeches delivered in this country were of that moderation, I would be very happy indeed.

But that speech was what we lawyers call the statement of facts by a party litigant. I will, in tonight's speech hope to give a counter-statement of facts.

First of all, it has been a year since I last appeared before you in this Chamber to enunciate the determination of my administration to erect a genuine framework for economic-growth. You will remember that at that time, I commended to you and our people what I called, and I quote, the "ethic of progress," or what was called "the quiet and unobtrusive passion for achievement." I repudiated the dishonest approach to economic development of a previous administration, as symbolized by the Emergency Employment Administration, and I insisted that we be honest with ourselves as well as with our people. If you will recall, I pledged my administration to the harder choice rather than the easy one; for unless we committed ourselves to a harsher ethic, no genuine economic growth, no real national development would be possible.

A Time for Sacrifice

This Commitment, which I enunciated before you last year, was a result of the grave crises that our nation faced two years before, when we accepted the popular mandate. The times called for sacrifice, and it called too for massive economic rescue operations. It is my hope that those whom we helped to rescue, especially the members of this Chamber will not forget this.

There was, to begin with a total of nearly 2,000 distressed industries and firms, driven to the brink of ruin by year of mismanagement of the economy. To salvage them, the Development Bank of the Philippines had to set aside about P700 million. But to make this remedial action possible, we have had to effect considerable adjustments in the allocation of priorities. As an example, we had to increase in the Budget or in the Appropriations Act annually the share of economic development, in public funds from 25 per cent to 30 per cent; consider that our budget or Appropriation Act totals about P3 billion every year, you can estimate what five per cent is. At the same time—I have had to bring down the general expenditures of government salaries, equipment and the like, by five per cent last year and another five per cent this year.

As managers of corporations, you know how difficult it is to cut down expenditures in operations. This is a reversal of the tendency of government because of the increase of population and the increase of the cost of the social overhead to move upward instead of downward. I would like to know any government today that has succeeded in decreasing the cost of general government by five and by ten per cent.

Last year the Monetary Board of the Central Bank restricted credit. We had to adopt them, the Circulars of the Monetary Board, because the pattern in the use of the available credit had been distorted to a point where we were returning to excessive import. If you will remember import control was imposed in 1950 precisely because of this. In plain terms, available funds were being utilized to bring in goods from outside the country and not to produce goods inside our country.

You will remember that I appealed to each and every one of you. We met on many occasions, and I called upon the banks, the private commercial banks and the leaders of the banking community, and we all agreed to give priority to the production of local goods and give less emphasis to the importation of goods. You promised me and you promised the people that you would implement your claims. Now let us see how you implemented your solemn pledges to me.

The passage of a full year has not basically changed the situation. However, tonight I come to you with the same appeal, but I also come with the same proposition in all sincerity, with all determination, for you and the business community. I ask that if you had failed to exercise restraint in the past that you exercise it now, that you relax on importations, and if together we can improve our balance of payments positions, we should be able to liberalize credit substantially and remove the special time deposit requirements by December of this year.

But let me go further; there are many speculations among the business community today. I have been asked point-blank what are the plans on devaluation and on exchange control. This is my message to you tonight.

I assure you—in reiteration of a previous announcement—that there will be no currency devaluation and foreign exchange controls during my administration.

But I ask that the business community, especially the members of the Chamber of Commerce, cooperate with the government, not through speeches but by actual deeds to discipline business activities in regard to imports.

We speak of sacrifice on the part of our people, I ask for sacrifice on the part of the more affluent elements of our society. This sacrifice, however, will have rewards that can easily be fitted into your respective projections.

Fears are Understandable

You and I know that the fear of devaluation, of exchange control is upon us because of the deterioration of the balance of payments situation which resulted from an excessive increase in importation. The excessive increase in importation is due in part to speculation about devaluation. So we have a vicious circle of fear feeding on itself and in the process generating more and more imports.

The clearest example of this may be gleaned from our experience in 1966 and 1967. In the fiscal year 1966, also a time of relaxation of credit restrictions, our exports exceeded our imports, and we registered for the first time in years a favorable trade balance. However, in 1967, the picture drastically changed; there were excessive importations of raw materials and non-essential commodities and luxury goods. The increase in imports of raw materials, furthermore, did not result in a corresponding high increase in domestic production, indicating two disturbing developments: a shift toward more import-intensive industry lines or a speculative stockpiling of raw material inventories. It therefore became necessary to restrict credit once again.

Now, you all know that the government does not impose these restrictions for the heck of it, because it wants to make you miserable.

A very grave strain on our foreign reserves was the need to pay an $85 million short-term loan from abroad. This loan was incurred by the previous administration to import rice four years ago. The present administration has now settled this indebtedness.

I would imagine that all of us would learn from experience. We cannot go on with the same habits of mind, committing the same mistakes, falling into the same undisciplined rut and expect to achieve economic development in our time or in the near future.

This is a fundamental principle of life, not rarefied economic theory. We have to live within our means.

Balance of Payment

I cannot overemphasize to you the critical nature of our balance of payments situation. Governor Alfonso Calalang of the Central Bank has informed me that during the first seven months of the present year, the country, through importations by you, the members of the Chamber incurred a $57 million deficit in its balance of payments. This deficit is mainly the result of the further $109 million or 19 per cent expansion in import payments over their year-ago volume and despite the exceptional 19 per cent increase in export receipts. Since imports had gone up by 47 per cent in the preceding year, the January-July 1968 import payments were $289 million or 75 per cent larger than their volume in the first seven months of 1966, two years earlier,

The balance of payments problem was clearly brought about by the undisciplined increase in imports.

It is for this reason that government had to intervene in the economic process, only to be blamed by some misinformed sectors, in its attempt to secure the economy through such intervention.

Crisis Government

In a very real sense, ours is a crisis government. It gets noticed when things are going bad, getting blamed perversely for salvaging a situation that somebody else had brought about. I do not mind this really. In the modern world, the government has to exercise a certain degree of economic leadership. And this is more evident in a developing economy like ours.

But let me say this to the business community and to our people. In accepting our role as the crisis man, or in your terms, exercising management by exception, let the perspective be clear. The government steps into the economy to set things right—and not necessarily to dislocate them.

Without government leadership, many businesses will be buried either by competition or mismanagement in a freewheeling economy, where only the fittest may survive.

Other Areas of Cooperation

There are other areas of cooperation between the government and the business community—and I am glad to note the recommendations and suggestions of your president. We do not only need to keep open the lines of dialogue; we must keep the cooperation lines, if I may coin a phrase, open.

Now, on the suggestions of our president here on capital gains tax, perhaps I should inform him that I have recommended this to Congress. Perhaps I should also tell him that it was upon my instance that a provision of this nature was included in the Investments Incentives Act, and perhaps I should tell him further that when I was a congressman and then a senator, I authored such an amendment, excluding long-term capital gains from income tax. If you will help me to convince the senators not to deliver too many speeches, I think we can get something done about the government. Again, the president of your organization recommends a period of tax amnesty on interest and surcharges. Well, I think you should also know that this suggestion was approved by me a year and a half ago.

Do you know what the obstacles are? The obstacles are existing criminal and administrative cases that are pending not only in our courts but also before our administrative tribunals.

And it is also suggested that there be a tax amnesty to cover hidden and unexplained capital, especially those coming from abroad. I just can imagine what the political opposition will say about this. They will probably say that I am trying to get my cronies to bring in the money that they made out of deals with the present administration. But now that it has been seriously suggested by the president of this organization, I will submit this to the Department of Finance and the Fiscal Policy Committee which as you know are studying all of this.

Then there is the suggestion of an export-import bond, and the basis for this is the alleged lack of capital for exports. There is a lot of capital for exports that you have not utilized. I would like you to know that the latest report of the Fiscal Policy Committee, through the governor of the Central Bank, is that there are about P300 to P500 million available for export production and exports which the private commercial banks and the businessmen have not utilized because they have been busy utilizing the available credit for imports. Anyway, if the export-import bond will help, let us establish it. I, for one, am in favor of this although perhaps I should tell you that we are now busy organizing an export trading corporation to which the private sector will be invited. It is my hope that you will cooperate in establishing this.

We have considerably taxed the resources of government in fulfilling our responsibility to the people. In the two years of this administration, more bridges have been built more schoolhouses erected, more roads constructed, than the combined achievements of previous administrations. This arises from our belief that increased social overhead is an inducement to economically productive activities.

However, our resources do not come from a bottomless well-spring.

I do not mind admitting to you that the infrastructure program has considerably slowed down. The rate of construction of school buildings has been cut about 50 per cent. We used to produce 8,000 to 9,000 buildings a year—now the number is only 4,000 a year. Irrigation works have also been slowed down. The reason for this, again, is that we have to service our international and domestic obligations— most of which were inherited from past administrations.

As it is, therefore, we are still catching up with our past. When shall we begin shaping the future?

This is the urgent philosophy for the new taxes, which, in all candor, I urge you to support, as a token of your consideration for those who will come after us—for the future generations of Filipinos who shall put our own generation in the balance of history.

As I told you last year, “we are building not only for the present but also for the future. But we are determined not to do in the future what we can do today.”

When I am asked to postpone the taxes, there comes to my mind immediately some figures. For instance, 80 per cent of all those who died in Mindanao in 1966 never saw a doctor or a nurse in their whole lives. As a leader, as a citizen, as a Filipino, am I supposed to just forget this? We have been able to reduce this statistic to 60 per cent, then to 50 per cent.

There are 1,400 municipalities in the entire country. There are only 330 complete rural health units. There are many places never visited by any doctor or nurse or midwife, and this has been a fact through the entire history of the Philippines. And yet we aspire to be a modern, civilized country. All of these facts keep pouring into my head and I have to face harsh criticism for proposing new taxes. But if courage is needed to stand up for my beliefs, if it is necessary for me to stop even my political career in order to face realities with courage, I would rather choose to face realities with courage than continue as President of the Republic of the Philippines.

The Business Approach

Look into your ways, your approach to business, and your firms, and you will find an analogy between economic enterprise and modern government. Once you identify the problem of business growth, do you hesitate to apply the solution—whether it is in terms of fresh capital, more managerial talent, more workers? You do not; rather, you act at once in your hard, pragmatic way because you know from experience that a business cannot afford to stand still. The alternative to growth is stagnation.

Similarly, when government identifies the national problem, it must not hesitate to apply the solutions, whether it is in terms of taxes, reallocation of priorities, or altering the balance of payments situation. The big difference, however, is that government, unlike a business firm, is not just responsible to a select group of responsible stockholders, and therefore, its policies are subjected to a million examinations from different points of view, some of which may be irresponsible.

But I would like to believe that the persuasive powers of the government, when used with sincerity and dedication, should be able to unite the nation.

I am starting with you, who are the most influential forces in the national economy. The sacrifice I ask of you is not too difficult. If import payments had grown by 25 per cent a year, instead of 32 per cent, between 1966 and 1968, there would not have been any deficit in our balance of payments.

We have definite grounds to expect an improvement in our foreign exchange receipts in the coming year. New investments in the mining sector of considerable magnitude have entered the country. Our exports from mining, especially in copper, will increase considerably in the coming year. We expect also a significant infusion of foreign exchange from the dollar earnings of 16,000 Filipino technicians and workers in the US military and naval bases in the Pacific, to the extent of about a $100 million a year. We expect a substantial increase in our sugar production so that we shall be able to fill up our quota in the United States market. These are some indications that our balance of payments position faces much brighter prospects in the year to come, and that the forces of economic stability are on the ascendant.

Let it not be said that the appeal, in being unheeded has not united us to move forward, for the tragedy would be that we were a nation incapable of learning from our experience and the mistakes of the immediate past.

Thank you and good night.

Speech of President Marcos at the inauguration of General Santos City and the inauguration of the Home Economics and Marcos Building, September 5, 1968

His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the inauguration of General Santos City and the inauguration of the Home Economics and Marcos Building
[Delivered in Tacurong, Cotabato, September 5, 1968]

THE SPIRIT OF INTEGRATION

I am supposed to deliver the inauguration speech to inform everybody that General Santos is now a city.

I hereby declare, as President of the Republic of the Philippines, that as of today, the new city of General Santos has been organized and will operate as such, a chartered city of the Republic of the Philippines.

I congratulate all those who have anything to do with the progress of this city. When I first came here as a young man way back in 1940, and then immediately after the war, this place was just a small village. This was a one-road town, but now we have a city—a big, progressive bustling city. Who would ever imagine that these big buildings here today could have been put up within such a short period of time? This is, indeed, a monument to the energy, enthusiasm and dedication of your leaders and of the men who poured their sweat and energy into the building of this town.

But the building of this town and this city was not the work of the leaders alone. Mostly it was the work of the people who are here, and may I say it was the work of Christian, Muslim and other minorities. This is what I want to emphasize today.

All over the country, we again hear the alarm signals being raised, calling attention to one fact, and that is—that there is a fear that the two cultures, Christian and Muslim cannot co-exist. I wish to emphasize that General Santos is the creation of a community of Filipinos, Muslims and Christians working in mutual partnership for a mutual goal.

Rumors of Disunity

There appeared some time ago, in the press and radio and other media, news to the effect that Muslims and Christians are engaged in killing each other here. The reports, however, were not true. But while it was false and irresponsible, for some time, the entire nation came face to face once again with that old fear: regional strife among people of different creeds. Briefly, we seemed to find in it ample evidence of the so called “Muslim separatist movement” brewing allegedly in some of the towns of Mindanao. Since then all of these moves have been denied. And finally, our government—from the Presidency to the Congress down to the smallest local government—had to face again the old query: Is it the government of all Filipinos? And if it is, who are the Filipinos?

These seem in retrospect very tired and cliché-ridden questions, but if we look at them in the context of the rumored discontent and disunity that provoked them, they seem, indeed, imperative and important questions. They strike at the very foundation of this land we call our country, and we are suddenly reminded, as if in shock, that some of our brother Filipinos may in fact have stopped to call it their own.

And so the problem, that you, the first settlers faced in 1939 is still with us. We have recognized the necessity of making community with the members of the cultural minorities in the task of nation-building. But somewhere in our experience, our plans exceeded or did not measure up to the achievements of the past.

And so today, we must confront this unfinished business, not so much because there are rumors of disunity, but more important because we really have to bring down those walls that divided us Muslims and Christians in the past.

The Way of Integration

The answer is oneness, “integration.” But what do we mean by integration in the context of our times?

Integration implies, I believe, a union. To integrate is to join two disparate things, such that when they are joined they compose a new whole, without either of the two losing identity in the union. In the context of cultures, integration means the participation of disparate cultures and cultural groups in the making of one body politic, without one culture being subjugated or subsumed or assimilated by any other.

The union in the case of a nation, I suggest is a political one. It means the molding of nation from those cultural groups which inhabit its boundaries of space. The fact that one group will be more numerous than the others is circumstantial and has no bearing whatsoever on the rights that it may derive from the nation so formed.

Relating these principles to our own nation, it is not difficult to see how the making of the body politic of this country cannot be simply the concern of the larger Christian majority. Neither can it be simply the concern of the Muslim minority or of those other minority groups who continue to live among us, but sometimes sadly apart and destitute.

Nation-building must be the concern of all, if this nation is to be the creation of all of us—and I say to you now it still has to be the creation of all of us, of Muslims and Christians alike.

And to my Muslim brothers, therefore, today, I am pleased to announce that under my administration, the Muslim shall be the brother of the Christian and the Muslim shall have rights equal and similar to the Christian under this government. And thus both Muslim and Christian brothers can work for the transformation of our society and our government to become true instruments of progress.

Yes, there are many things lacking in our country as yet. We lack funds, we lack trained personnel, we lack sometimes leadership and often there is a lack of a dialogue, communication between the people and their leaders. I now try to bring about this dialogue, this communication.

I have travelled the country far and wide, and I can see that all these fears that have been expressed through the mass media—through the newspapers and through the radio and television, are mostly exaggerated. Muslim and Christian brothers live together and we have the assurances of the leaders of Northern Cotabato and other provinces that they live together peacefully and progressively.

I appeal to all of you now, to all the people of Mindanao and Sulu and Palawan, and all the areas wherein the cultural minorities live, under the Republic of the Philippines you are one, you are united, you are a people with one single objective and that is the progress of the Republic of the Philippines.

If there be any grievance, tell us. I have authorized the Bureau of Telecommunications to receive your complaints, Muslims and Christians, and relay them in telegrams addressed to me. All you have to do is pay 10 centavos and that telegram will reach me. If there is any grievance, don't take the law into your own hands. There is a law that we shall impose. If your rights have been denied, they shall be restored to you. I shall see to it that they are, and if, not as you see often in the workings of our judicial system, it takes a long time, let me know if the delay is unjustified and unreasonable and I shall exert the powers of the Presidency in order that his delay is cut short and justice shall be granted you immediately.

And now, ladies and gentlemen of General Santos, I congratulate you again. Taos-puso kong binabati and lahat ng tumulong rito sa lungsod ng General Santos. I am happy to be here.

Maraming salamat sa inyo, congratulations to all of you. Good day and God bless all of you. Thank you.

Speech of President Marcos at the Testimonial Parade and review of the Armed Forces of the Philippines,
September 10, 1968

Speech
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Testimonial Parade and review of the Armed Forces of the Philippines

[Delivered in Camp Aguinaldo, September 10, 1968]

LOYALTY TO PROGRESS

I THANK you for this reiteration of loyalty to the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces.

In the past years, the armed forces have been more deeply involved than ever before in the crucial effort to rebuild and strengthen the nation. In tasks both of a military and a non-military nature, Filipino soldiers have demonstrated their sincerity and capacity to help me create the conditions for greater national progress.

Commitment to Welfare

The Armed Forces, in short, have by many productive courageous and innovating deeds translated into action their commitment to the country's welfare. This in a larger sense is the commitment you are expressing anew today. I take it, therefore, that the occasion which brings us together here today is more than a mere ritual, but rather a compact with progress, expressive of your desire and readiness to lend your best effort to the task of transforming this country into a prosperous and a more secure nation.

Let there be no doubt that the loyalty you express here today is loyalty to the cause of national advancement, and that the pledge symbolized by today's celebration is a pledge to support and advance that cause.

Our Common Cause

This is the cause to which I have directed my energies as President and Commander-in-Chief, the cause for which I have planned and implemented many projects and endeavors, including those in which you are actively engaged.

The large vision that planning for progress calls for must summon all possible hands, with their various skills and abilities, to join the national leadership in translating hope to reality. The Armed Forces have a special competence to accelerate this process of national growth. As Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, I am determined to utilize that special competence as much as possible.

Understanding of AFP Role

This determination, as you are well aware, is sometimes misunderstood or, worse, misrepresented. But I am confident that the majority of the Filipino people fully comprehend that the participation of the Armed Forces in many government undertakings is necessary to hasten the fulfillment of their hopes for greater abundance and security.

Their experience in the past two and a half years is their own best counsel against rash conclusions about the role of the Armed Forces. In that time, the beneficial effects of the program to mobilize the armed forces for progress have become an indissoluble part of the changing economic and social conditions.

Proof of AFP Competence

The stamp of armed forces competence is found today on the long stretches of new highways and roads that are to be seen everywhere in the country. In numerous towns and villages where many of our countrymen live, the medical units of the civic action teams of the armed forces bring not only health facilities but hope and faith as well. The sustained and dedicated work of these civic teams has indeed created in the people of many long neglected areas their first sense of government, their first real knowledge that their life of ignorance and misery can possibly change for the better.

Government As Agent of Change

The participation of the Armed Forces in health, education, public works and community development is one of our best guarantees that progress in this country will not remain a theory and a blueprint, as it has for many generations until 1965. Government under the present administration is the accepted agent of the great mass of our people for revolutionary change, for stamping out social injustice, for demolishing the old barriers which have circumscribed the lives of the poor.

Champion of the Discontented

It is my purpose to compel this historic reversal of roles, in which the government is the foe of the status quo, the activist for social change, the champion of the discontented. If this means harnessing the resources and the manpower of the Armed Forces to construct the framework of progress, to build highways and feeder roads and bridges, cultivate new farms, find and manage new sources of food for our growing millions, besides standing guard to repel foreign aggression—if all these must be done, I will not hesitate to order the Armed Forces to man more and more outposts in the great and relentless war I have begun against economic stagnation and massive poverty.

No Misuse of Armed Forces

I have been accused of preparing the Armed Forces to take the role in the still distant elections. If this means commanding the armed forces to continue their constructive work for economic growth and social action, so that with their help we can improve the lives of the people, then it is perfectly true that the armed forces have taken an active role in government work. I do not propose to change this fact for any reason.

If, however, the accusation means that the armed forces shall be utilized for partisan reasons, to influence the results of the elections, you yourselves can provide the answer. A charge like this, I think, goes right into the heart of an important question, the integrity and the professional pride of every officer and soldier. Your record in peace and in war, is the most eloquent argument against the fear that the Armed Forces may be misused.

Faith In Armed Forces

In response to your commitment to good government. I wish to express my faith in the ability of the Armed Forces to fulfill the increasing missions for the welfare and security of the country, as well as my confidence in the high purpose and the integrity of the officers and men in the armed forces.

Good day and thank you.

Speech of President Marcos at the UP College of Agriculture Campus, September 14, 1968

Talumpati

Kagalang-galang Ferdinand E. Marcos
Pangulo ng Pilipinas
Sa UP College of Agriculture Campus

[Binigkas sa Los Baños, Laguna, Setyembre 14, 1968]

ANG PAGBABAGO SA LUPA

Ang kasaysayan ng land reform ay maaaring sabihing dito nagmula sa Laguna. Hindi kaila sa madla ang pakikipaglabang ginawa ni Rizal upang mahango sa kaalipinan ang mga magsasaka sa bayan ng Kalamba. At ang mahigit na dalawang-daang pagbabangon ng dayuhan ay nag-ugat sa mga karaingan ng taong-bayan ukol sa lupa at sa kanilang karapatang magbungkal ng sariling lupa nila.

Dahil dito ay itinuturing nating makasaysayan ang isang pagkakataong katulad nito—ang pagbubukas ng isa pang land reform area. Isa pang bagay na nagpapatigkad sa araw na ito ay ang pangyayaring ito ang kauna-unahang pagbubukas ng land reform area sa labas ng Gitnang Luzon, at kauna-unahan sa Katimugang Tagalog.

Maaaring higit na maselan ang kalagayang sosyal sa Gitnang Luzon, datapwa't ang land reform ay hindi lamang siyang katugunan natin sa mga diwung mapag-himagsik. Ang land reform ay isang palatunlunan na isiua-sagawa ng ating pangasiwaan hindi sapagka't ito ay panlaban natin sa Komunismo o anumang ideolohiyang hindi kanais-nais, kundi sapagka't ito ang hinihingi ng katarungang panlipunan at ito ang hinihingi ng ating sariling paninindigan bilang isang bansang demokratiko at makatao. Sa hinaharap, sa sandaling magkaroon ng sapat na kakayahan ang ating pamahalaan, ay aking titiyaking marami pang mga pook sa ating bansa ang mabubuksan bilang land reform area.

I have proclaimed through the Land Reform Council the second district of Pampanga as a land reform area. I have proclaimed 23 municipalities in the province of Nueva Ecija as land reform areas.

Today we proclaim 12 municipalities of Laguna as land reform areas. Ang aking pangarap ay bago magtapos ang aking panunungkulan bilang Presidente sa 1969, ang lahat ng lalawigan at bayan sa Central Luzon ay maipahayag ko bilang mga pook ng reporma sa lupa o "land reform area."

Nang pinagtibay ang "land reform code," nang ako ay kasalukuyang pangulo ng Senado, naalis ang panggagalingan ng salapi na ibibili sa mga lupa. Ang mga buwis na isinama sa panukalang-batas sa Kongreso ay natanggal sa mgapagbabago o "amendments" sa Senado. Dahil dito'y nahihirapan ang Land Bank na humanap ng pera upang ibili sa mga lupa. Ngunit ngayon, mga kaibigan, ikinagagalak kong ipagbigay-alam sa buong bansa na aking hiningi sa Kongreso, at pinagtibay naman ng Kongreso, na ibigay sa inyong abang lingkod, ang kapangyarihang ipagbili ang mga lupa at ari-arian ng ating pamahalaang pambansa upang ang salaping manggagaling sa pagbibili ng mga lupa at ari-ariang iyan ay magamit ng Land Bank sa programa sa reporma sa lupa o "land reform program" ng ating pamahalaan.

I have the honor to inform you that notwithstanding the fact that there is no authority or specific special fund up to now for land reform, notwithstanding the fact that those who opposed land reform in 1964 and 1965 in Congress succeeded in removing the source of funds for the operation of land reform in the Philippines, I have insisted upon the sale of government properties that are not urgently needed in order to raise funds for the purchase and expropriation of landed estates. I am happy to inform you that we have been able to raise P11.5 million, which shall go to the Land Bank to be utilized for land reform operations. This is just the beginning. It is my hope that we shall continue.

Nabili na ang limang malalaking lupain sa Central Luzon at kasalukuyang sinisiyasat kung maaaring bilhin ang 30 pang mga lupain sa Central Luzon. Ang lahat nang iyan ay hahatiin alinsunod sa batas ng reporma sa lupa upang ipagbili sa ating kapwa magsasaka.

Ibig kong linawin sumandali sa inyo ang ibig sabihin ng proklamasyong ginagawa natin ngayon. Ang bisa ng proklamasyon ay ang pagputol sa lahat ng kontrata bilang kasama. Kung ang magkabilang panig ay hindi magkasundo sa isang bagong kaayusan na naiiba sa tenancy, lpinalalagay ng batas ang pag-iral ng isang bagong kaayusan—ang panrumuwisan o leasehold.

Noong mga nakaraang buwan ako ay napasubo sa mara-ming gulo sapagka't maraming tumutol sa proklamasyong ito. This proclamation has been the subject of controversy. I have been studying it since last year. It has been recommended by many groups during the convention of the Free Farmers Federation, headed by Gerry Montemayor. I said then that as soon as we have settled some of the questions involving not only the law but also the question of the capability of the tenants to assume the responsibilities of leasehold, I would proclaim the first district of Laguna as a land reform area.

Aanim lamang ang bayan na hinihiling ng ating mga magsasaka na maiproklama o kaya'y mapailalim sa "land reform." But while the tenants requested that only six municipalities be placed under land reform, it is my belief that it is necessary now to increase the areas covered by land reform inasmuch as the same situation prevails in the other towns. That is why today we proclaimed not only six municipalities but 12 municipalities in the province of Laguna.

Ang proklamasyon ay magkakabisa sa ika-7 ng Oktubre, 1968. Hindi kasama rito ang darating na tag-ani. Ang masasaklaw nito ay ang taon ng pag-aani na ang pagtatanim o ang paghahanda sa pagtatanim ay magsisimula makaraan ang taning na ika-7 ng Oktubre, 1968. Ang mga may-ari ng lupa ay mananatiling may-ari sa panahon ng pag-iral ng pamumuwisan. At ang pakikipagtalastasan o negosasyon ng magkabilang panig—ng may-ari at ng kasama—ay maaring magpatuloy sa panahon ng proklamasyon.

Ang bagong kaayusan—pamuwisan sa halip na kasama ay hindi nangangahulugan ng pag-ilit o expropriasyon. Ang pamahalaan sa ilalim ng Batas sa Pagbabago sa Lupa o Agricultural Land Reform Code ay hindi maaring kumuha ng mga lupaing ang sukat ay kulang sa 75 hektarya. Kung manguha man ng lupa ang pamahalaang ito ay isasagawa sa pamamagitan ng pagbili sa lupang iaalok o ihahandog ng mga may-ari ng lupa na rin.

Ang proklamasyong ito ay kusang-loob na ginagawa ng inyong kasalukuyang pangasiwaan, datapwa't karapat dapat banggitin ang naitulong ng kilusang magsasaka sa Laguna. Nakatulong sa proklamasyong ito ang Federation of Free Farmers na pinangunguluhan ni Gerry Montemayor; nakatulong din ang mga lider ng Laguna, na katulad ni Senador Lagumbay at Gobernador San Luis, at maging ang mga may-ari ng lupa, sa pamamagitan ng kanilang maunawaing pagtanggap sa proklamasyong ito, ay nakatulong din ng marami. Totoo at marami rin ang tumutol sa proklamasyong ito. Datapwa't ang agos ng kasaysayan ay hindi maaring pigilin, at ang pagbabago sa lupa ay isang mahalagang pangangailangan ng ating pagsulong, hindi lamang dito sa Laguna, o sa Gitnang Luson, o sa Katagalugan, kung di sa buong Pilipinas.

Nang nagdaang pangasiwaan ang Land Reform ay nasa papel lamang at bukambibig lamang ng mga namumuno. Ngayon, sa ilalim ng pangasiwaang ito, ang pangarap na land reform ay nagkaroon na ng tunay na katuparan, at sa likod nito ay aking itinatalaga ang buong kapangyarihan ng aking katungkulan bilang Pangulo ng Pilipinas.

Ngayon ay aking hinihiling sa inyo, maging mga mag-sasaka at maging may-ari ng lupa, na kayo ay magkaisa upang ating maipatupad sa paraang mahinahon at matagumpay ang proklamasyong ito. Ang tagumpay ng land reform ay nakasalalay sa inyong pagkakaisa. Ang paggalang sa karapatan ng bawa't isa sa ilalim ng batas ay siyang dapat maging saligan ng ganyang pagkakaisa, bukod pa sa katotohanang bilang iisang lipi at iisang lahi ay iisa ang tibok ng ating damdamin.

Binabati ko ang dakilang taong-bayan ng unang purok ng Laguna sa makasaysayang pagkakataong ito. Binabati ko ang mga lider ng Laguna sa ilalim ni Gob. San Luis, binabati ko ang mga senador, ang mga kinatawan. Binabati ko ang ating mga punong bayan. Binabati. ko po rin ang mga estudyante na kinakatawan ni Miss Espino dito sa ating programa.

I know that the ultimate fruits of what we are doing now perhaps I and the men and women of my generation may not see. But what we seek is the salvation of our country and the progress of our nation and this entire program of land reform, for the younger generation will be the generation that shall harvest the fruit of this program.

It is my hope that you, the younger people, will understand what I have said. I proclaimed land reform areas, not because of fear that there will be war or there will be a revolution, but because it is the right thing to do. We proclaimed land reform areas because it is a policy that is based not only on wisdom, but on righteousness. Because if we are to return the dignity of the human being to our countrymen we must dismantle the old feudal estates, and if in the process it should become necessary that any man be blamed, do not point to any man, I assume responsibility. I assume responsibility for this policy. I have staked my future on it, and I stake my entire political career on it.

I have said it before and I say it again; if and when I cannot do what I think is right, it will be time for me to retire from public life. I repeat, I consider this as something that is urgent and right, and so we must do it now. I call upon each and everyone to help the government and the administration in pushing through land reform.

Ako ay nagpapasalamat na naman sa inyong lahat. sa iyong pagbibigay sa inyong abang lingkod, na inyong tinulungan at tinangkilik nuong nakaraang mga halalan. Ako ay nagpasalamat na sa inyo sa pamamagitan ng salita at ngayon po naman ito ang aking pagpapasalamat sa inyong lahat dahil sa inyong pagtangkilik at pagtulong nuong nakaraang mga laban sa pulitika. Ito pong pagpapahayag ng reporma sa lupa, na aking ipinangako sa inyo nang inyong piniling Presidente ang inyong abang lingkod ay waking ibang saligan kung hindi ang kapakanan ng buong Pilipinas at hindi ang kapakanang pang-sarili.

Extemporaneous speech of President Marcos at the Lions Convention, September 26, 1968

Extemporaneous Speech
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Lions Convention

[Delivered in Dagupan City, September 26, 1963]

SABAH: THE TEST OF OUR INDEPENDENCE

I am very happy to be here. I always enjoy coming to Dagupan and to Pangasinan. Your sense of humor, your pleasant habits and instincts inspire me into believing that if we have more people like you, we should have a more pleasant way of developing the country. I presume that there are also Liberals among you. I wish your habits would contaminate the Liberals that I know.

Mayor Manaois told me to enjoy myself here in Dagupan. How, he did not say. But I always enjoy his speeches. They are in a class completely different from all the speeches that I have heard. And after a gruelling period of work in Manila, I always look forward to listening to Mayor Manaois. But this time, he overdid himself. . . .

I have agreed to an open forum because whatever I say here will be further embroidered and probably made more interesting by direct confrontation with the leaders of your area. I always accept an invitation from District 301-C. You will remember I was with you on your last convention, and I was afraid then of being involved in the politics of your association, which is as intense and as bitter and as partisan as anything in the Philippines. But I was also with you during the campaign in 1965. I think my being with you now is the third time around. I hope this insures your support for me in whatever aspirations I may have in the future.

But all kidding aside, you come from the district to which most people refer as my bailiwick. Because Northern Luzon or Northern Philippines is the area which has given me the most number of votes in as solid a manner as any candidate has ever been supported in his entire political career. And you represent the leadership in this area, for whether you are in government or in private life, you constitute the leader class. And it is the leader class often that molds and forms opinions. For while it is true that we live in a democracy and that your vote or any vote from each and everyone of you is equal to the vote of the meanest and the lowest and the poorest of Filipinos anywhere in the Philippines, it is true too that tradition, history, as well as the very nature of democracy allow the exercise of both character and the faculties of the mind, which provide the lead for those who may not be capable of forming their own opinions, and to mold such opinions for the good or worse of our country and our people.

Yesterday, I passed the 1000th day of my administration. 1000 days have passed as if they were merely but a single day. And I took forward to Of course, I hope another 1000 days. Now let's see, does that extend to 1969? Yes, I am afraid it does. But always that is the feeling of a President; I presume whether he seeks re-election or not. Four years is always too often a short period for the implementation of projects which are considered long-term projects.

For instance, the project for the control of floods here in Central Luzon, you can't finish that in five years. Because you will have to go into the sources of water in the Cordilleras, in the Sierra Madre, which serve Nueva Ecija, Bulacan, and Pampanga. And yet one has to plan. For instance, again, one has to plan on the economic relations between the Philippines and Japan, the Philippines and the United States, the Philippines and the Benelux countries, the Philippines and the common market; one has to make the foundations of all these plans. And yet one may not be there when the plans are implemented. Suffice it to say that the leader, if he is a leader, must initiate the first step towards the right direction, for the leader is chosen in order that he shall assume this initiative. And more often than not, assuming the initiative is a thankless task.

One is often criticized for things that he may not have done or he may not be even planning to do. Today we are involved in tensions with Malaysia. And both on domestic and any foreign problem that we have, this is a problem which engages the minds, and the hearts, the emotions and the feelings, of all our people. You are witness to the lively discussions of the Sabah issue, and I thought I saw or felt some expression of, shall we say, the humor in the situation, by the way you have reacted to the statements of the would-be governor of Sabah, Mayor Manaois. I think he was a little mistaken when he said that I'm the only President of Sabah. This is one of the things that I want to put right. Because the belief is that I suddenly pressed our claim to Sabah without any historical and without any legal foundation. This is not true. Of course if you ask our people, they will say we are unanimous in this decision to pursue the claim to Sabah. And you ask them why, and their answer is, we believe in Marcos, we will follow Marcos. And I think that is the attitude, too, of Mayor Manaois. Perhaps because it is also likely due to the fact that he is one of my closest friends, and the fact that I have given this city about a million pesos in aid. And whispered to me, I have not asked anything from you, Mr. President, at this luncheon; I shall reserve it for my next visit to Malacañang. And knowing him, he will probably be there tomorrow.

But am I the only President that has identified the Philippines with Sabah? No. Am I the only head of a sovereign state that has made a claim to the Sabah? No. Have we taken steps before to acquire Sabah? Yes. The Sabah territory is historically and legally an area and a territory to which we have, from the beginning of the 18th century, laid claim and over which we maintain dominion and sovereignty.

According to Dr. Tregonning, the Sabah region or what is properly known as North Borneo was ceded by the Sultan of Brunei in 1704 to the Sultan of Sulu as a sort of a reward for the help of the Sultan of Sulu in suppressing a rebellion in North Borneo.

Let me read from the "Diario Español" of January 28, 1876, wherein it said, clearly that the Sultan of Sulu was "lord of all the part of Borneo between Quimanis Point in the island of Labuan itself, and the Bay of Santa Lucia that is to say, 150 leagues off the north coast of the said island of Borneo, recognized by all statemens, including the Dutch, who were the owners of the nearest possessions. The title of the Sultanate of Sulu over North Borneo was recognized by Spain, Great Britain, and other European powers through a series of treaties entered into in the 18th and the 19th centuries. I need not go into them now. There at least 10 to 20 documents in the possession of the Republic of the Philippines indicating that the Sultan of Sulu was recognized as the ruler and the sovereign over North Borneo.

On what do we base, therefore, our claim? We have based it primarily on this: that this area was leased to the two adventurers, Baron de Overbeck and Alfred Dent, one an Austrian citizen and the other an Englishman. And this lease was recognized as such, merely a lease. This lease continued because of the payment of 5000 Malaysian dollars annually. Up to now this amount this amount is still being deposited. If this land was not leased out by the Sultan of Sulu why is it that up to now the rent is being paid? And the heirs of the Sultan of Sulu, of course, are quarreling as to who should receive this rent.

Did Baron de Overbeck and Alfredo Dent acquire sovereignty over the territory? No, because they were not acquire sovereignty and dominion over territory like this.

The question that arises next is when the North Borneo or Sabah territory was transferred by the North Borneo Company to the British Government, what was transferred? Could the North Borneo Company transfer anything more than what it had acquired from the Sultanate of Sulu? No, because you cannot transfer what is not yours. Since the Baron de Overbeck and Alfred Dent did not have sovereignty, they could not transfer sovereignty to the British government of British North Borneo. This is confirmed by the statements of British officials. Let us go to the statement of the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the British government in 1881.

Lord Granville stated the following and I quote, "the British Crown assumes no dominion or sovereignty over the territories occupied by the British North Borneo Company, nor does it purport to grant to the Company any powers of government thereover. It merely confers upon the persons associated status and incidents a body corporate, and recognizes the grants of territory and the powers of government made and delegated by the Sultans in whom the sovereignty remains vested."

The Americans recognized this, and in 1920, through Governor Frank Carpenter, also recognized the sovereignty of the Sultan of Sulu over North Borneo. There was an agreement. First, there was the Bates Agreement during the revolution confirmed by the Carpenter Agreement in 1920. This Carpenter Agreement was further confirmed in a statement by Governor Carpenter when he said and I quote:

“It is necessary that there be clearly of official record the fact that the termination of the temporal sovereignty of the Sultanate of Sulu within American territory, which is Sulu proper, is understood to be wholly without prejudice or effect as to the temporal sovereignty and ecclesiastical authority of the Sultanate beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the U. S. government, especially with reference to that portion of the island of Borneo which, as a dependency of the Sultanate of Sulu is understood to be held under lease by the Chartered Company which is known as the British North Borneo Company.” So both the British and the American governments recognized this territory as under the Sultan of Sulu.

In the conversations or negotiations conducted in 1963 we made the following summary of our claim to the British and I quote:

“To put it in capsule form: it is our legal position that the Sultanate of Sulu had been recognized by the United Kingdom as the sovereign ruler of North Borneo; that the aforesaid contract of 1878 whereby the Sultan of Sulu granted certain concessions and privileges to Overbeck and Dent in consideration of an annual tribute of 500 Malayan dollars was one of lease; that whatever be the characterization of the contract, Overbeck and Dent did not and could not in any event acquire, as they could not have acquired, under applicable rules of international law, sovereignty or dominion over North Borneo; that the British North Borneo Company did not acquire as in fact it was not authorized to acquire, sovereignty or dominion over the North Borneo territory; that the British Government consistently barred the British North Borneo Company from acquiring sovereignty or dominion over North Borneo by maintaining that the same resided in the Sultan of Sulu; that as a consequence, the British Crown, on the strength of the North Borneo Cession Order of 1946 did not and could not have acquired from the British North Borneo Company sovereignty or dominion over North Borneo, since the Company itself did not have such sovereignty; that the said Cession Order was a unilateral act which did not produce legal results in the form of a new title; and that the Sultanate of Sulu, which in 1957 publicly and formally repudiated the Cession Order and terminated the lease contract of 1878, continued to exist, in reference to North Borneo, until the Philippines, by virtue of the title it had acquired from the Sultanate—and this was the formal Deed of Cession signed by the Sultan of Sulu in favor of the Republic of the Philippines in 1962—became vested with sovereignty and dominion over North Borneo.”

Colonial Paradox

What we appear to have here, my countrymen, is a paradox of colonialism. At the time when we were still a colony of Spain, and then later of the United States, the sovereignty of the Sultan of Sulu over North Borneo, or Sabah, was recognized and accepted as a fact by both Great Britain and the United States of America.

But with our national independence, when we could claim at least what was ours, we are told that the sovereignty of the Sultan of Sulu—and in consequence, Philippine sovereignty over North Borneo—has ceased to exist. Why is this so?

And then I am made to understand further that we should not press this claim because the great nations are against this claim. Great Britain is against this claim, apparently the United States is against this claim Russia is against this claim. If this be the test of the validity of claims then I am afraid that small nations in this world have no chance whatsoever to claim what is rightfully theirs. I maintain that as a basic principle, claims to territories, claims to boundaries and borders, should be decided on their merits and on the rule of law not on the rule of power and the rule of force.

There was much ado about the presence of British naval units, 25 of them, British and Australians, passing through our territorial waters. And with it also came the passage. the fly-by over our territory of jet fighters of the British. It could not have been too much of a burden to us or an imposition upon us, a small country who seeks nothing but peace, were it not for the statement that this was a show of force.

What is the meaning of a show of force? A show of force by the British indicates that this was an attempt to coerce us, to follow the will and the intention or the decision of the British to declare Sabah as Malaysian territory. Accordingly, therefore, as your President, I filed a protest with the British Embassy against the misuse of our territorial waters. The British, the United States and other countries are our partners in the SEATO, and therefore it is my hope that there will be no more show of force against a friend and an ally. Was it necessary to coerce us with this show of force? To compel us into quitting our claim? I have always said that no amount of show of force, provided that we are in the right, will compel me to change this decision because it is a decision based on law. It is a decision which is supported by the people and by Congress, by the representatives of the people. I am unable to change such a decision because with this show of force came the demand that we repeal a piece of domestic legislation. Can, therefore, or should a show of force, be allowed to compel a sovereign nation like ours to change its own domestic legislation? If the answer is yes, then ladies and gentlemen, our world is back to the law of the jungle, with the rule of law abdicated. And, therefore, even if ours be a small nation, we must stand firm behind the rule of law, especially international law.

But are we pressing our claim in order to prejudice the will of the Sabahans? No. Our intention is, at the appropriate time, we shall allow the principle of self-determination to apply. Meaning that we will allow a referendum or a plebiscite, properly safeguarded in order that it will be correct, true, authentic and reflective of the will and choice of the Sabahans for the future. But before we can go into this, just as what has been done with respect to West Irian, there must be a proper period within which preparations will be made for a proper referendum. Before this can be done, the legal question must first be decided, preparatory to giving away territory. You must first find out whether you own the territory or you have dominion over the territory which you will give away. Before, therefore, any political action can be undertaken the legal question of who has sovereignty and dominion over Sabah must first be decided.

And our position is this: we do not want war, we do not want tensions, we do not want crisis, but we do want our rights first to be adjudicated, and to be adjudicated by the proper tribunal.

When the three heads of state met in Manila, meaning the heads of state of Indonesia, Malaysia and the Philippines in 1962, they entered into an agreement about Sabah. The Philippines was going to recognize Malaysia as a federation and as a separate state on condition that this would not prejudice the claim of the Philippines over the Sabah area which the three heads of the nations agreed shall be settled in a peaceful way through negotiation, through judicial intervention, through conciliation, or any other peaceful means agreed upon by the people.

This is our position: we want a settlement of this case by peaceful means. We don't want a cavalier rejection of our claim because that is not included among the means with which to settle such a claim. A party litigant cannot decide his own case, and yet that is exactly what has been done in the present case. There are two prejudiced parties, both claiming the same territory, and yet one of them rejects the other's claim and says that is the final decision on this case. How can this be accepted as such? Even if merely as a matter of principle, and because we maintain that the rule of law supersedes that of power, and aggravated by the fact that there are apparent attempts to coerce us as a nation and as a people into supporting such a violation of international law, it is necessary that we maintain our dignity, our sovereignty, by insisting on a decision by the proper tribunal. From our point of view, the proper tribunal is the International Court of Justice. The International Court of Justice is composed of international jurists who can be considered as the most prestigious in the world. They will not side with anyone, they will decide the question on its merits. If I, a party litigant, am sure of my case and of my evidence, why should I be afraid of bringing this case to the International Court of Justice? This is the question that we have asked the Malaysians and they have not answered.

We are, as a nation pledged to peace. Our Constitution renounces war as an instrument of national policy. We adhere to the United Nations principle of deciding territorial disputes by peaceful means. We have signed the Manila Accord and the Joint Statements of the heads of states and therefore we insist upon the referral of this case to the International Court of Justice. We believe in the validity of our claim. We believe we have every evidence necessary to plead our case. Now, if the Malaysians believe in the same way that they are right, let the court decide.

I have called for a summit conference; I have said I am willing to meet the head of state of Malaysia anywhere, any time, on any subject. They have put up many obstacles; they said there must be a ministerial conference first, meaning at the level of the secretary of foreign affairs. I directed the secretary of foreign affairs, Secretary Ramos of Pangasinan, to meet with his counterpart, Tun Abdul Razak, the foreign minister of Malaysia. Immediately, we are told that Tun Abdul Razak will not go to the United Nations. In short, they are avoiding this issue. I, therefore, place the responsibility on the Malaysians. It's up to them now; we have invited them. I have said I am willing to negotiate. I hope that they will negotiate, they 'are our brothers. We don't mean to do ill to them, we don't wish ill on the Malaysians, but certainly it is necessary that we decide the Sabah question before we go into any other problem between Malaysia and the Philippines.

Now, I conclude with the statement that I shall continue to hope that we will be able to settle this question without delay and in an atmosphere of amity and friendship. I do not expect any war because neither country—the Malaysians nor the Filipinos—are capable of waging war or invading Sabah. But, certainly, both are capable of causing incidents that may lead into graver hostilities. So, the earlier we terminate these tensions, the earlier we settle these misunderstandings, the better for both countries. Both sprang from the same Malayan stuff, both live in the same area, and are neighbors to each other.

Of course, you may want to know why this claim was filed by President Macapagal, and I will tell you. President Macapagal, when he filed the claim in 1962, said that Malaysia is a part of the mainland of China. Presumably, therefore, if the mainland of China should be overrun by communists, Malaysia will also be overrun by communists. If Sabah belongs to Malaysia, then this entire state would come under the control and the hands of the communists. If this should come about, and Sabah falls, into communist hands, we would have a communist territory within six miles of our southernmost border. It would be a threat to the security of the Philippines. This was the position of the Philippines, this was the position of President Macapagal and the security agencies when the claim was filed in 1962. I do not know whether anybody can say that the situation has changed in the years from 1962 to the present. I believe the situation remains the same.

For a young and small nation, we have never shirked from our responsibilities in the family of nations. The treaties we sign are national pledges, and we adhere to them even if subsequent events indicated that they may be disadvantageous to us. We never abrogate treaties for we believe that the life of treaties must be lived through, if we are to behave responsibly. Our allies could always count on us in any undertaking, in peace and in war. We heeded the summons to Korea, because we had agreed in advance to the principles of the United Nations. We have gone to Vietnam, because we believed that it was consistent with our commitments. Perhaps, naively, we always wed our deeds with our words. But we believe that the consistency between word and deed is an imperative necessity for international cooperation and understanding.

We cannot believe that insincerity is the principle of the modern diplomacy that will save the world from the flames of war.

Does this mean that the Philippines is a La Mancha, a Don Quixote among nations.

If peace is a windmill and world understanding an unreachable star, if the quest for peace anywhere is an impossible dream, then let us prepare for the nightmare that is to come upon us.

The Continuing Hope

But, I must commend to you the continuing hope of this government that our brother Malaysians may yet perceive that our times call for the highest statemanship.

I commend to you the hope that, here, in this small section of the world, there are people and nations who know how to take the first step to international peace and brotherhood.

And to this hope—and prayer—I, with your consent, commit each and every Filipino.

Thank you and good day.

Colonial Paradox

What we appear to have here, my countrymen, is a paradox of colonialism. At the time when we were still a colony of Spain, and then later of the United States, the sovereignty of the Sultan of Sulu over North Borneo, or Sabah, was recognized and accepted as a fact by both Great Britain and the United States of America.

But with our national independence, when we could claim at least what was ours, we are told that the sovereignty of the Sultan of Sulu—and in consequence, Philippine sovereignty over North Borneo—has ceased to exist. Why is this so?

And then I am made to understand further that we should not press this claim because the great nations are against this claim. Great Britain is against this claim, apparently the United States is against this claim Russia is against this claim. If this be the test of the validity of claims then I am afraid that small nations in this world have no chance whatsoever to claim what is rightfully theirs. I maintain that as a basic principle, claims to territories, claims to boundaries and borders, should be decided on their merits and on the rule of law not on the rule of power and the rule of force.

There was much ado about the presence of British naval units, 25 of them, British and Australians, passing through our territorial waters. And with it also came the passage. the fly-by over our territory of jet fighters of the British. It could not have been too much of a burden to us or an imposition upon us, a small country who seeks nothing but peace, were it not for the statement that this was a show of force.

What is the meaning of a show of force? A show of force by the British indicates that this was an attempt to coerce us, to follow the will and the intention or the decision of the British to declare Sabah as Malaysian territory. Accordingly, therefore, as your President, I filed a protest with the British Embassy against the misuse of our territorial waters. The British, the United States and other countries are our partners in the SEATO, and therefore it is my hope that there will be no more show of force against a friend and an ally. Was it necessary to coerce us with this show of force? To compel us into quitting our claim? I have always said that no amount of show of force, provided that we are in the right, will compel me to change this decision because it is a decision based on law. It is a decision which is supported by the people and by Congress, by the representatives of the people. I am unable to change such a decision because with this show of force came the demand that we repeal a piece of domestic legislation. Can, therefore, or should a show of force, be allowed to compel a sovereign nation like ours to change its own domestic legislation? If the answer is yes, then ladies and gentlemen, our world is back to the law of the jungle, with the rule of law abdicated. And, therefore, even if ours be a small nation, we must stand firm behind the rule of law, especially international law.

But are we pressing our claim in order to prejudice the will of the Sabahans? No. Our intention is, at the appropriate time, we shall allow the principle of self-determination to apply. Meaning that we will allow a referendum or a plebiscite, properly safeguarded in order that it will be correct, true, authentic and reflective of the will and choice of the Sabahans for the future. But before we can go into this, just as what has been done with respect to West Irian, there must be a proper period within which preparations will be made for a proper referendum. Before this can be done, the legal question must first be decided, preparatory to giving away territory. You must first find out whether you own the territory or you have dominion over the territory which you will give away. Before, therefore, any political action can be undertaken the legal question of who has sovereignty and dominion over Sabah must first be decided.

And our position is this: we do not want war, we do not want tensions, we do not want crisis, but we do want our rights first to be adjudicated, and to be adjudicated by the proper tribunal.

When the three heads of state met in Manila, meaning the heads of state of Indonesia, Malaysia and the Philippines in 1962, they entered into an agreement about Sabah. The Philippines was going to recognize Malaysia as a federation and as a separate state on condition that this would not prejudice the claim of the Philippines over the Sabah area which the three heads of the nations agreed shall be settled in a peaceful way through negotiation, through judicial intervention, through conciliation, or any other peaceful means agreed upon by the people.

This is our position: we want a settlement of this case by peaceful means. We don't want a cavalier rejection of our claim because that is not included among the means with which to settle such a claim. A party litigant cannot decide his own case, and yet that is exactly what has been done in the present case. There are two prejudiced parties, both claiming the same territory, and yet one of them rejects the other's claim and says that is the final decision on this case. How can this be accepted as such? Even if merely as a matter of principle, and because we maintain that the rule of law supersedes that of power, and aggravated by the fact that there are apparent attempts to coerce us as a nation and as a people into supporting such a violation of international law, it is necessary that we maintain our dignity, our sovereignty, by insisting on a decision by the proper tribunal. From our point of view, the proper tribunal is the International Court of Justice. The International Court of Justice is composed of international jurists who can be considered as the most prestigious in the world. They will not side with anyone, they will decide the question on its merits. If I, a party litigant, am sure of my case and of my evidence, why should I be afraid of bringing this case to the International Court of Justice? This is the question that we have asked the Malaysians and they have not answered.

We are, as a nation pledged to peace. Our Constitution renounces war as an instrument of national policy. We adhere to the United Nations principle of deciding territorial disputes by peaceful means. We have signed the Manila Accord and the Joint Statements of the heads of states and therefore we insist upon the referral of this case to the International Court of Justice. We believe in the validity of our claim. We believe we have every evidence necessary to plead our case. Now, if the Malaysians believe in the same way that they are right, let the court decide.

I have called for a summit conference; I have said I am willing to meet the head of state of Malaysia anywhere, any time, on any subject. They have put up many obstacles; they said there must be a ministerial conference first, meaning at the level of the secretary of foreign affairs. I directed the secretary of foreign affairs, Secretary Ramos of Pangasinan, to meet with his counterpart, Tun Abdul Razak, the foreign minister of Malaysia. Immediately, we are told that Tun Abdul Razak will not go to the United Nations. In short, they are avoiding this issue. I, therefore, place the responsibility on the Malaysians. It's up to them now; we have invited them. I have said I am willing to negotiate. I hope that they will negotiate, they 'are our brothers. We don't mean to do ill to them, we don't wish ill on the Malaysians, but certainly it is necessary that we decide the Sabah question before we go into any other problem between Malaysia and the Philippines.

Now, I conclude with the statement that I shall continue to hope that we will be able to settle this question without delay and in an atmosphere of amity and friendship. I do not expect any war because neither country—the Malaysians nor the Filipinos—are capable of waging war or invading Sabah. But, certainly, both are capable of causing incidents that may lead into graver hostilities. So, the earlier we terminate these tensions, the earlier we settle these misunderstandings, the better for both countries. Both sprang from the same Malayan stuff, both live in the same area, and are neighbors to each other.

Of course, you may want to know why this claim was filed by President Macapagal, and I will tell you. President Macapagal, when he filed the claim in 1962, said that Malaysia is a part of the mainland of China. Presumably, therefore, if the mainland of China should be overrun by communists, Malaysia will also be overrun by communists. If Sabah belongs to Malaysia, then this entire state would come under the control and the hands of the communists. If this should come about, and Sabah falls, into communist hands, we would have a communist territory within six miles of our southernmost border. It would be a threat to the security of the Philippines. This was the position of the Philippines, this was the position of President Macapagal and the security agencies when the claim was filed in 1962. I do not know whether anybody can say that the situation has changed in the years from 1962 to the present. I believe the situation remains the same.

For a young and small nation, we have never shirked from our responsibilities in the family of nations. The treaties we sign are national pledges, and we adhere to them even if subsequent events indicated that they may be disadvantageous to us. We never abrogate treaties for we believe that the life of treaties must be lived through, if we are to behave responsibly. Our allies could always count on us in any undertaking, in peace and in war. We heeded the summons to Korea, because we had agreed in advance to the principles of the United Nations. We have gone to Vietnam, because we believed that it was consistent with our commitments. Perhaps, naively, we always wed our deeds with our words. But we believe that the consistency between word and deed is an imperative necessity for international cooperation and understanding.

We cannot believe that insincerity is the principle of the modern diplomacy that will save the world from the flames of war.

Does this mean that the Philippines is a La Mancha, a Don Quixote among nations.

If peace is a windmill and world understanding an unreachable star, if the quest for peace anywhere is an impossible dream, then let us prepare for the nightmare that is to come upon us.

The Continuing Hope

But, I must commend to you the continuing hope of this government that our brother Malaysians may yet perceive that our times call for the highest statemanship.

I commend to you the hope that, here, in this small section of the world, there are people and nations who know how to take the first step to international peace and brotherhood.

And to this hope—and prayer—I, with your consent, commit each and every Filipino.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Marcos, The Philippines and the World Health Organization, October 1, 1968

THE PHILIPPINES AND THE WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

By FERDINAND E. MARCOS
President of the Philippines

(SPEECH DELIVERED BEFORE THE 19TH SESSION OF THE REGIONAL COMMITTEE FOR THE WESTERN PACIFIC REGION OF THE WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION, PHILAMLIFE BUILDING, OCTOBER 1, 1968)

The Philippine Government takes pleasure in being the host to the 19th Session of the Western Pacific Regional Committee of the World Health Organization.

I am happy to welcome in our midst Dr. M. G. Candau, director general of the World Health Organization. I am likewise pleased to welcome the representatives of member countries and their delegations and the representatives of other international, bilateral and non-governmental organizations attending this regional meeting.

May I extend to you, Mr. Director General, the greetings of the Filipino people, as well as my own, on the successful completion of the 20th year of operation of the World Health Organization. We wish the organization continuing success in its effort to promote the health of all people of the world.

20th Year of Membership

I recall with justifiable pride the association of the Philippines with the World Health Organization almost from its inception. We were represented in 1946 at the international health conference, the body which presaged the World Health Assembly and which drafted the World Health Organization constitution. My government signed this constitution in 1948 and so the year of 1968 marks also the 20th year of our membership with the organization. Our people remember the honors bestowed by member governments on our distinguished sons: Dr. Juan Salcedo, Jr. who was elected president of the Fifth World Health Assembly in 1952, and Dr. Francisco J. Dy who was nominated to the regional directorship of the World Health Organization Western Pacific Region. Our country also appreciates the opportunity for service afforded a number of our citizens in the medical and allied professions who are working in other countries under the auspices of the World Health Organization.

Identity of Interests

One need not elaborate to explain the identity of interests that the Philippines has found with the World Health Organization. The organization's principle that health is a fundamental right of every human being which governments should guarantee recalls a basic concept in our own Constitution.

The Philippines became a member of the World Health Organization barely two years after acquiring its independence in 1946. We had just gone through a war which devastated our country and dislocated our population. Sickness prevailed in many areas and health problems tended to slacken our efforts towards national rehabilitation. We were, however, fortunate in receiving goodwill and assistance from external sources and among these was the World Health Organization. Since then, the organization has collaborated with our government in many ways.

Collaborative Efforts

The list of our collaborative efforts with the World Health Organization is long and only a few can be cited here.

In the late forties, yaws continued to be widely prevalent. With the World Health Organization and UNICEF assistance, the government initiated and pursued a nationwide control program. I am happy to report that, at present, this disease has been virtually eliminated from our land.

“Snail-fever” or schistosomiasis is a long-term wasting disease which is found in the east-central and southern part of the Philippines; these are areas which have been singled out for development and/or re-settlement. As this disease posed a threat to the government’s long-range plan, the World Health Organization was requested to assist in devising control measures. A pilot area was established in Leyte province which soon afterwards acquired international repute as a center for the study of schistosomiasis. It has been a few years since the project was terminated, but even as the government continues with the studies in this field, the experience previously gained continues to be useful to the country. Schistosomiasis control measures are at present being incorporated into the development activities being undertaken in the endemic areas.

I have specifically singled out, this project because the control of schistosomiasis is a pre-requisite to development in many critical areas. It is also significant that the control methods are associated in a large measure with developmental activities such as drainage operations for land reclamation, proper irrigation design and construction and scientific rice culture methods, not to speak of the regular sanitary measures which are a responsibility of the National Health Services.

Pivotal Areas of Activity

We are at present engaged, in association with the World Health Organization, in three pivotal areas of activity: malaria eradication, cholera control studies and the planning of a sewerage system for the Greater Manila area.

With international and bilateral collaboration, our national malaria program is fast building up into an effective national operation. The effort will be a difficult one. I am confident, however, that with application of the technical and administrative experience of the World Health Organization and the sustained effort and ingenuity of our people, the objectives of the program can be accomplished. We will then be able to overcome another barrier to our agricultural development program.

Over the past few years, the Philippines, with the collaboration of the World Health Organization and the government of Japan, has been undertaking cholera research with a view to eliminating once again the disease which we previously had eliminated fifty years ago. Unfortunately, cholera was re-introduced into the country in recent years and has now become endemic. I am informed that under existing circumstances, time and a great deal of effort will be required before cholera can be eliminated. We are determined, however, in continuing this task with external support until the disease is eliminated once and for all.

The development of a master plan for the sewerage system of Greater Manila is an undertaking financed under the technical assistance component of the United Nations Development Program with the World Health Organization as the executing agency. It is a preliminary step to facilitate, among others, the reduction of gastro-intestinal infections, including cholera, in our metropolitan population. The project should also lead to satisfying the service demands of our metropolis, relieve sanitary and other environmental nuisances and ensure aesthetic and other conveniences essential to the urban dweller.

Many Demands

Like many countries endeavoring to accelerate their development, the Philippines is faced with many demands for which its still scant resources are required. We are giving emphasis to expanding and strengthening the general infrastructure and increasing food production as they constitute the underpinnings for accelerating our economic development.

It is a fact, of course, that these efforts have also favorable social implications. Better roads and means of communication facilitate population movement between communities and thus promote national unity, stimulate the growth of commerce and the spread of culture. More and more people from formerly inaccessible areas are able to widen their mental and social perspectives, while educational opportunities for the young are enhanced. There are offered, in addition, greater opportunities for rural folks to avail themselves of better health and medical facilities existing in the larger centers of population.

Better Nutrition

As a result of concerted national effort and technological development over the past three years, we have for the first time achieved a surplus in our rice production. We are thus assured not only of an adequate domestic supply but have ushered into our economy a new export product which we hope to increase in volume in the coming years. We have understandably concentrated on the rice production initially, but even now our agricultural sector is turning to the production of protein-rich foodstuff. By this token and with the resources available to us, I envisage that in the not too distant future our workers in the field of nutrition will be confronted with the problem of how to utilize scientifically and effectively the foodstuff already available rather than in worrying as to when and where the essential food elements will be secured.

In this connection we have launched a five-year nutrition program primarily designed to combat malnutrition among children of pre-school age.

Mental and Social Well-Being

The World Health Organization's concept of health, now the goal of many national health efforts, looks beyond the physical and comprehends, in addition, optimal mental and social well-being. Adoption of this concept would behoove governments to satisfy also the social wants which will promote the complete well-being of their citizenry.

In promoting the well-being of our population we have, for instance, a land reform law which aims to improve the lot of our agricultural workers and help them acquire incentives to higher production. They are thus enabled to acquire the wherewithals for their social upliftment. Our potentials for growth require not raw but skilled manpower: the present administration is mobilizing this essential resource potential through extension of our health services and training facilities in order that our manpower can provide the sinews for an intensive and enlightened socioeconomic development.

Health Services

In response to our people's needs, our national health services development has received ample attention in the allocation of our resources.

In the previous year we witnessed the expansion of health services in the rural areas, with the deployment of more physicians, nurses, midwives and sanitary inspectors in our barrios, the establishment of more rural health units, and the procurement for this particular period of P16 million worth of medicines and other supplies, given free to the rural population.

Hospital services were increased and upgraded as 17 government and private hospitals were opened and 76 hospital plans and designs approved for immediate construction. Supplies and medicines worth P1.5 million were channeled to government hospitals for the benefit of our less fortunate countrymen.

We also established a cancer center with the cooperation of the private sector, the first of many cancer centers to be established in various parts of our country.

Medicare

The Congress of the Philippines has under consideration a medicare legislation which seeks to broaden medical care services and extend their coverage to our population. As our resources increase, better coverage and more health facilities will be provided for the health protection of our population as this remains a fixed and a continuing policy of our government.

I have endeavored to give a panoramic view of our national health effort in the belief that our example typifies the efforts of other developing countries in our region. The fact is that much as we would like to accelerate the development of our economic sector, this would not be feasible until and unless we promote the health of our population and train them for their individual roles in the national development effort.

Programs of Common Interest

I understand that deliberations of the regional committee will be concerned not only with individual country programs but also with programs of common interest to member countries. My government is interested and would be prepared to support programs which will provide benefit to all. The Philippines had in the past contributed to a vaccine pool established by the World Health Organization to combat diseases like smallpox which breaks out from time to time in a number of countries.

My government is prepared to continue this participation in the vaccine pool as may be technically and administratively possible. My government is also prepared to share the facilities it possesses for the promotion of health in our region whether this be for the control of diseases, the training of health workers (as exemplified in the Malaria Eradication Training Center in Manila which is a joint government/WHO/US-AID undertaking), research or any health activity of common interest.

I am looking forward to the completion of the present negotiations between the University of the Philippines and the World Health Organization for the organization of courses on national health planning. These courses, I am informed, will be made available to international participants. It is my hope and wish that further- opportunities will become available to my government to cooperate with the World Health Organization and member countries in the area of health. Our common task will be to promote the health of the peoples living in the western Pacific region.

I express the sentiments of the Filipino people, and gratitude to all those in the World Health Organization, especially to the director-general, Dr. Candau, for the self-sacrifice and dedicated effort they have offered in the name of health, but actually in the name of all mankind, And I presume that the sentiments of the Filipinos are paralleled by all peoples of all nations, and all countries of our world.

To all of them, therefore, again, I say thank you, and welcome to our country.

Speech of President Marcos, The Way to Change, October 2, 1968

THE WAY TO CHANGE

By FERDINAND E. MARCOS
President of the Philippines

(SPEECH AT THE OPENING CEREMONIES OF THE 20TH JAYCEE
NATIONAL CONVENTION, UNIVERSITY OF SAN CARLOS,
CEBU CITY, OCTOBER 2, 1968)

It is entirely appropriate that this convention of leading citizens is being held in this old and historic city because the Jaycees are a modern organization founded on the ancient principle of neighborly love. Your services to the community and to the nation have been synonymous with modern progress. For the Jaycee, modernism without spiritual loss is not a dilemma but a challenge.

Samaritans in Modern Setting

It is most significant, therefore, that you, the Samaritans of our age, have congregated here, in this city where the Cross of Christianity first entered the life of the ancient Filipino.

I note that the theme of your convention is "Leadership by Example." I hope this is not merely a reminder to me as the President of the Philippines; if it is, I accept it gratefully. Coming from you, it is not a rebuke either to me or to any other leader but an expression of confidence for it denotes your belief that we can be leaders by example.

Spiritual Heritage

I prefer to view the theme of your convention, however, in another light. I think it reinforces the spiritual heritage that as pointed out at the beginning, we owe to this city as the cradle of Christianity in this country. For there can be no doubt that the example you speak of is example with a moral content.

Only on this understanding can leadership truly perform its appointed role, in any community and any nation, in every field of human endeavor.

Leadership By Preachment

The alternative to leadership by example is, of course, leadership by preachment. It is an alternative that, not being entirely without charm or appeal, has lured many men and many governments.

Human history, indeed, would be incomplete, and less instructive, if it did not include the large and small tragedies that have grown out of this alternative. Thus, in describing the various movements and upheavals in human society before the first World War, the historian Barbara Tuchman has outlined precisely that failing of leadership that led to the collapse of nations and regimes.

Those "Natural" Leaders

On the one hand, there have been rulers in the age of privilege, who proclaimed themselves as "natural" leaders and held authority accordingly. Invariably, such leaderships degenerated because of inaction, indolence and luxury, until they were completely ruined by the weight of their own decay, or by the force of violent social change.

On the other hand, there have been the leaders of revolutionary movements whose leadership consisted entirely of "marvelous paper models" and "tirades of hate and invective." These were revolutionaries of what has been called “the anarchist millennium.” with its episodes of violence and vituperation, a period that sanctified the idea, without the ideals of change.

The “Devils of Loudun”

On the other extreme, in a period characterized by an excess of righteousness, there have been leaderships which perfected the edict as the foundation of authority. This was the kind of leadership that produced “the Devils of Loudun,” those fanatics of divine rulership about whom the late Aldous Huxley wrote with extraordinary vigor and eloquence.

Self-Important Leaders

A common characteristics of the leaderships I have cited is their enormous capacity for self-adulation. Their phenomenal sense of self-importance was their only mandate for leadership. It was inevitable, as history has shown, that society would repudate them before long. This kind of leadership producing nothing for the common good, is self-destroying.

By definition it is incapable of providing an example of conduct that would redound to the public benefit.

The Other Leadership

It is the leadership, on the other hand, that regards itself as the instrument of the public good which is able to lead by example. It is, necessarily an unselfish, self-abnegating leadership.

Fortunately, this leadership can flourish and be meaningful only in an atmosphere of freedom. The sense of responsibility which freedom generates is an indispensable element of sound and productive leadership.

With this sense of responsibility, a leader can in good conscience lead the way to innovation and progress.

Quality of Philippine Leadership

For this reason, a creative and persuasive leadership in this country is doubly difficult, but also, when it succeeds, doubly rewarding in terms of the public welfare. For, as the first democracy in Asia, we have a duty to prove by example the worth of the democratic life.

No matter what the difficulties are, therefore, I have always insisted that the national leadership under my administration shall engage the interest as well as the active support of the citizenry through the only means possible in a democracy—through partnership between government and people through continuous dialogue between the leaders and the followers,

The Administration's Record

It is imperative in this partnership that government, in fulfillment of its classic role, shall lead the way and show it to be fruitful and effective. Over the past two and a half years, the government under this administration has endeavored relentlessly to provide the initiative for social and economic growth.

In line with this objective, we have redoubled the effort in many fields of the public service essential to national progress—in infrastructure, education, health, in the removal of social inequities, and more than anything else, in the renovation of the soul, the heart, and the mind of the Filipino people.

The New Perspectives

To arouse citizen action in putting these and other programs on a firm and continuing basis, the government has had to provide examples of conduct to introduce and to make new perspectives acceptable.

When we started the rice development program, the farmers refused to follow the scientific methods necessary if we were to increase our production. Example was the answer to this refusal. In every community, practically in every barrio chosen for this crash program, leaders were asked to set up examples, model farms, wherein all the inputs necessary in this production program for the field were placed and explained to the local farmers.

In all the programs where we have succeeded, as in infrastructure, in education, and now in the manpower training or human resources, conservation, and health programs, we discarded mere exhortation in favor of action, convinced that only by demonstrating the willpower and the discipline and sacrifice that purposeful action entails may we alter the habits of dependence and complacency that have for years impeded our advance.

Imperative of Progress

To inculcate self-reliance as an imperative of human progress, this administration from the very outset mobilized the skills and resources of government itself in an effort to set an example to the citizenry of the Filipino capacity to work out his own destiny. Fiscal restraint, the elimination of the pork barrel system, the conversion of the different organizations into a working theme, the vigorous action taken by the government within government itself have been instrumental in producing valuable changes among the people themselves.

The Moral Dimension

It is not physical growth that may have been produced that comprises the most significant accomplishment of our people over the past two and a half years. Rather, it is the moral dimension that we have given to Philippine society through the various acts of renewal and self-improvement that people and government have performed together. The will to prosper, the willingness to do the things necessary to transform vision to reality, the ability to withstand trial and face challenge both from friends and enemies— these valuable traits we have preserved and enriched; and through them we have re-stated the faith in ourselves and the strength of character that we as a people have always possessed but often have forgotten.

The People's Role

The government claims no credit for these national traits; I claim no personal credit for them, for it was merely the role of the leader in government to reactivate them for the tasks at hand. And, as befits a free and progressive society, even this has been possible only with the support and encouragement of leaders like you in the Jaycee organization. The people, however, have been the principal instrument for change.

With this mutual cooperation between the national leadership and the population, and the intermediate leadership especially in the private sector, such as the Jaycee, I have great confidence that we shall reach the objectives we have set for government and our people.

Speech of President Marcos, The Right to Human Dignity, October 23, 1968

THE RIGHT TO HUMAN DIGNITY

By FERDINAND E. MARCOS
President of the Philippines

SPEECH BEFORE THE MANILA LIONS CLUB, FIESTA PAVILION,
MANILA HOTEL, OCTOBER 23, 1968

It is always, for me, an edifying experience to join the Lions in observing an occasion of public significance. Your collective experience, drawn from numerous careers and professions, never fails to add a special quality to the event which has inspired your celebration.

Testimony to U. N. Value

United Nations Week gains such extra dimension as you gather today to add your own observance. To those whose hopes about a world organization may have occasionally faltered, I am sure it is reassuring that the Lions Club of Manila, itself a part of a globe-girdling agency of man's advancement, is giving its own testimony to the importance of the United Nations.

I am happy to participate in your observance of U. N. Week today.

The U. N. as Agent of Change

As innovators in many fields, you are undoubtedly in a position of authority to call, as you do with this observance, for increased support of the aims and ideals of the United Nations. For the United Nations, in the 23 years that it has existed, has been consistently engaged in works of innovation and change.

Our celebration of the founding of the United Nations this year is particularly significant, because 1968 has been declared by the General Assembly as International Year for Human Rights. The significance of this lies in the fact that the entire mission that the United Nations has set out to fulfill is addressed to the betterment of human life, and its entire work has consisted of safeguarding and promoting all those rights which make for a better human life.

The Right to Human Dignity

The whole concept of the United Nations is, it seems to me, summarized in that provision of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted 20 years ago, which speaks of "the right to an existence worthy of human dignity."

Though the activities that have been undertaken to enhance human dignity are numerous and varied, I think the activity that holds the pivotal role in the whole complex of United Nations projects is the war on Poverty. Put in another way, it is the U. N. program to accelerate the growth of the underdeveloped nations.

The Development Decade

It is a program to which, indeed, an entire decade was dedicated in 1961. The Development Decade of the 1960s has already, before it is even completed, produced more lasting and significant changes in the conditions of human life than in any other period in history.

This fact alone attests to the two most important assets of the world organization—the spirit of change and the spirit of cooperation. Without the vigorous desire to alter the oppressive conditions in which the majority of the world's population have lived all their lives; and without the unifying influence of the United Nations, which has produced tin-growing cooperation we have seen crossing old barriers of color, race and even ideology—without these two propellants of human progress, the change that has taken place in this decade of development might well have waited for another eternity.

Need for National Development

At the core of the U. N. development program is the campaign to make every nation self-sufficient in food. It may sound paradoxical that the United Nations, where aim is to surmount the boundaries of geography, should work with such intense emphasis on national development. But as I have said earlier, the essence of the United Nations is the promotion of human dignity. The U. N. spirit is nothing if it is not the humanitarian spirit.

This sense of humanity requires that the individual in any nation should live in comfort and decency. Since food is the first measure of a decent life, numerous organs of the United Nations have directed their energies and resources to the program to feed the hungry and the undernourished.

The World Food Program

It is therefore appropriate that the beginning of the Development Decade was also the beginning of the World Food Program, established by the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organization.

In a way, the World Food Program may be said to be a “crash” program, because of the element of emergency that motivated the U. N. and the FAO to organize it. However, this program has now developed into a farsighted undertaking, with the positive aim of providing support for the development program of every member nation.

Problems of the Year 2000

In the past few years, both in and outside the United Nations, there has been increasing effort to look ahead and anticipate the problems of the future. The nature and scope of the problems in the year 2000, for instance, have been the subject of special studies in universities and research foundations, particularly in the United States.

The requirements in food supplies, housing, city planning, employment, and education, in the light of advancing technology, are now being studied and projected. In the more advanced countries, these studies embrace even the future uses of leisure. But in the still underdeveloped countries, the primary concern will remain for many years to come the adequate solution of continuing food shortages.

Solution to Food Shortage

The United Nations for its part is leaving no stone unturned in its search for effective measures to alleviate these food shortages, and, as quickly as possible, usher in an era of abundance. Next year, the so-called Indicative World Plan for Agricultural Development, a study of the world's economic needs and how to meet them, will be released as part of the FAO's Freedom From Hunger campaign.

Hand in hand with this effort is the work being undertaken through the United Nations Children's Fund. Approximately 300 million pre-school children in the world are undernourished, and therefore easily susceptible to a host of diseases, such as yaws, trachoma and tuberculosis. UNICEF is engaged in a world-wide program to correct this dreadful condition.

The Work of the UNDP

Among the leading U. N. projects today to accelerate national development among the growing countries is the United Nations Development Program, started in 1966 to combine the work of two earlier development projects, the Expanded Program of Technical Assistance and the United Nations Special Fund.

The UNDP is proving itself increasingly more useful to the developing nations. At the end of last year, the UNDP had completed 39 surveys of national resources. These surveys are extremely valuable in guiding member nations towards the wisest possible use of their natural resources so as to quicken the growth of the national economy.

Guidance to Investment

Particularly important have been the UNDP's studies and proposals for the proper rate and direction of capital investment in various developing nations. Many successful development projects in these countries were undertaken, and many more promising ones are set for launching, on the strength of UNDP findings.

At the same time, technical assistance, which is, as you will agree, one of the major needs of the growing nations, has been provided by the UNDP. The Philippines itself continues to benefit from this particular UNDP support. Before long, we expect our manpower program to gain new momentum with the support of the UNDP.

Our Potential For Progress

All these add to my resolve to accelerate the development of our country and realize as rapidly as possible the large potential we possess for economic growth. We have procrastinated too long in embarking on this task.

The poverty and deprivation that we are seeking to minimize or eliminate have remained with us for too long. In a sense, this long delay in changing the status quo in our country is the story, on a smaller scale, of the vast hiatus that two-thirds of the world has experienced for centuries.

The Earth's Poor Millions

I have therefore been immensely heartened by the great activity going on under United Nations auspices to rescue the earth's poor millions from the clutches of poverty, disease and ignorance. This too is our aim for the masses of our people; to bring them out of degradation and misery is also the prime endeavor of our government.

I am glad that the opportunity and the means to achieve a greater measure of human dignity for many of our people are growing. But we must realize, as the various organs of the United Nations have long realized, that the work is never quite finished. We must simply continue seeking more opportunities and more means to improve human life. The knowledge that this is necessary, and the willingness to fulfill this necessity, are in the final analysis perhaps the best source of that human dignity whose lasting protection we are all striving for.

Good day and thank you.

Speech of President Marcos, The Contemporary relevance of Antonio Luna's Military Doctrines, October 29, 1968

THE CONTEMPORARY RELEVANCE OF ANTONIO
LUNA'S MILITARY DOCTRINES

By FERDINAND E. MARCOS
President of the Philippines

(SPEECH AT THE CELEBRATION OF THE 102ND BIRTH ANNIVERSARY OF GENERAL ANTONIO LUNA, OCTOBER 29, 1968, FORT SANTIAGO SHRINE, MANILA).

ANTONIO LUNA, the man whose birthday we mark today, occupies a relatively minor rank in the pantheon of Filipino heroes. This is due not certainly to lack of personal gifts—he was just as talented as the other renaissance men that our country produced in the nineteenth century—nor to the quality of his contributions to the Filipino nation but mainly to the controversy that surrounds his violent death in Cabanatuan, Nueva Ecija. Whether justly or unjustly, the mysterious circumstances of his assassination have obscured his very distinct personality and his valuable contributions to the making of the Filipino nation.

A Man of Many Parts

Antonio Luna was a man of many parts. He was a scientist, a writer, an athlete, and a soldier. His accomplishments in the fields of science and literature were slight but they bore the imprint of an original and meticulous mind. However, Luna will be remembered not for his scientific and literary achievements, but for his military accomplishments. It was as a soldier that Luna was transcendent; it was as a commander that he towered above his contemporaries; it was in the field of battle that he was able to express fully the drives of his complex personality. He was certainly our first military genius.

Seven Battles

In the battle of Santo Tomas on May 4, 1899. Luna was wounded in the leg. He was given a medal and on this medal was engraved the legend:

5	de	Febrero	1899—La	Loma
10	de	Febrero	1899—Caloocan
25	de	Febrero	1899—Caloocan
24	de	Abril	1899—Pulilan
25	de	Abril	1899—Calumpit,	Bagbag
27	de	Abril	1899—Apalit,	Rio Grande
4 de Mayo 1899—Sto. Tomas

Seven major battles in four months! And all of them fought with such skill, cunning, and gallantry that even his enemies were moved to proclaim his genius. Seven major battles that are now epics of Filipino heroism!

His Military Contributions

His famous three-tiered defense, known now in history as the Luna Defense Line, succeeded in prolonging the life of the First Philippine Republic and hence of a free Filipino nation. His ideas on guerrilla warfare have remained relevant to the present day.

On Guerrilla Warfare

In La Revolution Filipina, Mabini said: "After the capture of Calumpit bridge by the American forces, due principally to the scarcity of munitions, Luna came to see me in San Isidro and entreated me to aid him in convincing Aguinaldo that the time had come to adopt the system of guerrilla warfare."

Luna had worked out a plan for guerrilla warfare which Aguinaldo later implemented in part. The Luna plan was astonishing in its foresight, in its grasp of the essentials of guerrilla warfare. His ideas on guerrilla warfare anticipated many of the ideas of Mao Tse Tung, Giap and Che Guevara, three of the world's leading authorities on guerrilla warfare.

It was the memory of Antonio Luna that inspired me to reactivate the Special Forces units of the Armed Forces of the Philippines, like Luna, I came to the conclusion that in case of another war, we have to resort ultimately to guerrilla warfare. These Special Forces units are designed to harness to full advantage the resistance capability of our people in the event of war.

Three Lessons

The Philippine-American War and the Second World War have taught us that an organized guerrilla effort, conducted by a properly motivated and ably led population can fight a powerful enemy to a standstill or even possibly defeat him.

These two wars have also taught us that guerrilla warfare must be conducted and coordinated to support and to augment the operations of regular military forces. In this sense, guerrilla warfare must fit into the defense plans of the nation.

And finally these two wars have taught us that the preparation for the waging of guerrilla operations as an instrument of national defense must begin during times of peace or well before the anticipated outbreak of any war.

The Special Forces

The Special Forces units of the Armed Forces are small teams of well-trained, highly skilled, and dedicated men whose tasks in wartime are to organize, to train, to equip and to employ guerrilla forces within designated operational areas. In time of war, they will be the core around which the resistance potential of the people can be developed and they will serve as the link between the resistance groups and the regular military forces. Each Special Forces unit has specialists in operations and intelligence, communications, demolitions, weapons, and field medicine—five skills which are essential to the long-range, independent actions which Special Forces units are expected to carry out. To increase their mobility, they are also trained in parachuting and aerial delivery techniques. In addition to his basic specialization, the Special Forces soldier is trained in one or more additional specializations so that he can readily take the place of any other member of his team who may become a casualty. It is furthermore a requirement for each man to be a good teacher, for a great deal of his time and effort will be spent in training persons with little or no military background. He also undergoes training in public relations in order to help him deal with the civilian population. But above all this, the Special Forces soldier is a skillful and tough combat soldier who knows how to fight with almost any kind of weapon and, if necessary, with his bare hands; who is equally at home in the jungle or in the city, and who can move fast and stealthily through any kind of terrain.

A Network of Resistance Fighters

If we should again be involved in another war, these Special Forces units will immediately organize a network of trained resistance fighters that will respond to a central command. A well-organized and trained citizenry, fighting according to a national strategy, is a powerful force that no aggressor, however superior, can easily defeat.

Homage to Luna

We can pay no greater honor to Antonio Luna than to make our national boundaries secure. We can pay him no greater homage than to absorb his military doctrines into the defense plans of the nation.

Like Luna, we, too, must be capable of saying: "The Filipino people want independence. I will defend it until I die, thus complying with the oath to my flag."

Thank you and good day.

Address of President Marcos at the Opening Ceremonies of the Convention and Symposium Workshop on Modern Police Administration and Crime Prevention, April 14, 1969

The Policeman as Professional

IT IS A pleasure to greet the participants in this seminar and workshop. I am conscious of the great contribution that you are making, even merely through your attendance here, to the solution of the peace and order problem. The new insights, knowledge and skills that you will gain from this seminar-workshop will hasten the process of reform that our police system has long needed.

The essence of this process of reform is modernization. I am glad that this seminar-workshop is concerned with modern police administration and modern crime prevention, because the entire problem of police efficiency today consists of how we can change the antiquated methods and attitudes that have prevailed in our police system for years. In their place, we must now implant new ones into the 1,478 police departments around the country.

It is this need for modernization in our police forces that lies behind the passage of the Police Act of 1966, which created the Police Commission. It was one of my immediate aims as soon as I assumed the Presidency to obtain congressional approval of this law, so that we could begin without further delay the crucial work of reform in our police services.

Until 1966, our police forces were operating under a system created in 1917. With the establishment of the Police Commission, we made the first real attempt to break away from that ancient system and formulate a new one turned to the large and complex needs of our time.

The statistics gathered by the Police Commission immediately after it was organized in September 1966 give a vivid picture of the deterioration that had in as a result of inadequate police methods and facilities. Of 30,033 policemen around the country, only 13,516, or 45 per cent, possessed any form of civil service eligibility. What is even more appalling, 19,822, or 66 percent, had not undergone any kind of training relevant to police work.

Local police forces were, in almost every respect, unprepared to perform effective police work. Politics, more than anything else, determined the leadership and composition of a local police department. Men with no more qualification for the job than a slavish loyalty to the political lord of the community were appointed to the police force. When they were not bodyguards of their patrons, or terrorists for election purposes, they grew fat on the job, nourished by corruption and the comfortable knowledge that they were protected as long as their political sponsors remained entrenched.

The needs of the community were seldom, if ever, taken into consideration in the organization and maintenance of the local police force. In numerous towns around the country the local police force had only anywhere from three to 10 members. Out of the 1,478 police departments, only 248 had more than 20 members.

Inadequate equipment has always been one of the major deficiencies of police forces everywhere in the country. While criminals constantly improved their own means of speedy escape and mobility, most of our local police forces had absolutely no motor vehicles.

In the field of communication, the situation was even more deplorable. With respect to firearms, smugglers, pirates and other criminals have been known to be better equipped. Where any kind of respectable firearms were in the possession of local policemen, most if not all of them were in either untrained or ill-trained to use them effectively.

It was the incredible lack of equipment that compelled me to release P10 million from the savings of the Executive Department to alleviate the primitive conditions under which local police forces had to work. You will recall that no funds were provided by the Appropriations Act for this purpose.

To be sure, many of these conditions still remain today. But a very encouraging start has been made. Much of the headway we have already made is in the form of training courses and facilities to increase the knowledge and efficiency of our police forces. As a corollary, we have also undertaken a vigorous “weeding out” program to remove policemen found to have commuted venalities.

I must stress the importance of police training because it is the key to a truly effective and dependable police force. The Police Commission, in response to the need for skilled and efficient law enforcers, has launched a number of training courses. Among these are the Chiefs of Police Course, the Supervisory Development Course, the Personnel Development Course, and specialized courses, including those for criminal investigation, juvenile delinquency control, questioned documents examination, firearms investigation, police records management, weapons and marksmanship, and traffic control administration.

Today, we have, besides a national police academy, five regional police academies. We have also inaugurated a basic training program for policemen in the lower grades and for recruits. We expect to train about 1,000 policemen every quarter under this program.

I am determined that professionalization be brought into the ranks of policemen all over the country. As participants in this seminar-workshop, you will surely realize the importance of new knowledge gained. The satisfaction I brought by continuous self-improvement, which is really all that professionalization means, makes not only for increased self-respect but a greater vigor in the performance of one’s work.

To provide an even more stable foundation for the policeman’s profession, I propose to the various universities that they establish a program for the training and education of police officers. This will be an important and decisive step towards the professionalization of our police forces. The training program we are at present undertaking are, by their very nature, acts of expediency, to accelerate our efforts to transform existing police forces into more effective agencies.

A college course in police methods and management will be the best guarantee for the creation of a professional officer class in our police forces. I call on our universities to make this significant contribution to a stable and progressive society.

Again, let me express my pleasure in discovering that you are actively cooperating, through this seminar-workshop, to make the Administration’s police improvement program a success. You are pioneers in the historic mission to restore police work to its rank as a profession, undoubtedly one of the noblest in society.

Address of President Marcos at the opening ceremonies of the 4th Annual Convention of the Public Schools Health Personnel Association, April 20, 1969

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the opening ceremonies of the 4th Annual Convention of the Public Schools Health Personnel Association
[Delivered on April 20, 1969]

Health and the Nation's Future

FOR MOST OF us, we are only as good, as useful and as effective as our health today. Health is therefore the very foundation of an active and useful life. Therefore the promotion of health is always an urgent business of society, and under the present administration it has occupied, from the start, the very highest priority.

I am therefore deeply gratified to see health promotion rising to a new importance in our public schools. This convention is the warranty of this fresh emphasis on the upbuilding of the health of our youth.

It is not always true, of course, that health is the foundation, of human achievements. Physical adversities can sometimes shape a character of steel, such as we saw in Apolinario Mabini, and it was a consumptive, Marcelo H. del Pilar, who gave us the glory of La Solidaridad. Sometimes, men under great emotional strain that is injurious to health unexpectedly outdo themselves in achievement and performance. I found myself in such a situation, many years ago, when inside a prison cell, wracked by the traumatic events of a court trial, I gave myself entirely to the task of reviewing for the bar with results that surpassed my own best expectations.

But these exceptions merely prove the rule — that the health of the nation determines its own level of energy and vigor and industry, and therefore, ultimately, its performance in social and economic development.

This is especially true in the countryside, where most of our people live. I have seen malnutrition taking a heavy toll in wan and enfeebled children, and have confirmed for myself the observation that a very high proportion of our people in the rural areas are malnourished. As you know, I have been occupied lately with visits to the rural areas and have taken advantage of these trips to meet with the leaders of our people at the grassroots — the barrio captains and the barrio councils. They tell me that their leading problem is still the lack of adequate health and medical care facilities. I am glad, incidentally, that I have been able to visit our people in the rural areas to learn first-hand from them the problems that they face. The office of the Presidency is always in danger of being isolated and insulated from the realities, and it has been my purpose and determination from the beginning to prevent this.

As I have always indicated in my public statements including my message to Congress, the improvement of health services for the people, especially for those in the rural communities, is a principal program of this administration.

The reason for this emphasis on rural health is clear. About 82 per cent of our people are medically indigent, that is to say, this inordinately large segment of our populace live and die without the benefit of proper medical attention? And about 80 per cent of our people reside in the rural areas. Hence, it is obvious that the people most affected by inadequate medical care are rural people.

Just to highlight a point about the rural health situation, I should cite the finding of a Mindanao survey in 1966 which showed that 60 per cent of our people die without ever seeing a doctor or a nurse.

And yet, the Philippines is one of the major providers of medical and nursing skills abroad. Each year we find hundreds of our doctors, nurses, and medical technologists leaving the Philippines to serve, ironically, in more developed societies like the USA. This “brain drain” adversely affects our health program, and this is a problem that I have directed the Manpower Development Council to attend to.

At the present time, our Department of Health is engaged in a rural health program that seeks to provide health and medical services to 80 per cent of our people. As of July 1967 a total of 1,352 rural health units served the same number of municipalities. By July of last year although additional units were created to increase the total of 1,459, still a number of municipalities remain unserved. Furthermore, of the existing rural health units, one thousand are not completely staffed and are operating with inadequate supplies and medicines. We are seeking to correct these inadequacies this year. And I am calling on our doctors and nurses and medical technologists who are inclined to go abroad because of material inducements to consider that they have a role to perform here — not in the cities where medical and health services are adequate but in the countryside where the bulk of our people live and where facilities leave much to be desired.

We are trying to do our best. Through our rural health program the government is providing free medicines for the people. In 1965 the per capita expenditure of our government was four centavos. Today for free medicine we spend 52 centavos per person. In other words we are distributing throughout the country about P16 million worth of free medicines as compared to only P1.3 million in 1965.

We have also made arrangements with the U.S. Agency for International Development for the establishment of 500 nutrition centers for children all over the country. At the same time we are engaged in a campaign to show the need for better food, for we are all well aware of the nutritional deficiencies of our people. We are particularly concerned about malnutrition among children of pre-school age.

We are at present engaged, in association with the World Health Organization, in three areas of public health — malaria eradication, cholera control studies, and the planning of a sewerage system for the greater Manila area.

We have also established a cancer center with the cooperation of the private sector, the first of many cancer centers to be established in various parts of the country.

We have continuing programs for the control of snail fever or schistosomiasis and the control methods are associated in a large measure with developmental activities such as drainage operations for land reclamation, proper irrigation design and construction, and scientific rice culture methods, not to speak of the sanitary measures which are a responsibility of the National Health Services.

I am gratified to see the medicare bill passed by Congress which seeks to broaden medical care services and extend their coverage to our population. As our resources increase, better coverage and more health facilities will be provided for the health protection of our population as this, remains a fixed and a continuing policy of your government.

I have endeavored to give some of the highlights of our national health program which you will observe to be crucial to our national development effort. The fact is that much as we would like to accelerate socio-economic development this is not feasible until and unless we promote the health of our population and train them for their individual roles in nation-building.

You who are in the public school system perform important roles in the national health program.

There is a need for the education of our students on the health needs of the nation and how they themselves may, during and after school years, participate in the national effort at improving the health of our people.

We need healthy bodies as well as healthy minds, but while these are desirable in themselves, these are pre-requisites for our ultimate desire to have a highly developed society, enjoying the fruits of its labor and rendering quality to the lives of the people.

I trust that this convention will not just be an excuse for having a well-deserved respite from your duties in the public schools but an occasion for focusing truly on the health needs of the nation.

You are called upon to exercise a tremendous responsibility — building the health of the young. This is one of the most important tasks that your nation can I assign to any one. I have no doubt that in this convention you will take fresh inspiration and acquire a stronger resolve to excel in the performance of this vital responsibility to your schools, to the children in the schools, and to the future of your country and people.

Address of President Marcos at the First Session of the 10th Governing Body Meeting of the Asian Productivity Organization, April 29, 1969

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the First Session of the 10th Governing Body Meeting of the Asian Productivity Organization

[Delivered on April 29, 1969]

The Ethic and Discipline of Productivity

I HAVE ALWAYS welcomed every opportunity to speak before international conferences held in my country. Over the past months, I have had occasion to address a number of such conferences, and each time it has been a great pleasure for me. I am, however, especially delighted to address the Governing Body Meeting of the Asian Productivity Organization first, for sentimental reasons, because the APO came officially into existence in this country by means of the Signing Conference which started in April 1961; and second, because your aim is identical to the major objectives our government has set for itself the past three and a half years.

On behalf of our people, I welcome you to our country. I am certain that your deliberations will again, as all your other meetings have done, evolve historic solutions to many of the economic and social problems shared; by the countries of Asia.

I have said that the Philippine Government for the past three and a half years has been engaged in a program whose objective is identical to yours, which is, as the Preamble to your Charter states, the improvement of living standards. I have long recognized that greater productivity is the key to the attainment of this goal. Accordingly, the first endeavors of the government after I assumed office as President more than three years ago were concerned with stepping up production, especially in foodstuff. These endeavors are continuing, are in fact now being carried out on a broader front to include production for export.

The projects of the Asian Productivity Organization, particularly those seeking to inculcate new attitudes and develop new skills for greater productivity, are therefore of special value to me, as a confirmation of the validity and the urgency of my country's own efforts to faring greater economic security to four people.

I believe you are aware of my country's keen interest in regional cooperation as a means of accelerating progress among the peoples of Asia.

Last year, I visited three of our neighboring countries in the hope that, with the leaders of these countries, I could find new means with which the partnership forged among them earlier could be strengthened and broadened. In the course of these visits, I had occasion to explore with the leaders of each host country the possibility of bilateral as well as multilateral arrangements which would increase economic cooperation between and among the countries of the region.

I discovered that there is a unanimous desire among Asian nations to harness their rich, natural and human resources as quickly as possible and convert their long existing potential for prosperity into actual conditions of greater comfort and abundance. This unanimity of purpose, coupled with the vast reservoir of goodwill based to a large extent on ancient blood ties and historical associations, is our best assurance that cooperative endeavor among the countries of Asia will engage our best skills and energies.

I am glad that organizations like the Asian Productivity Organization (APO) are constantly adding to the will and competence for Asian development, because the problem of Asian poverty poses an enormous challenge which cannot be met except by the utmost in human resources. In point of population, we are the most numerous inhabitants of the globe. The spectre of famine is constantly with us. A regional average birth rate of 3 per cent increases this already terrifying spectre every year. On the other hand, we have not, in terms of goods and services, grown at a pace even approaching our annual rate of population increase.

It is clear that the problem of survival in Asia, in the face of the odds that confront us, calls for revolutionary changes in the traditional patterns of economy and social life in this part of the world. It calls for a miracle surpassing the miracle of the seven fishes. This is the miracle of modern productivity.

It is a miracle that, fortunately enough, we are capable of bringing forth. For the overcoming of the problem of Asian poverty is miraculous only in the sense of exceeding the limits of achievement established by the habits of the past. It consists of radical transformations which would change the techniques of production and increase the capacity for work.

To my mind, productivity is therefore both an economic and a spiritual fact.

In its economic sense, productivity is designed to produce maximum results with a minimum investment of money, men and resources. In other words, if we could obtain maximum output of goods and services from a minimum input of capital, we would be achieving that revolutionary, and in a sense miraculous, development in our economic life — which is to win the race against poverty.

It is indispensable to increased productivity that we invest more money and energy in research and in acquiring new scientific and technological knowledge. The essence of productivity is efficiency, efficiency in management and productive labor as a means of lowering costs. It is inevitable, in the process of economic growth, that wage increases are asked, and given. Unless management and labor fulfill together the responsibility of bringing about cost-decreasing measures to overcome inevitable wage increases the entire economic life of the nation may be nothing more than a spectacle of stagnation. A great modern sage once said that the nations of Asia must run just to stand still. The productive capacity of a people, if they are to go beyond mere stagnation, must therefore be pushed beyond a trot, into a full sprint. For this, the peoples of Asia need endurance and sacrifice.

In its economic sense, productivity must therefore take into consideration that in the long run the factory that uses better trained men and employs the most efficient industrial technology and management know-how will turn out more and better quality products that will sell at lower cost and yet assure maximum profits to the entrepreneur and maximum benefits to the country at large.

I think you are now familiar with the breakthrough we have achieved in making the Philippines self-sufficient in its basic food. Through the development and cultivation of a new variety of rice, the IR-8, or the so-called “miracle rice,” we have not only transformed our country from an importer to an exporter of rice, but also enabled other countries to achieve the same transformation or, at least, attain the objective of rice self-sufficiency.

As late as 1965, the Philippines imported P264 million worth of rice. In the three and a half years since then, the revolution in rice production has enabled the Philippines to do away with its traditional yearly rice imports. On the contrary, last year, for the first time in this country’s history, we exported rice. A total of 42,700 metric tons of rice were sold abroad, where the demand, particularly, I understand, in Indonesia, Singapore, Ceylon, India, Burma and Hongkong, has been increasing.

I have been told that in Burma, the Philippines “miracle rice” is now called Rizal rice. I consider this particularly apt, and symbolic, because my country’s national hero, Dr. Jose Rizal, sounded the most eloquent and consistent summons to the Filipino people to exercise those qualities of mind and spirit which eventually, in our time, produced and spread out the “miracle rice”.

I understand, too, that Pakistan, which used to import rice, now exports the cereal, from harvests that were possible with “miracle rice” cereals obtained from the Philippines. South Vietnam, I am told, has replaced its traditional rice varieties with IR-8; and Hongkong, which used to purchase much of its rice requirements from the United States, is now beginning to obtain rice from the Philippines instead.

By way of celebrating the idea of productivity, I am happy to announce too that we in the Philippines will soon obtain self-sufficiency also in corn, fish and meat production. Our past condition with respect to these basic food items reflected the great irony in Asia, that while there was a wealth of resources, as for instance in fish, we nevertheless had to import them from other countries. We are determined, and I am sure every other Asian nation is determined, that by means of a relentless productivity program this situation will soon cease to exist.

I need not tell you that whatever gains are achieved in one Asian country in its efforts to increase productivity in basic foods will automatically redound to the common benefit of the entire Asian region.

Owing to our country's own rapid expansion in population, which, at 3.5 per cent a year, is said to be among the highest in the world, we in the Philippines are also endeavoring to upgrade the efficiency of our factories and industrial plants, establish new industries and find new uses for the waste from our factories.

We are embarked on a program of industrialization, creating more job opportunities both through industrial expansion and manpower development. Aware of the importance of investment in accelerating the growth of productivity, we passed last year a comprehensive Investments Incentives Law, under which a new Board of Investments is now at work to determine the areas of investment priority and provide direction to entrepreneurship in the country.

Similarly, we need more technological and management know-how, both of them basic ingredients in the process of discovering how maximum results may be obtained by way of improving the standards of living of our people. We have just established some of the institutes, in economics and business administration, that are required by this objective of increased productivity.

I have been informed that your organization, in trying to promote productivity consciousness among peoples of the member-countries, has found it necessary to launch a continuing information program. It is because I am thoroughly in agreement with such a program that, nearly two years ago, I readily approved the establishment in Manila of the Regional Information Unit. For its operations and maintenance during its first two years, we have contributed $100,000, so that it can effectively serve its purpose as the development and distribution center of productivity knowledge and information among the APO's member-countries.

I understand that your intensified information program will be highlighted by the celebration of Asian Productivity Year in 1970, and the publication of general as well as technical literature designed to quicken scientific and technological awareness in the region.

I assure you of continuing Philippine support and sympathy for this important program.

There is also, as I said at the outset, a spiritual significance to productivity. Beyond the new and expanded technology that goes into increased productivity is the new outlook that a whole set of revised or altered habits and values inevitably produces in every man. Increased capacity for production is in direct proportion to the growth of individual, and ultimately national, sense of achievement. This is the ethic and discipline of productivity.

Until enough individuals in one nation shed the habits of sloth and complacency, progress will remain an illusion. The hard facts of contemporary life, and I dare say of the life that our children face in the years ahead, summon everyman and woman living today to carry a part of the burden of reorganizing the economic order to enable as many human beings as possible to live in greater dignity and abundance. There is no place today for indifference and idleness; work and action have become the moral obligation of every man.

To lead a really meaningful life today, to rise above mere physical existence, to participate in the work of progress, is to me the ultimate aim of productivity. The will power, the self-respect, the constancy of one's belief in self-advancement: these are the principal tools with which every single undeveloped nation can redeem itself from the tragedy and humiliation of eons of poverty. That we have begun to realize this, and to suit our conduct to this new awareness, seems to me to be the most important and most decisive step we have yet taken towards Asian progress.

I congratulate you for your historic role in increasing our place since that step was first taken, towards that long and desired goal.

Address of President Marcos at the Opening Program of the 1969 Annual Convention of School Superintendents
April 30, 1969

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Opening Program of the 1969 Annual Convention of School Superintendents

[Delivered on April 30, 1969]

Education As Social Involvement

ADDRESSING YOU HAS almost become an annual ritual. Every year I come to deliver a speech and every year you gather to listen to it. This has come to be so regular that I am sure I would be very unhappy if next year you will not invite me as your guest speaker.

Whenever I speak to the public schools superintendents of this country, I am aware of the singularly critical role which they play in whole communities in this country — the work of communicating knowledge and of keeping our population open to the possibilities of education.

It is as educators that you are gathered here today, and I should like now to inquire with you into the problems of public school education today and how these problems have vastly complicated your work as educators and my work as an executive of government.

In the past, the foremost problem that we have had to confront was the question of providing free education for all and on the elementary school level only. That is a goal that has now been, I hope, largely realized.

This is one of the reasons why we had the Marcos prefabricated school-building program. Now, I heard a critic say one time, “But why are these prefabricated schoolhouses called Marcos prefabricated schoolhouses? This is unfair, this is unusual, the President utilizing, and attaching, his name to the school with which he has nothing to do.” Well, I have some interesting news for these critics. I designed the Marcos prefabricated schoolhouse and I designed it way back in 1945, towards the end of the war. I designed it here, in this part of the country, Northern Luzon.

Every time that we recovered a province, or a city, from the enemy I had to establish a civil government, and establishing a civil government, the first problem that faced me was education or more precisely, rebuilding damaged or destroyed schoolhouses. The schoolchildren and the parents and the teachers would come to me and say, it’s time now that we start to teach and to educate our children again. We have had four years delay but we must now start.

And so we started building these schoolhouses but they were unwieldy, and the engineers could not come up with a handy design, so I finally sat down and designed the Marcos prefabricated building. It has been improved upon since then.

And the same thing happened in 1965. When I became the President, I asked for a design of a new schoolhouse. I wanted a prefabricated unit so that it could be built in not more than three days. And they could not come up with a good design; all the designs submitted needed one week to build, or were so complicated that they did not meet the requirements I demanded. So I went back to the old design of the liberation days, the Marcos prefabricated school building. But neither that or anything else explains the problem that we had at that time.

If you will remember, when I became President, the deficiency in schoolrooms was 92,000 schoolrooms. All of you are aware of the fact that this deficiency was recorded in your respective jurisdiction, 92,000 schoolrooms. And the previous administrations, of course, just folded up their arms and said, "we cannot meet that deficiency now." But under my administration, we had to start somewhere, and that is the very essence not only of leadership but also of government.

Government, I have discovered, cannot close its eyes to the nagging problems by merely not taking action, because this compounds the injury upon the body politic, and to our society. A leader has to accept the weaknesses of our people and build up strength. It is futile for a leader to say, we will do that tomorrow, we will do that next year even if the resources will not allow it. The problem must be thought out now, today. And thinking out such a problem, the first step must be taken, no matter how short such a step may be.

But in the Marcos prefabricated school program, we had had the advance from the war damage payments, plus the reparations payments to prime our efforts. I insisted that the reparations payments that were going into factories for the industrialists be rechanneled back to the people, to whom the reparations payments from Japan were in fact supposed to be paid. I do not know if you are up-to-date on the reparations payments, but do you know the total payments that Japan was supposed to make to us? Well, the total reparations payments to us by Japan were supposed to amount to $550 million. Now this is more than two billion pesos and this is supposed to be paid over a period of 25 years.

Then, a loan was supposed to be extended to us in the amount of $250 million or P1 billion. Now, before I came in as President all this money was being frittered away in bills, providing, I presume, assistance for the industrial sector. I will not go into the pros and cons of this assistance, but I decided that reparations should be paid back to the greater majority of the people, for whom the reparations payments were being made. The total payments annually are $25 million dollars or P100 million.

Now, this is not very much compared to what we actually spend on the school building program. We have spent in the past several years anywhere from P150 to 250 million. And there are many people who always ask me where did you get all this money? I did not steal this money, I often say, but we cut expenditures and we removed a large number of the pensionados in the government. This is one of my basic speeches in meetings with any group whatsoever, and I emphasize how we removed from the service, pensionados numbering about 7000. I don't believe that many of you know about this.

There are many critics who now seem to find many faults in the administration. I discovered only lately that some of them were those whom I removed from the government for being pensionados in the government. What is a pensionado? They do not go to office, except on pay day when they get their salary. And you will be aghast and shocked at their numbers. There were 7000 of them, and do you know what their salaries were? Double that of your salaries. Some of them were getting from P500 to P1,500, even P2000, a month.

I called the leaders of the Nacionalista Party and the Liberal Party, and even the Independent Party, and I pleaded with them. I told them, "You know, we are all agreed that we have to cut expenses. We cannot continue paying this unbelievably large group of pensionados, and so we have to remove them, all 7000 of them. We cut out 17 generals from the Armed Forces of the Philippines, as a start. I was taken aback, therefore, though I laughed about it, when I saw a press release later, to the effect that some of the Generals who had been removed in the first year of my administration were now supporting the opposition candidates. Well, that is their choice.

But I wonder what would have happened if we had kept those Generals. They would be on my side now, but they would still be smuggling contraband into the Philippines. Because one of the reasons they were removed was that they were involved, as some reports indicated, in smuggling. And when I asked them for alternatives, to choose either facing court martial or resigning, they resigned. If they were not really guilty they could have chosen the court martial. They were my friends, very close friends of mine, some of them were with me in many battles. But that is one of the burdens of the Presidency; sometimes you cannot decide on the basis of friendship, and sometimes discoveries about friends compel you to the old classic conclusion: "God protect me from my friends, I'll take care of my enemies."

And so we did all of this and now have probably about 50,000 schoolrooms out of the 92,000-schoolrooms deficiency but we are still moving forward.

This year we are going to build about 14,000 schoolhouses of three rooms each, most of them coming from reparations. But now we have the problem of high schools. When I became President, there were only four barrio high schools. The present enrollment in barrio high schools is 200,000 whereas before it was only 2000 students. This is an increase of 100 per cent, from 2000 to 200,000.

Now, there is a new development: the community colleges. I don't know if all of you know about this yet but in 1966 there was one in Urdaneta, Pangasinan; in 1968 another was set up in San Fernando, La Union, then still another in Lucban, Quezon. In 1970, there will be an estimated 20 community colleges. Now this is something new and we are trying to support it with all the funds available from the national government. I would like to congratulate Mr. Orata here, publicly, and all the superintendents who have had anything to do with the colleges.

I have always espoused the policy of dispersal of high schools and universities, but now we are met with a problem, and this is the problem of the quality of instruction.

Increasingly, our attention has turned from the expansion of educational opportunity to the question of what kind of education we must provide our youth. Increasingly, we have had to re-examine our educational goals under prevailing social conditions and realities, in the context of a society undergoing rapid change.

This has been, in fact, the special concern of our educational system during the past decade. Great changes have been effected in that system, including such things as the revision of the curriculum, the improvement of teacher training, and the expansion of educational services. We have even lately attempted a manpower development program and on an emergency basis.

At the heart of this new thinking, this new orientation, we can perceive, I think, the under-current of an emerging involvement on the part of our schools with the work of changing and building a nation.

It has been said time and again by critics of Philippine education that education in this country has, as I have said, succeeded in changing the destinies of individuals, of raising them to lives of prosperity, but it has not succeeded in transforming their society; that it has not helped this nation rise above its history.

This is not a new call to action. There exists today within our educational system the seeds of such a renewal on which we can build. But they are seeds threatened by drought, by apathy on the part of the men who make them grow and should make them bear fruit. There is new life throbbing in our midst, and it is up to us to see that it does not die.

But I'm afraid that I speak in generalities.

In the specific, this means to my mind that you and the schools must live "in" society. Our schools must play a real role in the shaping of the communities to which they belong, and you as stewards of these schools must ever open them to such involvement.

Manpower training for instance. As you know, only 33 per cent of those aged 13 to 14 are in school; the 65 per cent are out of school. Now this problem is being met by some of the programs we have established, principally by manpower training. Manpower training was an idea that I had hoped to have implemented back in 1966. It is a part of our policy of conservation. Many people are taken aback when I say manpower is a part of our conservation efforts. They ask me what it has to do with conservation. And I reply that conservation of natural resources includes the conservation of the most vital, the most valuable of all natural resources — human resources.

The out-of-school youth, as it were, are a part of our human resources, of our natural resources, which we seem to have discarded or abandoned. They become burdens for you and me, when they are neglected. In time, they will pose a threat to peace and order, a threat to our stability, to our free institutions, I if left to drift aimlessly. Yet we did nothing about them in the past. We delayed, action. Nobody wanted to come to grips with this problem. Always we delayed, we postponed, we procrastinated until the problem had grown to very serious proportions.

You play a very important role in this, and perhaps since the percentages indicate that 35 per cent are affected by our educational program and 65 per cent are not, the manpower training program may ultimately become a very vital force for the survival of our democracy. And this is, of course, in your hands.

Allow me to congratulate you again, and to thank you for your generosity in everything that you have done in the conduct of public affairs. Rest assured that you have in me a friend, who will place at your disposal within legal and moral limits the powers and prerogatives of the Presidency, to advance our march to the objectives of the educational plan.

Address of President Macapagal on the Philippine Air Force Day, May 2, 1962

Address
of
His Excellency Diosdado Macapagal
President of the Philippines
On the Philippine Air Force Day

[Delivered on May 2, 1962]

THE PHILIPPINE AIR FORCE

I APPEAR before you today on this the celebration of the 27th Anniversary of the Philippine Air Force, in three capacities: first, as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the Philippines; second, as President of our young Republic; and third, as a fellow citizen.

I have followed with great interest the progress made by the Philippine Air Force. Our Air Force of today is a far cry from the small section of the Philippine Constabulary that it was 27 years ago. Because of the foresight, ambition, and devotion to duty of that handful of pioneers that started the Air Force in 1935, nurtured by the skills and valor of your comrades and yourselves during World War II, the Philippine Air Force has now reached the stage of rapid development in keeping pace with the accelerated progress in science and technology. I am happy to note that under the able management of its Commander and his staff, the Air Force has its modernization program well under way. It is a credit to all of you that our fighter units flying modern jet aircraft and our aircraft control and warning radar sites are now combat-ready.

Noncombat missions of the Philippine Air Force have been well accomplished. Fresh in our minds is the calamity that struck our countrymen recently in Eastern Mindanao.* I note with satisfaction the great help extended by the Air Force in the speedy distribution of medicines and relief goods. Almost daily, I know of patients being airlifted to Manila from different parts of the country.

Neither spectacular nor publicized, yet important contributions to our economic development, are the missions performed by the Air Force in coordination with other branches of the Government. The Philippine Air Force has been working with appropriate government agencies in the Photogrammetry Project, in industrial survey and planning, in irrigations, in reforestation, and in plant pest and disease control.

I am glad that your Commanding General, General Pedro Molina, has started an air education program, aimed such that the potentials of air transportation may be availed of to integrate many dispersed and remote areas into our country. I do not mind disclosing (although before I already had esteem for General Molina) that after knowing more of him my esteem has developed into admiration and a liking for him as a person and a respect for his leadership as a military officer. Because of this and because of my high assessment of the role of the Air Force in the defense and development of our country, you can be sure that although our Air Force is already a fine one, yet with me as your Commander-in-Chief, my Administration will give full support to the Philippine Air Force to become an even finer organization than ever before.

While I am interested in the Air Force as a whole, I must confess that I have special concern for the enlisted men in the Air Force. I wish to mention, therefore, that it has given me joy to be able to provide in the national budget which I have submitted to Congress an increase of pay for the enlisted men, and in addition, I and General Molina have agreed on plans to provide better housing facilities for the enlisted men and their families.

The primary mission of the Philippine Air Force is to provide air defense for our country. Under present conditions where weapons systems are either being developed or are obsolescent, it would take enormous sums of money to even approach the state of weaponry of many other countries in the world. However, this should not detract from our responsibilities to our people, to our friends, and to those that follow us. We have to maintain an efficient and respectable, although compact, Philippine Air Force, with sufficient military posture to be able, if need be, to defend our country, and also to be a capable partner to fulfill our commitments to our many allies in this part of the globe. May I assure our allies, the representatives of some of whom are present, that if and when the call of freedom is sounded, pilots of the Philippine Air Force will be in the air to fight with the nations of the free world in defense of liberty, human dignity and the free way of life that we all cherish.

At this point, I would like to extend my appreciation to the United States Government for the assistance rendered in the development of our Air Force. The present state of modernization of the Philippine Air Force would not have been achieved were it not for the $78 million worth of aircraft, electronic and other valuable equipment, supplies, and training of personnel received by it from the United States. As weapons systems become even more sophisticated and expensive, further expansion and modernization of our air arm would well depend upon additional assistance from our allies and friends.

Because active air defense is its primary role, the Philippine Air Force has to be continuously on its toes—keeping its personnel proficient and maintaining the weapons and support systems in shape. However, other commands of the Armed Forces, the civilian component of the Government, and the population as a whole, have roles to play in air defense. The Philippine Air Force can help these elements perform their passive air defense functions by actively assisting in their training, and by passing on information to our people so that all our efforts may be integrated in the event our sacred skies are transgressed.

Our country is today faced with many serious and pressing problems. Even as you of the Philippine Air Force keep yourselves in fighting trim and render the other socio-economic functions you have been performing, there are still other fields in which you could contribute towards the solution of some of our country's problems. Since air power includes everything in aviation, the development of civil aviation in our country may parallel that of the Philippine Air Force. I feel that the Philippine Air Force as the military air arm of the country should take a more active part in the development of civil aviation. Because of the very nature of our geography, air transportation, among all modes, appears the most charged with the probability of effecting far-reaching changes in our cultural and economic life. The numerous mountain ranges and seas that separate our provinces have long posed grave problems of transportation. These same natural barriers to free movement of persons and property tend to hamper the socio-economic progress of our country. The government is embarking into an ambitious airport and airways development program, but you must realize that our coffers are not unlimited. There are other ways in which civil aviation could be promoted.

You of the Philippine Air Force have the technical skills, you are familiar with the inherent advantages of air transportation, and you travel to different parts of the country in the accomplishment of your different missions. You can assist by actively encouraging the patronage of airplanes for transportation, thereby bringing about an increased demand for air travel, thus making it attractive enough for more investors to organize airline companies, and complete the cycle by bringing down costs and therefore rates to enable the mass of our people to afford air transportation. In this manner, the contribution to the economic development of our country will be tremendous because not only will an air transport industry to be developed, but the inherent benefits of the airplane shall reach each and every part of our country and the majority of our masses could afford to travel by air for reasons of pleasures, convenience, economic advantage, or necessity.

The Philippine Air Force has made magnificent progress during the past 27 years. The future demands an even faster rate of development. You, as the first line of defense of our country, have a unique responsibility to our countrymen. I shall continue to support your efforts as I have done in the past. However, do not expect everything handed to you on a silver platter. You shall have to work even harder; in these difficult times, you shall have to do without some of the things you need. I know that you shall meet the challenges without flinching, knowing that the material rewards shall be meager. Rest assured, however, that as you accomplish your different missions, you shall have the undying gratitude of your country and your people.

Again, I salute the officers and men of the Philippine Air Force. Our Air Force has a glorious if brief record of dedication to country. The exploits of its combat airmen under appallingly adverse circumstances compare with the saga of valor displayed by air heroes in other lands. As I see our pilots in their planes rise in majesty through our skies, I thrill to the thought that you symbolize the dream of our people for a better life. In the same manner that our airmen in their missions rise higher and higher into the infinite skies, let us all at this critical time of our history labor together so that our people too shall rise higher and higher in their level of livelihood to the end that all Filipinos shall enjoy a life of abundance in dignity and freedom.

* The President was referring to the flood that wrought heavy damage to property (estimated at more than P12 million).

Address of President Marcos at the Closing Ceremonies of the 16th National Convention of Manufacturers and Producers, May 16, 1969

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Closing Ceremonies of the 16th National Convention of Manufacturers and Producers

[Delivered on May 16, 1969]

An End to Economic Isolation

I CONGRATULATE THE producers and manufacturers for a very successful convention. I am happy to be here with you to keep this annual appointment. It is my hope and intention to be able to keep the same appointment next year. It is going to be your 17th convention, and the number 17 is sacred to many religions and, as you know, it is also a symbol of good luck, especially to me.

Your convention this year is, in my opinion, above all, an act of courage and honesty on the part of Philippine industry. I say this because this year, you have dared to make a candid reappraisal of your role in national development, and, particularly, your social responsibility as the economic organ of our society.

It is often said, cynically, that the modern corporation is an entity without a soul. The implication is that business is bereft of conscience and is impervious to any appeal except that of profit. This convention has asserted the conscience of the Philippine industry, in relation to national goals, proving that private enterprise, as the agent of innovation and social change, can be directed by larger purposes than individual self-interest.

To paraphrase one of the greatest leaders of the 20th century, Philippine industry has decided, in this convention, to ask not what the country can do for our businessman but what our businessman can do for our country; not what the government can do to help Philippine industry but what the Philippine industry can do to help itself. A soul-searching of this nature is one of the healthiest exercises that a group like yours can engage in. For Philippine industry, and for the Philippine economy as a whole, it is time to shed attitudes of dependence and to assume a posture of self-reliance and strength.

This soul-searching, I believe, comes at the proper time, perhaps a little later than just the precise time. A large proportion of our manufacturing industries were born during the period of controls. They grew up initially under the inducements and the protection provided by an undervalued foreign exchange and in an atmosphere where the degree of competition and the number and size of enterprises were determined by the exchange licensing machinery. It was also at this time that the Philippine Chamber of Industries was born. Its limited task then was to press for the reorientation of exchange control policies toward the protection and promotion of Filipino manufacturing enterprises.

The lifting of exchange controls has changed not only the atmosphere under which Philippine industry may operate, but also the role of economic associations such as the PCI. Having lost the protective umbrella of controls, Philippine industry has had to readjust itself to the new climate, partly by calling for substitute protective measures in the way of increased tariffs, and partly by developing its own muscles, increasing its own efficiency, and strengthening its competitiveness.

This has transformed the very rationale and character of an organization such as yours, requiring a broader outlook, and this convention has served as an occasion for a reappraisal of the new role that the PCI and similar organization must play in the coming decade.

I believe that this role should reflect the need for Philippine industry to unite in one basic task: to go on from the “inward-looking” industrialization of the past to the “outward-looking” industrialization of the future. This will involve looking at ourselves not in isolation but as a part of the Asian region, the economics; of which are being pressed by circumstances towards increasing cooperation and even some measure of integration. It involves breaking down the walls of isolationism which we have managed to build during the past two decades, and seeking our proper place in Asia and the world.

Our industrial development so far has been inward-looking in the sense that it has sought primarily to serve the domestic rather than the export market. It has been geared, towards internal competition among ourselves, rather than towards competition in the world markets. It has tended to sustain its viability by means of exchange controls, for instance, and at other times by means of tariff increases. It has managed to sustain the appearance of viability, but this viability has never really been tested. For our manufacturing industry has grown but in isolation from external competitive forces, almost — one might say — under greenhouse conditions. It has never demonstrated whether it would survive the withdrawal of the protective shields under which it has thrived so far.

It is now time for Philippine industry to stress protection less and competitiveness more. By competitiveness, I mean not among ourselves but with the outside world, for on this depends, in the end, the viability of the entire Philippine economy. We must stop looking inward exclusively and start looking outward. We can no longer allow ourselves and our industries to develop in complete isolation from the forces that shape the world economy. We must respond to the challenges of external change, capitalize on the opportunities presented by the outside world, and develop strength and the capabilities for doing so. We must demolish our greenhouses and open our windows to the fresh winds of change from abroad.

An “outward-looking” industrialization program will involve not only the need to compete but also to cooperate. In order to compete, we must not just look at our own domestic market but at those of other countries. We must diminish our dependence on domestic protection and concentrate on strengthening ourselves for external competition. This will mean the restructuring of our industries, and in this, I expect the private sector to take the initiative although I commit the full assistance of the government.

There are some important areas of industry, however, where competition among individual nations, particularly in this part of the world, has become a meaningless concept. Indeed, there are now a number of areas where Asian countries with similar objectives and compatible political systems should cooperate, cooperate in the sense of harmonizing their investment, production and marketing plans instead of developing individual over-capacities by independent action.

It should be stressed that the developed countries are themselves in the process of consolidating their economies and, at the moment, are turning increasingly their attention to their own economic problems and away from those of the developing worlds. The survival of the developing countries under these circumstances will depend on their ability to cooperate and to integrate their plans in order to avail of larger markets among themselves, the best manpower wherever they can be found among themselves, and the most ideal resources wherever they may be located.

It is in this spirit that the Philippines headed the movement during the recently concluded 25th session of the ECAFE in Singapore, to advance the concept of ASEAN, and to explore the areas where cooperation among the five ASEAN countries was immediately feasible. The developing countries, after all, should depend less on assistance from the industrialized countries and should seek their own progress through self-reliance.

Finally, an outward-looking industrialization strategy must recognize the realities in the foreign capital markets, at the same time that it acknowledges the need for greater domestic efforts to finance our own development; Even as we increase our savings to finance our development, we must seek to tap sources loans and equity capital from abroad rather than shut our doors to them. Just as we must avoid opening the floodgates to the indiscriminate entry into the Philippines of foreign interest, we must avoid the opposite danger of stifling our growth and suffocating our economy by depriving ourselves of any form of foreign capital.

Our strategy on foreign capital will be twofold: to tap loan capital for projects that need no foreign equity, and to invite foreign equity for ventures that could not otherwise proceed were we to depend on Philippine capital alone.

This is the basic foreign investment philosophy that underlies our Investment Incentives Act. We should not allow the forces of isolationism to retard our growth and delay the spread of prosperity to our masses. The Filipino businessman is competent enough, self-confident enough, and business-like enough to be able to use foreign capital either in the form of loans or equity, for the benefit and not for the subjugation of the country.

In all these tasks, the Philippine Chamber of Industries can play a vital role. It can encourage the expansion of the Filipino businessman's horizons, from his individual business interests to that of his country, and to shift his efforts from promoting not just his own but his country's competitiveness. We cannot continue to develop our economy behind the shield of excessive protection, for we have reached, perhaps, the limits of that type of growth. We must break out of our shell, look outward to the world, seek to compete in its markets, seek to cooperate with other countries, and seek to tap their funds, their expertise and their technology. The price of isolation is economic suffocation.

The evidence of our economic growth, under the spur of modernization in both industry and agriculture, is already impressive, both palpably and statistically. Not a few of the firms represented in this convention were among the nearly 2,000 that were distressed at the beginning of my term. Massive doses of financial assistance and moral encouragement from the public sector, have restored their "health and vitality. The indices show a constant upturn in our modern productive capacity. The performance of agriculture has been more spectacular than in the manufacturing sector during the past three years but both have cooperated to bring about a record rise of 6.4 per cent in our gross national product in 1968. We feel, however, that this record can still be improved upon his year.

Not only has this performance proved the resiliency of our economy, through a creative partnership between the private and the public sector, it has demonstrated beyond doubt the capacity of Filipino entrepreneurship to achieve the most complex and the most challenging tasks. I like to believe that imbibing this same entrepreneurial spirit, the government has proven the same capacity for the nation as a whole. The government has met and often oversubscribed its ambitious goals in cereal production, infrastructure building, community development and land reform, education and manpower training. In every one of these fields, the record of the government in the past three years is unprecedented and unsurpassed by any administration.

But it is precisely our joint responsibility to surpass ourselves from day to day and from year to year—until the answers catch up with our problems, until jobs can catch up with the population explosion, until rising real incomes can follow in the wake of steady rises in productivity.

By such purposefulness, hard work and endurance alone can we control our problems before they overwhelm us. In this great task, Philippine industry is called upon to assume a pivotal role, not only in terms of productive capacity but also in genuine commitment to the foremost goals of our nation, namely accelerated development in an atmosphere of freedom and dignity for all.

This convention of Philippine industry has assumed willingly the burdens of such a leadership. We welcome this manifestation of a new social conscience in Philippine industry. I know no better augury for the nation's future.

Once more, I congratulate you and wish you continuing success in the service of industry and of the national community.

Address of President Marcos at the Closing Dinner Program of the Philippine Military Academy Alumni Association, May 17, 1969

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Closing Dinner Program of the Philippine Military Academy Alumni Association

[Delivered on May 17, 1969]

A Corps of Advisers

ANYONE WHO REACHES a position of leadership acquires the habit of deliberate thinking. One of my favorite mental exercises, which others may find useful, is to foresee possible problems one may have to face in the future and to determine what solutions can possibly be made to meet these problems.

For instance, if I were suddenly asked, to pose a given situation, to decide in five minutes when and where to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, I have decided that there should be at least five questions that I would ask, and depending on the answers to these five questions, I would know when and where to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

The same thing is true with the declaration of martial law. Incidentally, martial law has just recently been declared in Malaysia. It is a useful mental exercise to meet a problem before it happens. A leader must foresee a problem coming up long before the ordinary citizen even expects it to surface, and expecting this, it is incumbent upon the leader to anticipate the circumstances surrounding such a crisis so that he may be able to meet the full impact of the crisis with coolness.

This is true, too, of military men. When you anticipate, for instance, the capability of the enemy and then you are met with sudden withering fire, while the others — the men under you — who have not anticipated it recoil in shock, you meet the situation with a little coolness and deliberation because you expected it, and you are well fortified, for although expecting the best, you are prepared for the worst.

I have also looked upon contemporary opinions and criticisms not as final judgements but simply as materials for the historian to utilize in forming a perspective, at some future time, when the eyes are not dimmed with passion and the heart, once motivated by partisanship, is no longer moved to inform the judgment of those who write and those who comment upon the past with distinct bias.

I congratulate the outgoing officers of the Philippine Military Academy Alumni Association for their achievements in fostering a stronger spirit of brotherhood among its members.

I am gratified to note that of the alumni associations in the Philippines, the Philippine Military Academy Alumni Association is one of the most active. This association has helped promote the interest and the development of our military establishment. It has helped clarify important military issues.

Going over the list of resolutions taken up during your convention last year, I observed that you created a committee to study basic military problems.

I should like to see such a committee work hand in hand with other agencies of the government.

For that matter, I should like to go further by suggesting the organization of a study group within your association. Such a group, unrestricted by normal inhibitions of formal organizations, can develop ideas and concepts freely and creatively. The special studies of such a group can perhaps be submitted for consideration to the proper office in the military establishment. In fact, I have suggested to your President that such studies be presented to me personally. I would like to know your views on many matters and here you have a built-in pool of talent to consider matters that may not affect the military but may affect the entire government. As you know I have a habit of asking almost every group of our society, including the barrio captains, to give their views on certain important issues.

I had a very exciting discussion at one time when I went to a barrio convention, and I asked the barrio leaders present to speak out on national problems. I wanted to test the capability of our barrio leaders, so I asked about, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization: what they thought of common, defense, whether we could convince Japan to exercise leadership in the economic and military development of Asia—things which you might think the barrio people would not know about. I was surprised therefore by the self-confidence and perspicacity of the barrio leaders, which just goes to show that this is, indeed, a changing world.

But I am serious about this proposal for you to organize several study groups because, I repeat, if you want to continue doing your share in helping run the government and in establishing policy, as well as the means and procedures for implementation of policy, I certainly cannot see why such study groups, quietly working, will not influence the policy-makers of our government. I would be the first to listen to your recommendations. It is my hope then that you will consider this proposal very seriously.

And this brings me to the subject of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization. Members of the Philippine Military Academy Alumni Association have served as military, advisers, coordinators, and action officers in the military conferences and exercises of SEATO. Young members of PMAAA look forward to serving in the different units of SEATO.

At this point, perhaps the PMAAA would like to ask itself what it has done by way of reviewing the 15-year life of SEATO and its significance upon the security of our country and the treaty area in general.

Because of the threat of communist expansion in this part of the world, eight nations organized SEATO in Manila some 15 years ago.

The flag of the SEATO has waved as a symbol of commitment of its members to defend the values they cherish. It has also stood for the promotion of the economic and social well-being of the peoples of the region.

Probably because of SEATO, the Communists have avoided open armed aggression in Southeast Asia.

To test how determined this flag would fly and how long it would endure, Communist forces closed in on the frontiers of Thailand about seven years ago. You will remember that within 48 hours, combat-ready forces from four SEATO allies were in position in the area. This action proved that SEATO could respond instantly and effectively.

Although it has been severely criticized, SEATO has met the Communist threat in this area and it has prevented this threat from worsening into a more unmanageable form of insurgency.

But this threat, the Communist threat, is a present and clear danger. It is for this reason that, for the moment, we cannot support any move to lower the flag of SEATO and to abolish the organization it stands for.

During my last visit to the SEATO headquarters in Bangkok I said that there was no other organization that could take the place of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization.

I also expressed my firm belief that until the nations of Southeast Asia can get together and organize a machinery for their own defense, it is necessary to maintain the existing alliances that have so far prevented the loss of an inch of soil to those who seek to subvert their respective governments and societies.

The representatives of our nation will sit with their counterparts from SEATO member nations next week to discuss the problems confronting the alliance. They will support all moves for the retention of SEATO. They will support steps that will enhance the effectiveness of SEATO as a shield in this area behind which economic and social development can be carried out unhindered by threats of armed aggression.

They will support initiatives to strengthen the organizational structure of the alliance but they will be prepared to subordinate intricate organizational formalities in favor of practicable measures that will help in the attainment of objectives and benefits for the nations in the treaty area.

They will join in the exploration of avenues that can lead to wider Asian membership in the organization. And they will maintain an open mind in the search for new defense alliances, perhaps in line with the current sentiment of Asians to seek Asian solutions to Asian problems through regional cooperation.

This was but one of the policy areas on which I wished you had given your recommendations to me at the time when I was meeting with my advisers.

Again, I encourage the PMAAA to carry on its good work. Our country and our people depend upon you for the planning, direction and execution of our security measures while the civilians concentrate their energy on industry and productivity.

However, while the military is supposed to attend to security matters, I repeat, more and more, the military must also participate in the basic activities of development. For, as all authorities are agreed, not only is development the first line of defense of a developing country, it is perhaps the only effective defense against our ideological enemies. So, as I have said in the past, this association, which is identified with the military, certainly must be congratulated for realizing that the military has a role to play in these changing times. Since this association embraces within its fold leaders in the military, as well as leaders in other areas of activity, including the economic, political and social fields it is my hope that your association will continue to work in beneficial partnership with the government. On my part, I have nothing but best wishes for your association and its members.

I have the greatest respect for the graduates of the military academy, as my decisions on matters of promotion and assignments have indicated. I look for guidance from your association in areas where such guidance may be needed. Rest assured that I will listen to your advice and to your recommendations.

Address of President Marcos at the 72nd Annual Assembly of the Veterans' Federation of the Philippines, June 22, 1969

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 72nd Annual Assembly of the Veterans' Federation of the Philippines

[Delivered on May 22, 1969]

The Veteran's Due

WHENEVER I SEE you, I remember those times when we wondered what God really held for all of us, what future and destiny he held in his hands for us. There were many soldiers who were probably better men than ourselves, better men than I, better men than Nick, better men than Manong. But the trouble with war is sometimes the better men are the ones who die, the better men are the ones taken by God. What do they say? Bad weeds never die. Well, we did not and that is why we have been left behind to receive the medals, and we sometimes forget our fallen comrades.

However, in a way we remember them too, and it is to remember the gallant dead that I set up the cross in Bataan which we now call the Dambana ng Kagitingan, or the Altar of Heroism, and I have directed that battle monuments be set up to mark every important battle.

What was it that we said whenever we went into combat? Do you remember the prayer? God I come to you on my knees to admit I am human and therefore I have sinned. Having sinned, I ask you to forgive me as I go into combat, to sustain me and strengthen my arms, sharpen my eyes as I meet my enemies who are more formidable than our forces and whom we may not be able to conquer. But if you cannot sustain me and I must fall in this battle, allow me, Lord, to fall with honor and nobility. And if my bones shall lie in some unknown field, let me enrich the land, so that his field may find the rice stalks in that particular spot where I have fallen a little greener, his harvest a little more bountiful. Thus, if I had not helped my country more, at least in this small way, I have heightened the fertility of my beloved land, by giving my body and my blood.

I remember all of this today. I remember this because I have come to speak to you today of the veterans who are now second class citizens in their own country. Second class citizens in the country for which they fought. Yes, history teaches us that six months after a war, the veterans are forgotten; one year after a war the veterans are looked down upon; but history does not say that 20 or 25 years after a war, the veterans are condemned to being second class citizens. But that is exactly what we are today, we are second class citizens. We are gathered here in this hall, the remnants of the hundreds of thousands of men who fought in the last war. More than four hundred thousand were recognized, but how many fought with the USAFFE? One hundred thousand. How many died during the death march and in Capas? Perhaps more than those who died in Bataan. How many died in the underground? The total, I understand, of all those who died among our people in the last war was one million and a half. One million five hundred thousand people, and they died hoping and praying that even if they fell and the standards dropped from their hands, there would be others to pick it up, perhaps with stronger hands, and raise it again, alone and proud.

There are many questions now being raised as to what each and everyone of us did in the last war? And the trouble is that we, the veterans, never talk about this. We veterans have been humble about this, and you and I never even talk about it. We feel that the record should speak for itself. Let every man claim honor who wants to claim honor. Let us not do it. I will not do it. I will not claim honor for myself. Let the records of the United States and those of the Philippines stand as they are.

How many of you went to the Luneta, as it was called then, now the Rizal Park, on July 4, 1945? The USAFIP-NL men, I see some of them here, were still fighting in the mountains. I was still somewhere in Bontoc or Kiangnan on July 4, 1945. Bessang Pass had fallen on June 14, but the units pursuing Yamashita and the forces blocking his withdrawal towards the Cagayan Valley were still intact in Kiangnan.

And so some of you went to the Luneta, still in your tattered uniforms, perhaps. How many of you were wearing regulation shoes?

We had just come down from the mountains and I was a displaced person. I could not return to the practice of law. I was offered the position of Prosecutor in the People's Court. I was supposed to prosecute the men whom I had investigated at Camp Spencer, including all those who now claim that they were not there as prisoners. But I did not have the heart to do it. I had never had the heart to prosecute any man since that case of mine where absolutely false and absolutely baseless evidence was presented against me. So I was a displaced person.

I could not settle down. I was troubled, first of all, by the sight of veterans who had not yet received their backpay. Looking at these veterans who had not received any benefits (the Filipino Veterans Bill of Rights had not yet been approved) I raised all the trouble that I could raise. I had to; my men were holding it against me.

Towards the end of the war you will remember that the problem at that time was that we received the surrender of almost all the Japanese forces in Luzon. There must have been about 200,000 originally, and about 150,000 surrendered to us. And we put them in the prisoners-of-war camp, bigger than this Veterans Center. First, at KP-77, kilometer post 77 and at kilometer post 90. That is pretty close to Mount Polo. (According to the latest studies, it is now considered the highest mountain in the Philippines. Not Mt. Apo, but Mt. Polo. When they remeasured the peaks, they found that Mt. Polo was higher by a few feet. But I never saw the sunlight in Mt. Polo during the entire time we were fighting there.)

Anyway, we rounded up all the prisoners of war, got all the war booty, we even got hold of what is now known as the Yamashita treasure. We got all of them, gold bullion and diamonds, all sorts of gold and undoubtedly some of these were given away to the officers and men. These officers and men were thus remunerated; otherwise they would have gone back to their homes without any pay or allowances. Most of these men had not received a single centavo in compensation whatsoever.

You see, after the fighting, I was supposed to set up a civil government in the nine provinces that we had taken. If you will remember, I appointed janitors, I appointed teachers, I appointed Justices of the Peace, I appointed the Mayors. I even appointed the Governors, and that is how I started in politics. I am not saying I don't like being in politics and I am not saying that I wish that I were not President of the Philippines. But that is how I started. I did not want to go into politics, but I was assigned to the task, after being a combat officer. Suddenly, after what is known as the Battle of Panapdupan, a flanking movement executed all the way to Kiangnan, I was suddenly pulled out of combat, and they said, "You organize a civil government and go after the guerilleros who are turning into bandits, and stay in Camp Spencer." And I asked why. I didn't want to stay in Camp Spencer for there was still a lot of fighting to be done. I kept going back to Commander Balao and his command, but they always said, "No, we want you to organize a civil government." That was sometime about the first week of June Just about before Bessang Pass fell, about June 5 I think it was, and they asked me to organize the civil government.

Well, we got all the war booty, we got all the money, we got all the diamonds, we got all the bullion, we got all the gold. I don't know how much was the worth of that treasure. Several truckloads of this treasure were passed, and the men asked me, "What are we going to do with these?" "Well, said it was war booty and it belonged to the government. And they asked me to which government it belonged, and since we were fighting under the United States government, I said it should be sent to the proper officers. And they asked me who was the proper officer to take custody ? And I said the intelligence officer, the G-2 was in-charge of war booty, and probably there was a special officer assigned by General Kruger. You see, we were attached to the Sixth Army which landed in Lingayen. I said that this special officer should be the one to receive all of these valuables.

So, after getting a few souvenirs, the officers packed the treasure for transport. Later, I saw some of the officers playing poker with diamonds as their chips. They had nothing else, no money, up there in the Mountain Province.

I ordered, I think, about 14 truckloads of gold bullion, 14 truckloads of money, some of it genuine currency, 14 truckloads of jewelry delivered to the US command.

Where is Governor Guerrero? He was with the Judge Advocate General Service, and I think he also knew about all this. No, he was not one of those who got souvenirs. But I ordered all the trucks to go to San Fernando and deliver their cargo to the headquarters of General Kruger.

And so when the officers and men did not receive their pay, I was blamed for it. You don't know the anger and the bitterness that was directed against me as the men asked why did I not tell them that they were not going to be paid. If we had known this they said, we would not have reported the booty we got from the Japanese. The 14 truckloads you sent back there must have been worth at least $500 million. And here we are; we are merely asking for our salaries and nobody can help us.

And because of this I was unable to return to normal life. Many times I had to go back to the Mt. Province and stay with the soldiers that we still had there and sleep there with them in the huts. Then, I would come down to Manila until finally I decided that I had better forget everything. I would think of myself for once and go to Harvard University and get my doctorate degree and I would stay clear of public life. I refused to have anything more to do with public life I would be a professor, I would teach, I would write books.

Anyway, even as I decided to go to the United States, the then President Roxas, and all the other veteran leaders, including Marking, Peralta—Peralta was the leader of the Veterans Legion at that time—and Kamlon and Montelibano, and all the others, they all told me, “YOU are a good lawyer. Now, why don't you go with the mission to the U.S. and get our salaries, get our arrears pay.” Because a law had been passed in the United States which excluded the Filipino veterans from payment of salary arrears, although I don't think it was intentional. But by some miscalculation, the Filipino veterans were excluded from receiving arrears in pay. And from educational benefits complete.

And so I was on my way to Harvard when President Roxas called me and said, “You are going with that mission to Washington.” And I said, “No, I am through serving my country. I have served her enough, and what I have seen of the gratitude of the Filipino people to the veterans does not encourage me to serve any further. The Philippine government has been very ungrateful and so has the United States government been ungrateful to the Filipino veterans. I will not have anything more to do with working on this.”

But, he said, we are going to right the wrong that has been committed.

I was being blamed for the wrong my men suffered so I refused to go to the United States. A group from the USAFIP-NL came to me then and said, “You see, you're turning out to be a coward.” I said, “What are you talking about? I am through serving my country. I have fought enough, I have been wounded enough, and I don't care about these medals anymore. Look at the way they are treating us. They are treating us like second class citizens. They laughed at us when we made our plea before Congress.” I had earlier appeared before a Committee of the Philippine Congress at the time, and they would not listen to us. They refused to listen to us, and it was only when I practically cried before President Roxas that he insisted on the passage of the Veterans Bill of Rights.

But, anyway that was another question. The USAFIP-NL came to me and said that if I had not returned or given to the American authorities the war booty we got, after the battle of Bessang Pass, that we captured at Kilometer 90, we would not be begging for money now. “All of us,” the men said, “are impoverished. Our children are crying for food. We don't know of any source of livelihood. Our women may even turn into bad women if we do not help them.” And this to me was terrible, the impact on me psychologically was so awful that I turned my back and I had to go into my room.

Later, I was told in a cable that I had been called back to active duty. “You're hereby directed to put on your uniform and report to duty,” the cable said. And I went to Washington to work for the amendment of the Missing Persons Act. In fairness to the American Government, I must say that when they learned about this injustice committed against Filipino veterans, the U.S. Congress immediately amended the Missing Persons Act in order to give arrears in pay to the USAFIP men. And do you know how much this was? This was one hundred sixty million dollars.

I am very proud of this because it is seldom that a man can give up his dream order to help his comrades. But I must tell you, I must speak of this now, because nobody seems to know about it.

But why do I say this? Because from the very beginning, the Filipino veterans have always been treated like second-class citizens. I say so because every time any group of veterans, for instance, would seek to organize, say, a Veterans Federation or a Veterans Bank, I noticed the attitude of the legislators, even the veterans who were legislators; I noticed how they looked down with a patronizing attitude on the veterans. No, I do not say that one particular legislator or this particular group of legislators were not sympathetic to the Filipino veterans; but there is this tendency, this inclination now to demean, to debase, belittle, your achievements in the last war. Everywhere you go, you see this attitude. For instance, the attitude on those watching a parade. When the veterans pass by, I usually stand up to salute, but I notice that in the grandstand, there are those who stand laughing at the marching Filipino veterans. Even at those who are disabled, even those who are walking only on one leg, even the war widows, the Gold Star men. So that the attitude seems to be: they have done their job and we don't need them anymore.

Now, if this is the attitude of the Filipino people and the Filipinos government toward the Filipino veterans, I dare say that should the country ever be invaded again, no one, none of her sons will stand up and defend this country. Rather, more of us will choose to collaborate with the enemy, and in saying this, do not think that I am trying to connect it with politics. No.

You look around you, observe people's attitudes, even in the provinces, and you will be disquieted. When I first filed the Veterans Bill in 1954, for that was the first time that I filed the bill creating the Philippine Veterans Bank here, do you know that I met quite a violent opposition? When I stood up in committee to explain that this was going to be the veterans' finance arm, with special trust funds of $20 million, that was supposed to be paid in reparations, and created by the Reparations Treaty, and created by the special Reparations Law of the Philippines, when I stood up, I was met with insulting remarks about the veterans. And I fought back with all the tools I had at my command. But the bill never passed the committee until I became Senate President, and then I insisted, as an act of confidence and faith in the leadership of the Senate, that this particular bill be approved, because it was a bill for the Filipino veterans Senator Almendras of Davao was my co-author in the creation of the Filipino Veterans Bill.

Only recently, on June 14, two days after the Independence Day celebration, I conferred on the leaders of the guerilla movement and those who had organized and initiated armed resistance against the enemy, a special award.

This award is called the Iron Cross of the Resistance, and it is given to any man who organized troops other than the regular troops, to take part in armed action, in field combat against the enemy invaders. And I had the prerogative the privilege of waiving this Iron Cross for me, so that people may not think that it was created for myself. But it was created for all other men who since 1941 fought the enemy. Some of the guerilla bands, like the. Ablan Guerillas and perhaps the Dimzon guerillas, were organized as early as 1941.

I remember when we were still in Bataan, we were already in contact with several guerilla units. We were in contact with Governor Ablan, we were in contact with Aduro before the fall of Bataan. And immediately after the fall of Bataan, resistance organizations such as Marking's Guerillas were immediately in contact with other people who had gone underground. And it here was the Bulacan Military Area under Manong Santos.

Why did I take it upon myself to create the Iron Cross of the Resistance? Because there is not a single complete and genuine listing of all the recognized guerilla organizers and leaders in the Philippines up to now, yes, up to now. Do you know why we delayed, why we had to delay the issuance of the stocks of the Philippine Veterans Bank? Because there was no complete listing. They are still quarelling as to who shall be included and who should not up to now. Why? Because we in government never took it upon ourselves to acknowledge and recognize the services of the veterans. That is why, I have said, that there is this tendency to treat you as second class citizens of our Republic. Do you think the 'politicians do not have a complete listing of former members of the House, former Governors? But do they remember any of the guerilla leaders anymore? No, they don't. Do we have a complete listing of all those who served in the resistance? No. Do you know what we had to use as the basis for granting the Iron Cross of the Resistance? We had to use as basis the report of General Willoughby, the G-2 of General Douglas MacArthur in the Southeast Pacific Area Command, specially the listing made in October 1944, before and after the landing of MacArthur in Leyte.

Do we have a complete listing of the genuine and recognized guerilla leaders? No, we don't because the government never cared to acknowledge the services of the guerillas and the underground.

Now, where and in what country has this ever occurred? When I gave 50 hectares to the veterans, the pressure I got from many sectors was unbelievable. There were some who came to me asking why I gave the veterans this particular area? They don't have the money to spend on the development of this area, a very valuable area, they said, which costs P100 per square meter. Do you know what I said in reply? For every square meter of those 50 hectares, there must have been about 1000 who died in order to win this particular area. I added that this was not a matter which I intended to debate. I had given it and I would continue to sustain this decision. And if the veterans don't have the money, I am ordering right now the Philippine Veterans Bank that any savings, any profits of the Philippine Veterans Bank shall go to the development of the Veterans Center.

But it makes me feel very sad because you see how the reaction of these people is to you and me. Do you realize what this means? This means that they just don't care anymore. Why? Because we have never written about our part in the war, they don't know how many wounds you suffered.

It is easy now to say that it was easy to be a guerillero, but during those days you had a difficult time trying to convince others to join you. It is easy now to say that the guerillas are asking too much, that they are a little overrated, that they never really helped, that they were out there in the barrios merely hiding.

I'll be retiring from public life and I'll be doing nothing but write about the war here. I intend to write the history of our country. And I intend to include in that history a part of the events which I have come to know personally. And it is necessary that we do so because not too many people know about what you have done. That is why I am very grateful to all of you because in all the instances when I ran for public office, each and everyone of you, all the veterans, always came to me, and helped me win.

And this is the thing which strengthens me in my resolve that whatever may happen you will find in me, whether I am President or not, you will find in me more than anything else a veteran. More than a lawyer I am a veteran; more than Senator or Senate President, or more than even a President of the Republic, I am most proud of the fact that I am a veteran. Because those were the noblest days that we knew. They were days that we never actually counted. We did not ask, is this to my advantage, will this be to my prejudice, will that give me a few more votes, will this give me more money, will that get me this, will this give me that? You never asked those things when you were fighting. Noong tayo ay mapapalaban kung mamatay ano ang magagawa, ano ang magagawa natin? Patay na kung patay, wala na.

And these are the things that trouble me now. How many of the young people today do you think feel the same way we did when we were fighting for our country? How many of them, do you think, will say, "My God, they are invading our country. We cannot allow this. If we cannot meet them on the shore, we will pull back and fight them in the town; if we cannot fight them in the fields, we will withdraw to the mountains but we shall not surrender, and we shall fight the enemy to the death."

I congratulate the President, Simeon Medalla, and the other officers of this organization, as well as the past Presidents. You and I must protect the interest of the Filipino veterans, not for ourselves, not for our own selfish interest, but because if the veterans are not respected, if the services of the soldiers are not acknowledged, ladies and gentlemen, I assure you that the younger generations will never take up arms to defend our country, as we did. God forbid, but if there will be another war, another invasion of our country, will Filipino youth fight as we did, seeing how poorly veterans, are regarded?

I am proud of being a soldier, and that is why I wear my medals today. I seldom wear my medals. You never see me wear my medals, never since the war. But when they started questioning those medals, I started wearing those medals.

However, we should not be bitter about this. It is the way democracy works, ours in an open society. Everybody is at liberty to speak his mind. But as one wise man said, no other than Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States: "The best test of truth is the power of thought to get itself accepted in a free market of ideas." Let every man say what he will, let those who will try to demean us, let those who want to debase everything we have done, let those who feel compelled to do so question all our deeds question all the records of the Philippine Armed Forces or of the United States government. Let anybody say anything. My belief is truth will always come out and when the truth comes out, the Filipino veteran will stand up, proud and sure of his loyalty and patriotism which he demonstrated on the battlefield.

You and I have gone through many trying days. We have worked and sacrificed together. You and I must prove to those of our comrades who cannot protect themselves, those who are dead and disabled, especially the disabled, that our cause will prevail.

Fellow veterans, whether gone forever or still among us, I shall speak for you. I shall be your tongue, I shall be your spokesman, and I shall speak of your nobility and of your greatness in whatever position I may be.

Address of President Marcos at the Joint FAO/ECAFE/ ILO Seminar on the implementation of Land Reform in Asia and the Far East, July 12, 1969

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Joint FAO/ECAFE/ ILO Seminar on the implementation of Land Reform in Asia and the Far East

[Delivered on July 12, 1969]

Land Reform and Democracy

IT IS COMMON in almost every country in Asia that when a society or a group of men meet any kind of obstacle, they seek to exorcise with ceremony the evil spirits connoted by the obstacle. I am certain that seminars like this do not partake of the nature of these ceremonies that we know. I am certain that this seminar has not been a futile exercise of theory and philosophy, or a practice in the use of words, and that is why it is my happy privilege as President of the Republic of the Philippines to extend to you my belated welcome.

I understand that I was supposed to open this seminar on the first day. Unfortunately I was called by other commitments to the Southern part of our country which as you know is composed of 7,1000 islands. Most of these islands must be visited by a President if he is to remain President. The Vice-President, I gathered, very appropriately and with distinction took over the task of opening this seminar.

We receive you in our country with open arms because our country has always been an ardent believer in the United Nations, particularly in the principle of regional cooperation. Whatever may now temporarily deter the usual diplomatic usages and protocol that allow the exchange of diplomatic representatives between some countries in this part of the world, we know that regional cooperation must always be the obsession of every country in Asia.

I cannot imagine a seminar for Asia more necessary and more useful than this one that you conclude today in the city of Manila. For as it is often professed but seldom acknowledged, land reform lies at the very center and at the very heart of national, social and economic development in the whole of Asia, and not only in Asia, perhaps, but in all the regions of the world.

This seminar proves the expanding role of the United Nations as an active force for development in our region. But more than this, this shows that the United Nations, through its specialized agencies such as the FAO, ILO and ECAFE, is increasingly coming to grips with the basic causes of world instability and conflict. Poverty and injustice remain the chief causes of world unrest. And while man claims dominance over everything that he sees and now seeks to penetrate the firmament and land on the moon, he still grovels, at the feet of his ancient enemies — disease, poverty, ignorance. In making land reform one of its major preoccupations, the UN, as they say, is going for the jugular in its' approach to the problems of development.

Gone are the days of procrastination and the days of tentative solutions, for while men may be met with the same old problems, the ancient formulas have been found wanting and it is now necessary that man, so ingenious in science, must equally be ingenious in the handling of man.

By means of seminars like this, and through its technical assistance programs, the UN has ceased to be a mere debating society. It has emerged as a wise, practical and effective counselor to the needy nations, touching the lives not only of the great but also of the humble people of every nation.

In the Philippines, land reform has become a major objective and commitment of the government. As you know, the Philippines has introduced a land reform program under our Agricultural Land Reform Code which took effect five years ago. From an over-cautious and timorous attitude at first, the government has in more recent years initiated a bolder and more energetic approach to the implementation of land reform. As a result, land reform is no longer just a political shibboleth, useful during elections, but a practicable and workable program of social justice and economic development, especially in Central Luzon, our traditional rice bowl and the historic hotbed of social protest in this country.

I, for one, have not adopted land reform, even when I was in our legislative body, only for the purpose of fighting an ideology that seeks to subvert our Republic. No. Land reform is right, land reform is wise, and land reform is perhaps the one single factor that will determine the success of our free and open society.

As recently as a month ago, the government declared the entire Central Luzon region a land reform area. Today proportionate resources are being allocated to support this proclamation and help facilitate the transformation of life for the poor peasant and his family.

This accelerated action on land reform is of course denounced as in almost any other country by certain vested interests as a precipitate, naive action on my part. But — and this is a sad commentary on our politics — these very same vested interests, although privately denouncing land reform, publicly affect a posture of concern over the “slow implementation” of land reform and denounce the very same interests hampering the program — denouncing themselves, therefore, but blaming the government for their own obstructionism.

But the politics of land reform probably deserves a separate seminar for itself. Of one thing I feel sure: land reform will be effective only in the Asian setting where there is a firm and resolute political will backing up the land reform program. And this is preeminently the responsibility of the government leadership.

The need for an integrated approach to land reform has been brought out repeatedly in the deliberations of this seminar.

I like to believe that the land reform program of the Philippines provides both in legislation and in implementation one of the most comprehensive and integrated programs in this region. The National Land Reform Council and the Land Reform Project Administration provide an integrated machinery to ensure the coordinated delivery of a package of services under the program to the farmer in his field. As I noted earlier, we have recently extended the land reform program to the whole of Central Luzon, an area in which tenurial and agrarian problems are especially acute. This represents an enormous expansion of the existing program, and evolves considerable additional commitments in staff, personnel as well as in funds.

In the implementation of this program, we have, as expected, encountered the difficulties inherent in a complex and controversial program such as this. We, therefore, welcome the opportunity afforded by this seminar to discuss our problems and difficulties with representatives of other countries that have had similar experiences.

Let me recount briefly what we have done. When the present administration took over in 1966, the land reform areas were thinly spread out in barely a dozen small towns or municipalities. We therefore decided to proclaim the entire Second District of Pampanga as a land reform area; this was later followed by 23 municipalities in the province of Nueva Ecija. Last year, we proclaimed as land reform area the entire First District of Laguna Province and just recently 63 towns in Central Luzon and elsewhere. At present, the program covers a total of 125 municipalities, involving 190,237 farmers of whom 165,749 are palay or rice farmers working an aggregate area of 337,989 hectares.

In 1966, we also ordered the immediate upgrading of settlement projects and landed estates under the administration of the Land Authority. At present, the Authority is administering 19 settlement projects, 50 agricultural landed estates, 48 residential estates and four EDCOR farms consisting of 131, 834 lots with an approximate area of 456,830 hectares involving 73,510 beneficiaries. The Land Authority has undertaken extensive development in these projects by constructing buildings, artesian wells, irrigation projects, settlers' houses, school buildings, health centers and other agricultural facilities. Veterans of the Vietnam war especially those who are engaged in construction, with the engineer construction battalion, have been assigned to these projects. We have adhered to the policy of establishing owner-cultivatorship and economic family-size farms as the bases of our agriculture. In line with this policy, the Land Authority has issued 1,944 land patents. We have pushed through the resettlement of agricultural lands of the public domain begun by earlier administrations.

At present, 12 estates in Central Luzon comprising about 3,000 hectares have been acquired by the Land Bank.

The implementation of land reform in this country was reinforced by a law passed by Congress upon my request empowering the President to dispose of all government properties, not urgently required through public bidding, to generate more funds for the Land Bank and the Agricultural Credit Administration. We are seriously considering the possible sale of military camps in Manila or in surrounding cities like Quezon City, Caloocan and Pasay, where lands have increased in value, and the proceeds from which shall be channelled to the program.

The National Land Reform Council is coordinating with a consortium of Filipino consultants for the preparation of project studies and business ventures which are within the context of the Agricultural Land Reform Code. The completed studies will be presented to the landowners so that they may have a range of choices for investment of capital and Land Bank bonds.

We are studying the possibility of exchanging occupied landed estates in Central Luzon with virgin lands in unsettled areas and territories.

From our limited experience we have found that land reform removes the factors inhibiting agricultural progress, and therefore brings about substantial production increases.

We have no illusions that we have solved the problem. The Philippine Land Reform Program is relatively young and we are an open and free society. But we have shown that land reform can in fact be implemented on a meaningful scale, sometimes in the face of insurmountable odds. And that, it seems to us, is certainly a good beginning and we intend to continue this effort in the years to come.

In the last years of implementation, we have already noted defects and deficiencies in our land reform code. Since we are committed to expand this program to a more substantial and meaningful scale, we are prepared to effect amendments in the Code. One of our objectives is to streamline the machinery for the administration of agrarian reform and to provide funds for this organization.

On the opening day of the seminar I understand that Vice-President Fernando Lopez suggested a continuing dialogue between and among Asian countries in the field of agrarian reform. Perhaps this dialogue can be better sustained if Asian countries will work out a program of exchange, first, in technical men. Land reform technicians at the field level can work with fellow technicians in other Asian countries. This may be necessary to give our field men in land reform better insights into the actual application of accumulating theories in agrarian reform. It is vital for a program such as this to sharpen the working knowledge, the perception and the diagnostic skills of field men actually carrying out reform. One way to do this is to expose our workers to similar situations in foreign lands. On our part, we shall be glad to accept field technicians from your countries, to work with the land reform project teams in our land reform areas. In the next several years if I continue to be President, I shall pursue this program.

I am also glad to find that FAO and other agencies of the United Nations have taken responsibility for delivering expert services and training facilities in the field of land reform. We in Asia have over the last two decades demonstrated both the will and the capacity to absorb technical assistance in every sphere of activity. We definitely can use more assistance in land reform. I should like on this occasion to urge the United Nations Development Programme and the appropriate Executing Agencies to give higher priority to the needs of land reform in their financial allocations and operative programs.

Our particular needs in the Philippines — and perhaps this is true as well of other Asian countries — are in the fields of research, training and program implementation. I understand that the National Land Reform Council is processing requests for technical assistance in these fields, and I am confident that the UN agencies will as usual respond positively to our needs.

One of our recurring problems is how to energize and activate the bureaucracy with new and adequately trained manpower. We urgently need to professionalize the bureaucracy. To give our rural areas the best agricultural technicians and the best legal experts, for example, we have to compete with the private sector which provides them better opportunities not only for advancement but also for a continuing renewal of their skills, but most important of all, we have to give them better pay.

To professionalize our agrarian reform bureaucracy, we will soon setup an agrarian reform institute in our state university. This institute will conduct seminars, survey the agrarian reform program in its entirety and provide objective criticism of the program irrespective of the narrow interests of politicians and landlords and of the bureaucracy itself. This institute will supplement the activities of the Land Reform Training Center already in operation. The problems of land reform will be with us for a considerable length of time, and we should build up reserves of technicians from the universities as well as from the training centers of United Nations agencies.

This seminar is especially fruitful for us because we have gathered here the best minds that have been for many years focused on agrarian problems not only in Asia but in all the world.

I understand that the brilliant minds which have participated in the successful implementation of the land reform program in Japan and in Taiwan are here. To them, I say not only welcome, but I extend an invitation to come again to our country whenever they wish in the coming years. We hope to profit in full — as do the other governments represented — from your deliberations, from your conclusions, and from your experience.

All the countries represented in this seminar seek the fullest development of their peoples in dignity and freedom. This commitment can be meaningful only in the framework of efforts to change the social and economic structure based on antiquated and regressive land tenure systems. There is no other path to genuine democracy and to the true, lasting enfranchisement of all citizens in a national community.

Even universal suffrage is insufficient if it is merely granted to a traditional and feudal agrarian society. Then the true expression of the popular will is thwarted by the social and economic oligarchies that impose their own choices on the party system and make their own will appear as the popular will. Thus, democratic institutions might actually appear to the masses of the people as a fraudulent cover for what is basically and in fact anti-democratic orientation of the government.

Only through genuine land reform may this necessary social restructuring towards fuller democracy be attained. That is why I have earlier said that land reform lies at the very center of the development process.

There has been some spirited discussion on the question of whether land reform is social or economic or both. But regardless of its content, there is need for a dedicated and firm leadership to implement agrarian reform. There must be a sufficient energy of-will on the part of the political leadership in any country or every country implementing the program and also a leadership that will stimulate a passive bureaucracy.

In this extremely difficult and challenging task, we certainly can and should draw on one another's experience for lessons and guidance, and also for encouragement and support.

I would like to leave you this morning not only with my sincere best wishes but also with a word of hope. Some of the technological advances of the past two decades have enabled us to face the problems of over-population with new resolve. We know now that with technology properly transmitted to the rural areas, we will be able to become self-sufficient in food, in all of Asia and perhaps all over the world. All these things became possible because there was imaginative leadership ready to try new and novel solutions. But above and beyond this, I think that change has been hastened because there is a fund of goodwill expressed not only by international agencies but by an international community of scholars and technicians whose science and whose dedication transcend the boundaries of country and race. For as long as this goodwill exists, we in Asia have less cause to worry about the future and its uncertainties. We only have to recall the collective wisdom amassed by you and already translated into comforting economic facts to reassure ourselves that, indeed, the good things of the earth are ours to harvest because men of goodwill like you have planted the seed.

Address of President Marcos at the 17th anniversary and annual Mid-Year Convention of the Philippine Rural Reconstruction Movement (PRRM), July 17, 1969

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 17th anniversary and annual Mid-Year Convention of the Philippine Rural Reconstruction Movement
(PRRM)

[Delivered on July 17, 1969]

Liberation of Our Barrios

SEVENTEEN YEARS AGO, a great Chinese scholar, Dr. Y.C. James Yen, brought to these islands a revolutionary concept of rural rehabilitation. His formula for this goal was to enlist the people's own aspirations and mobilize their initiative for their own reform. A group of civic-spirited Filipinos, led by Dean Conrado Benitez, responded to the idea. Thus the Philippine Rural Reconstruction Movement was born.

However, the idea was not new to the Philippines. It was in Dapitan some 77 years ago that the first rural reconstruction project in the Philippines came into being. Dr. Jose Rizal — exiled to this town as an act of retribution for his advocacy of democratic liberties for his people — found the community a backward place and decided to change, to improve it. By spreading the values of food production, hygiene and education through actual work, Rizal succeeded in arousing the spirit of self-help enterprise in the community. Rizal left Dapitan a model town in community development.

Rizal's pioneering achievements in Dapitan left an indelible impression on my mind as a student. When I was a new Congressman, I introduced the concept of rural development through self-help in my home province and watched the potential of the people liberated by this approach.

When I took over the stewardship of the nation in 1966, therefore, my first concern was to improve the quality of life in our barrios. Our first priorities in attention and resources were allocated to the barrios. One of my first official acts was to promote the Office of the Presidential Assistant on Community Development to Cabinet level — to give full impetus to our programs for the barrio people.

In so doing, we borrowed from the ethic of PRRM. Your four-fold integrated program of promoting literacy, health, livelihood and self-government has been one of the most vital factors in reinvigorating the lives of our people at the grassroots.

You have demonstrated the power of individual initiative and enterprise in the villages. By your example, you have shown to a great number of our barrio people a choice — an alternative to their passive, barren and self-enclosed existence. In the climate of resignation that once pervaded the barrio, you have brought a new sense of purpose and will.

We have sought to amplify this spirit in our programs for the barrio. Not paternalism but the spirit of self-help permeates our undertakings for our far-flung communities. While our purpose is to extend immediate help, our long-range goal is to develop in our people the ethic of independence and self-reliance. We are therefore partners in a common undertaking.

At no time in this country's history has the government committed more resources, or more willful energies, to the cause of rural improvement.

The administration has broken all existing records in rice production, infrastructure building, and the building of schools. All these are aimed at the emancipation of the barrios.

The administration reclaimed thousands of abandoned road-building projects, including feeder roads linking the barrios to the towns, and completed them. We have built more concrete roads in just three years than all previous administrations in our history since the start of the American regime in 1902— or a span of 63 years.

But we are undertaking a more basic kind of reclamation — the social and economic reclamation of the long-forgotten tenant farmers, through land reform. In the past politicians merely talked about land reform. Today, backed up by the resolute will of the government, land reform is being seriously implemented in this very heartland of the nation — Central Luzon, and is exerting a profound and transforming impact on the lives of the people.

In the field of rural health, the effort we exert, no matter how great, will always be insufficient in the face of the awesome fact that an estimated 82 per cent of our entire population are medically indigent. But we have beefed up our; rural health units; we have built more and more rural hospitals, and the per capita expenditure of the government for free medicine has been raised from; four centavos in 1965 to 42 centavos in 1969. In the previous administration, P1.3 million were spent for free medicine; today, we distribute free medicine to the barrios worth P16 million.

One of the most spectacular advances in our rural programs is in the field of community development or barrio self-help projects.

The PACD under this administration serves 16,000 barrios, as against only 3,600 barrios during the previous regime, or a gain of more than 450 per cent.

Also under PACD auspices, our people in the barrios completed a total of 128,000 projects worth P47,500,000 compared with 24,000 projects valued at P13,000,000 during the previous regime. This is an increase of 427 per cent in the number of projects and only 156 per cent increase in project costs.

In the past year, we introduced in the rural areas the concept of manpower training as a positive measure for the promotion of employment. There are now 137,000 free training centers all over the country which graduate about 100,000 jobless young adults and out-of-school youth in gainful occupational skills a year. Most of these trainees find employment and a new sense of personal worth as responsible members of society.

As a matter of fact, the impact of all these creative activities in the rural areas is reflected in the employment statistics. Under a previous regime, the average rate of employment creation in the rural sector was only 250,000 jobs a year; at present, the average has been raised to 350,000.

But all of these programs of the government cannot take the place of private initiative and enterprise in the barrios. In fact, they are designed to provide a climate in which citizens of the barrios will be encouraged to exercise their own initiative for their own accelerated development. The government fully realizes that no amount of effort and expenditures in rural development will ever be meaningful unless they excite and impel the people to wake up to their own possibilities, to activate their dormant wills for self-improvement, to mobilize their initiative for their own well-being.

It is for this reason, too, that the government, with all the best intentions in the world, can never take the place of civic organizations such as the Philippine Rural Reconstruction Movement. On the other hand, I have always believed that the participation of the private sector has been the key to the success of most of the rural development programs that the government has sponsored.

Such participation is essential not only from a pragmatic point of view, but also from the standpoint of developing a genuine participatory democracy in our country. The enfranchisement of citizens is not complete unless they voluntarily take up the burdens of their own improvement, and the improvement of their own communities. The PRRM promotes this kind of democracy, this kind of freedom that is real because it grows from within and is therefore capable of sustaining itself.

I think the seventeenth anniversary of your organization is an opportune time for me to make a solemn pledge. If its tenure is extended by the people by another four years, this administration will surpass itself in rural and community development. Building upon the present results, and utilizing the momentum of our advance, we shall go to realize a peaceful revolution in our barrios. And to this, both you and the government are so intensely committed.

I do not know what alternative the other major political party offers the nation to our present programs of rural development. Neither this party nor its leading standard-bearers have come out with a program of government, much less a program of community development. If you accept their deeds, rather than the words, as the true gauge of their intentions, it will profit us to recall that in the previous sessions of Congress, the Opposition fiercely opposed the barrio development fund, and questioned the ability of the barrio councils to manage these funds wisely for their own good, in short, their ability for self-government.

And yet, democracy, reduced to its essence, is nothing but self-government, self-determination. We must enfranchise the barrios in our economic and social programs. This is no less essential to the promotion of a broadly based democracy in our country than their enfranchisement by the ballot. There can be no true democracy without the participation of the barrios in the conduct of their own affairs and specialty of their own development.

I stand by this belief, which unites us with the PRRM in a common cause. We shall continue to act on this belief—to commit increasing resources to the liberation of the barrios from the neglect of centuries, to the creation of new opportunities for barrio self-fulfillment.

Sometimes, as President, I ask myself what I should like to be remembered by in history. And I conclude, in such moments, that were I to write my own epitaph — I hope not for many, many years yet — this is what I shall choose: Ferdinand E. Marcos, who helped the barrios discover themselves and the power to change their lives.

Then I would be content.

Address of President Marcos before the Convention of Filipino Businessmen sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce of the Philippines, July 21, 1969

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
Before the Convention of Filipino Businessmen sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce of the Philippines

[Delivered on July 21, 1969]

A Larger Vision for Filipino Business

I MUST SAY, first of all, that this is an impressive gathering, a gathering with a significant purpose — which is to discuss, as your theme states, constitutional reforms for national progress.

With this larger vision, the Filipino businessman graduates from the babbity which the American writer, Sinclair Lewis, satirized in the thirties; he has developed sophistication and a social awareness that can only augur well for the future of this nation.

I welcome this emergence of the Filipino businessman as a conscious social force and an innovating class in our national life. Now we can be more confident of attaining Rizal's dream of a society in which the pursuit of private gain can be reconciled with the promotion of the public good.

I am particularly interested in the proposition and challenge contained in the report of your committee on social justice. The report asks: "How then do we keep the political order from disintegration?" While the premise behind this question can be debatable, there can only be agreement in the answers that follow: "Only by economic democratization," the report says: "making a just allocation of economic opportunities; giving the masses independent means to support the exercise of political rights; allowing national welfare to seep down to the broadest base of population; correcting the lopsided social order; giving the masses a voice in resolving public issues; placing them in a position to use public authority in promoting the general welfare; making the masses feel that they, too, have a stake in the existing political order and that they, too, are a part of this nation."

Allow me to say, however, that all this is an enumeration of some of the aspirations and purposes of a modern state. The question, it seems to me, is not one of aspiration and purpose but of process. The basic question is: "How?" You may say that the process, the "how" of national progress is essentially the function of leadership; and in this, you are right. Assuming that the national purpose has been clearly defined, it is the obligation of national leadership to see to it that the purpose is achieved. While the people clamor, the leader must perform.

For this reason, the quest for the leadership that will subscribe to these ideas, which, in the final analysis are ideas for change — is paramount. Going over the principles behind the reforms you proposed, I am touched particularly by those which repudiate the time-honored motivation of business enterprise — the profit motive. In one section, you would even propose the regulation of property and capital ownership: Welfare state or not, this proposition clearly repudiates the caveat emptor motto of laissez faire of the cold proposition that business is business, profit is profit, and it makes me wonder whether your quest is not already loaded against a certain kind of leadership.

For under this principle, government cannot be run like a business enterprise, with an eye single on the books of accounts. The journals of administration reflect not debits and credits but national results. It is not what the government as a bureaucracy has gained, but what the people as a nation have benefitted. And for this, the measure is national morale.

Given all the problems that this nation still faces, I can still say to you, with the conviction of personal experience, that the national morale is higher now. Our achievements as a nation have made us impatient for more because, for the first time, we have come face to face with our potential as a people. When our people say that more should be done, they mean that they want to do more because they believe that they can do more.

We have broken the dam of apathy and despair that have been the national mood for decades. Now, flushed with initial success, we are impatient for more successes. Some may lament this. But many of us choose to be heartened, for we can sense that such a national mood can only lead to more achievements, more triumphs — and, yes, even more challenges.

Do you cry for change?

Well, let me tell you, my friends, that the change has come. Our people have changed. They have become achievement-oriented. And not all the rhetoric, in whatever guise, can make them return to what I recently described as the old politics, the old economics, the old social ways.

All of you are part of that change, that transformation of the Filipino businessman. He has expanded his horizons; he thinks now in terms of global rather than local opportunities. He has become more venturesome, bolder, espousing ideas that would have been judged heretical as lately as five years ago. His is a new measure of confidence.

Who made the government consider the possibilities of trade relations with the Socialist countries but the modern Filipino businessman — like your own Teofisto Guingona. While your government, through the Department of Foreign Affairs, was conducting studies along these lines, Mr. Guingona himself came up with concrete proposals, upon returning from an unofficial trade mission from Soviet Russia.

Let me just repeat to you the observations of Mr. Guingona at the Foreign Policy Council meeting held November 7 last year.

He remarked that the potential of trade with Socialist countries was great; that all factors vital to trade considered, such as prices, customs duties, taxes, shipping facilities and freight, banking and handling charges and competitive sources, many Philippine exports can find ready markets in these countries; that trade between the Philippines and the specified Socialist countries be initiated and normalized as soon as possible; that in view of the lack of government recognition or diplomatic ties, the chamber-to-chamber agreements on trade be approved by the President of the Philippines as an initial, or interim, step towards trade until such time as diplomatic relations are established; that an administrative order be issued by the President of the Philippines enjoining all government agencies to help implement the trade with Socialist nations on such a basis; that diplomatic ties be established when feasible; and that the offer of assistance and economic aid of the Socialist countries be studied and explored for preferential use in projects geared towards helping the nation's development either for government or private entities.

I have enumerated these observations and recommendations to show that there has been a thoroughness in studying the possibilities of trade with Socialist countries in the government as well as in the private sector. On balance the government is taking the more circumspect approach due to unavoidable political problems. The government would consider such trade relations only on an experimental basis and on a case-to-case approach. The only transaction that has been allowed so far is the export of coconut oil to an East European country, Bulgaria.

If these views are shared by a majority of Filipino businessmen, I would like to know where their quest for leadership compatible with this enlarged vision would lead them. Such a quest, I feel sure, will not stop at the doors of those leaders advocating a policy of blind resignation to the status quo.

Let us remember that it won't be the government itself which shall be trading with the Socialist countries; its role, in this respect, is merely permissive. It is our own Filipino businessmen who will be negotiating the terms on a case-to-case basis; it is they who will determine the profit and loss. I leave the question of capability to you. If you cannot handle it, as some people would make us believe, because you are not as capable as the businessmen of other nations, just say so.

But I place my confidence in the ability of the Filipino businessman to handle his affairs — while we in government take care of the, political complications.

As I said earlier, this is just one example of the transformation that this nation has seen. There are many others: the militancy of the youth, the growing responsiveness of the masses towards their own problems, their conviction that, given the leadership, they can work out their own destiny. In sum, this confidence and optimism of Filipino businessmen is an infectious spirit.

This wider, more mature outlook of the modern Filipino businessman cannot be said to imply an ideological change of heart — unless one wishes to muddle the issue. It is the height of meanness to infer, from the position taken by responsible leaders of the business community, that they are sympathetic to the communist ideology. Similarly, the policy of the government for widening our trade and cultural horizons does not imply an abandonment of our traditional opposition to Communism.

The major Western powers, including the United States, France, and Great Britain, not to mention Japan in Asia, trade freely and reciprocally with selected Communist countries. No one has accused them of being inclined to Communism. To make this accusation of our country is to imply that the freedom we grant to other nations should be denied to ourselves because we are inherently inferior and incapable of exercising mature judgment. This is better known as the colonial mentality.

This, I am sorry to say, is the characteristic mentality of a certain type of critic of the Administration. We cannot move forward in progress and dignity when we habitually persuade ourselves that we are inferior to other countries, that we must seek refuge always behind the familiar and the traditional, that we must never entertain new ideas because what is new is dangerous.

Seen from another standpoint, this is the disease of inaction. A political party afflicted with such a disease is unable to put up any credible program of government. Therefore it must fall back on systematic hackling, the weary belaboring of antiquated issues against any party in power, the irresponsible and reckless smearing of reputations, the wanton use of black propaganda even against women and children.

This nation has never been cowed by the largest challenges. In 1898, in the political wasteland that was Asia, our forefathers dared to establish in these islands the first democratic republic outside the Western world. Mabini wrote that the Philippine Republic was a torch of freedom that would light the way for Asia and Oceania. This is the large and the noble vision that our greatest heroes shared. Our greatest achievements like those of any other nation, were realized not from an excess of caution and timidity, but from the fearless, wide-ranging and bold expressions of the Filipino spirit. I maintain that today, it is this bold spirit of the nation that is at work in the government and in our communities. This is also the spirit of the modern Filipino businessman.

This new social awareness and larger sense of responsibility will, I hope, lead the business community also to cooperate with the government in upgrading our tax structure. We are seeking an overhaul of the National Internal Revenue Code, not because we want to raise taxes, but because we must increase the collection of taxes. You are familiar with the fact that out of 83 amendments to the Revenue Code in the past two decades, no fewer than 50 were for tax, exemptions in one form or another. We should like to plug these escape hatches through which the government loses a tremendous amount of revenue for social and economic development. The purpose of this overhaul is to raise revenues, not necessarily taxes, and at the same time promote justice in taxation.

Tax reforms are an urgent priority because they help build the roots of a genuine democracy. Then we must husband all available resources to meet the mounting requirements of national development. It is my hope that you will support these reforms.

Businessmen — and the spirit of enterprise — have always been the agents of reform — of change. Was it not the galleon trade which brought new ideas to colonial Philippines near the turn of the century? These were the ideas that excited our heroes, from Rizal to Mabini. It is even said that the greatest single influence that brought the world to the modern age was the Hanseatic League. When men begin to trade, when they sit down to transact their business, they open a dialogue that is mutually influential.

And yet once entrenched, business may atrophy and lose the spirit of enterprise, if it stays on the beaten path, ceasing to be bold, until, challenged by events, it recovers its dynamism.

This has happened, I dare to think, with Filipino business. It has been jolted from the stagnation of decades. Now it seeks new worlds to conquer.

Our people welcome this development. I, for one, am gratified by this show of concern over the political and social health of the nation.

You have announced your manifesto.

Now let us get to work.

Address of President Marcos at the 4th Anniversary Program of "Let's Talk Business," July 30, 1969

The Record of Performance

I THINK THIS is the second time that I come before you on the program "Let's Talk Business." Of course, they have not been the only time when I talked business. I talk business everyday of the week, including Sundays.

I spoke last year on various business subjects including taxes and the like. There seems to be the impression that all kinds of taxes have been approved by Congress. I would like to tell you that there are two special taxes that were approved by Congress: one was the education tax and the other the science tax. I understand that the Opposition has promised the business sector the cancellation of all new taxes. Now if their position is to cancel the science tax and the education tax, that certainly is the most irrational thing ever said in the past several years.

What is the strategy for development adopted by the party in power? And what is the alternative of the Opposition? May I say that we have described our strategy of development repeatedly in the past.

As a way to encourage growth and integration, the integration of the traditional and the modern, the four-year program states in concise and precise terms this strategy. It also seeks to foster the increasing use of rationality in the decision-making process.

That sounds a little highfaluting, but what it actually means is let us put a little more logic and a little more system into the process of making decisions. It also indicates, or insinuates, that there have been other factors in the process of decision making, and that is quite true. One of them is politics.

Well, this year, it is possible that there will be more talk about politics than anything else considering that it is an election year. But, as President of our Republic, I assure you that decisions will continue to be made with the rationality that we feel must always dominate our planning as well as our implementation.

However, in this political year, we must consider the program of the administration as well as the alternative line of action proposed by the Opposition. These are matters that I want to take up with you, the businessmen, who are in a position to understand the issues more than any other sector of our population. You appreciate the need for a leader who clearly and precisely states his position, who states his plan for development, and who proceeds to demonstrate that such a plan can succeed in improving the public welfare.

Now, on the part of the present administration, what were the major lines of action taken in the area of business and economy? The first was to launch a program of increased agricultural production, of rice and corn, and after the staples, of her products. The staples had priority, they were important and necessary not only for a dignified kind of life but for survival, plain and simple.

If the purpose was to increase the per capita income of our people, then the target had to be the majority of our people. The main focus, therefore, was on the agricultural sector. This was one of the priorities in our development program. Thus came rice and corn, the miracle rice, irrigation, infrastructure, etc., about all of which you already know.

After these, or rather simultaneous with these — and I stress this because there are some who think that we have abandoned the industrial sector — came the massive refinancing program of distressed industries.

Now, how many distressed industries were refinanced during the last three years? About 2,000 industries. And how much was poured into these industries? P1,700,000. Where did this money come from? Now, you all know, since you are engaged in business, that for the first time in our history, we have been able to establish a private securities market.

The Development Bank of the Philippines sold what we know as convertible bonds. By convertible bonds, we mean the bonds of the Development Bank of the Philippines which could be converted into stocks of the corporations where the bank had equity or to whom it gives loans. Thus, there was a broadening of the corporate base. Before this, of course, you all know that most of the successful corporations were family corporations. Here, we have an effort to broaden the base by selling stocks to the small people of our country, including the tenants, the janitors and the laborers and the employees.

At the same time, as you who are financiers and those who are experts on monetary policies know, we had to be careful that in financing our industries we did not increase inflationary pressures. We were cautious because there was always the possibility that any further increase in the supply of money coming from the Central Bank would cause prices to spiral and, as you know, when I took over the Presidency, and this we have repeated often, and I would like to say it again, the daily income of the national government was P4 million, while the expenditures daily totalled P6 million. There was a daily deficit of P2 million, therefore, and within a year of this kind of operation by the national J government, the country would have had a huge deficit of about P700 million. This eventuality we had to avoid.

We avoided it by cutting expenditures. The figures that I have with me indicate the massive effort in reducing expenditures. For instance, expenditures for what is referred to as general government expenses were reduced from 25% of the budget to 20%, a reduction of anywhere from P150 million to P20 million.

There are cries from some sectors today about what they see as sudden release of funds. They call these funds the "miracle funds," adding that they I will do a lot of good for politics. Well, all I can say is "miracle funds" are certainly much better than "miracle losses" of funds which happened some years ago.

We also reduced the appropriations as well as the expenditures of the Armed Forces. Now, this may strike you as surprising. Well, it is a bit surprising because the activities of the Armed Forces have increased. We created ten engineer construction battalions in the Army, and an engineer construction battalion in each major service, the Air Force, the Navy, and also the Constabulary. Actually, right now, there are fourteen construction battalions. And we have also created the Home Defense Forces. The civic action centers have increased in number, and yet we reduced the cost of army operations from 17% to 14% of the budget.

We removed 7,000 pensionados, people on the government payroll who didn't go to the office except on payday. Did you ever hear about this? Well, if you did not, let me tell you that some of them are very articulate in opposing me now. You will find some of them in the Opposition. I also sacked 17 high-ranking officers, some of them Generals. I gave them a choice to face a court-martial for past misdeeds or go into retirement. They retired, with some of them again going to the Opposition. I had to do this although some of those I fired were my closest friends. They fought with me in Bataan, they were with me in the underground; but I had to cut the appropriations, cut it to have a more efficient government.

You who are our experts in management realize that this was a necessity. But, of course, to the politicians, this was unthinkable and my political advisers told me at the time I was taking action that I would harvest ill consequences come election time. I'm harvesting them now but I don't expect any deleterious effects on the outcome of the election.

Anyway, what else did we do? Well, as I said, the second line of action taken was the massive refinancing of distressed industries, and many of these friends of mine who have been complaining about the present economic situation have meanwhile increased their income. I have figures on this particular aspect, although I shall not mention specific individuals because to do so would be a violation of the Internal Revenue Code. But, in general, we have figures to indicate that there has been an increase in the income of individuals as well as of corporations. And we are ready to cite statistics and facts on this.

The third line of action was the acceleration of industrial growth through the creation of the Board of Investments and the passage of the Investment Incentives Act. I will not speak of the action taken in establishing priority areas for investment and the clarification of policies made possible by the creation of the Board of Investments. But this was one of the steps taken, which has quietly and inexorably brought about the increase in investments.

Talking about investments, there are some people who think that we have invested more of our limited resources in agriculture than in industry. That is not quite true. At the start, there was this inclination, yes. At the start, let's see, in 1966 we invested, I think, about 49% of our resources in agriculture. But through 1968 and up to 1969, 72% of our resources have been placed in industry and areas connected with industry. And this does not include the improvement of facilities necessary to industry, such as physical infrastructure and the like.

So we have, therefore, sought to accelerate industrial growth. We are now in the process of organizing an Industrial Development Commission under Secretary Roman Cruz who is here; he is the Secretary General of this Commission. At least, I have appointed him and we have prepared the orders.

Secretary Roman Cruz is the kind of technocrat that we need in the government.

What is the fourth? Now, the fourth was the creation of new sources of revenue, the mobilization of the resources of both government and the private sectors for the financing of new economic activities, and, of course, the redistribution of wealth. There is the perennial accusation against our economic system, and against our society, which states that five percent of our people own 33% of the wealth of our country. This is correct, too, and we have to somehow balance the distribution of wealth in our country. This is one of the objectives of the fourth line of action.

What are the most important programs of the administration? Well, you all know what they are. They have been articulated in the press and in public discussions which have gone on for sometime now.

In outline form, or capsule form, they are, first, the agricultural development program which includes production of rice, corn and export products.

Then you have the school program, which is also an investment, a long range investment, for better education will serve to guide our people in rectifying the inequities in our society and in avoiding the disruption of our body politics.

I have gone to all this trouble to explain to you, to outline the plan of action of the administration. I look forward, for instance, if I am re-elected, to a period when I could push the production not only of rice and corn but also of cattle. We have only 1,700,000 heads of cattle for 37 million people. The proper ratio according to the experts is one head of cattle per man, and so we have a long, long way to go in this area. And I would like to be able to push this program, then fish conservation and fish production, as well as the production of hog and poultry, and the like.

Incidentally, we have produced a new breed of chicken that can lay more eggs than any other chicken in the world. We just lack the opportunity to propagate this. And I would also like to be given the opportunity to push through not only the infrastructure program and the education program but the new program of land reform, which has barely been started.

One of the objectives we have is to meet the unemployment problem with the manpower training program. We would like to push through conservation and at the same time we would like to develop industry, the extractive industries, and push a little more the processing industries. Incidentally, in 1965 only 9% of our exports were finished products. Lately, this has increased to about 35%. This indicates that we have been increasing our capabilities for processing our raw materials. And these are the things that my friends in the Opposition don't seem to know at all. They appear to be unaware of these things, these data and statistics.

These are the facts and figures on what we have been working on for the past three years and a half, and which the Opposition just disregard or treat as though they were matters of no importance whatsoever.

Now, you, who know the process of development, you who are experts, realize what these factors are, what these statistics spell out for our future.

I have spoken too long, I think, and I was asked to speak for only 10 minutes. But this being an election campaign period, I think I am entitled to a little more time. Anyway, this is our program, our strategy to meet the common enemy of impoverishment, of deprivation, of disease, of ignorance, and to accelerate our pace. I would like to know whether the Opposition has a program and if it does, how it differs from ours. This, I think, is a valid question. Now I am ready for your questions.

Speech of President Marcos at the Joint Induction Ceremonies of the Quezon City Chamber of Commerce and the Quezon City Chamberettes, SSS Bldg., Quezon City, August 9, 1969

ENLARGING TRADE HORIZONS

By FERDINAND E. MARCOS
President of the Philippines

(SPEECH AT THE JOINT INDUCTION CEREMONIES OF THE QUEZON CITY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND THE QUEZON CITY CHAMBERETTES, SSS BLDG., QUEZON CITY, AUGUST 9, 1969).

I find it a great pleasure to be your guest today. The image of chambers of commerce, for some reason, provides a sense of assurance, if not of outright security. It has always been the compulsion of chambers of commerce to stand up for their communities, to speak up against criticism of their communities, and to welcome foreign visitors. I think this is a good thing.

I have a particular interest in the Quezon City Chamber of Commerce, because I see it as a dynamic force within a dynamic force—which is Quezon City itself.

Positive Change

I have the impression that Quezon City change every year, if not every week. It is a positive change—towards growth. I never come to Quezon City without seeing new constructions going up. In the past decade, this city has undergone a tremendous transformation. It is virtually unrecognizable from the city of just ten years ago. And I do not hesitate to say that this change has been due mostly to the initiatives and the venturesome spirit of Quezon City businessmen and industrialists. I believe that the most energetic of these men are members of this Chamber.

I can therefore speak to you with more than a reasonable guarantee of not only being understood, but of being taken to heart, and perhaps supported in my efforts to widen the transformation seen here in Quezon City to all parts of the country.

We need no less than to expand our trade horizons, if we are to maintain the momentum of growth generated in the past few years.

Beyond Self-Sufficiency

The problem before us, at least as far as economic development is concerned, is to drive forward well past self-sufficiency in essential needs, to claim our share of the brisk world trade building up other economies.

I am sure that you are aware of the efforts of the administration to press economic development on two fronts, simultaneously. Even as we develop our agricultural base, we are also developing our industrial capacities. Even as we strive to make our nation self-sufficient in food, clothing, and other needs, we are now intensifying our efforts to scale up our export production.

Groundwork for Abundance

I need not point out that we have cleared the hump in food production. We are now a rice-exporting country, and in the immediate future we shall be exporting rice in quantity and, I know, of higher quality. We are now well embarked on the program to exploit systematically and judiciously our rich fishing grounds, to produce a variety of food crops other than rice and corn, to disperse cattle more widely, such that every farming family may have one pair of cattle as a start. We have charted in detail how we may spark production in dairy farming, in truck gardening, in poultry, and in livestock.

New Import Pattern

For all practical purposes, even now we are reasonably self-sufficient in many of the needs basic to a decent life. That is why I have asked for the curtailment of non-essential exports, mostly in the category of luxury goods. We need to do this if we are to maintain the equilibrium in our balance of payments.

At the same time, we are trying to keep open the necessary importations needed by industry, specifically capital goods. There has been, notably in the last year, a rise in foreign exchange outflow, due to the upsurge in business and industrial activity.

To shore up this outflow, we have adopted certain measures, for instance, the use of available acceptance fines, trade credits, and a more extensive utilization of foreign sources of long-term capital.

Expanded Foreign Trade

But I foresee that our best alternative is expansion of Philippine exports. I need not point out that foreign trade will ultimately bring in the most earnings in foreign exchange. The fecund markets abroad are: in fact, our likeliest source for profits.

Meanwhile, our business community has the responsibility of innovating and initiating their own ventures parallel to the objectives of the government. I know you are with me in the pursuit of these objectives. At every step of the way, in the formulation of the country's strategy of development, I have been in consultation with the leaders of the business sector. I am assured that substantially our program of development has the approval of forward-looking business leaders.

Need for Discipline

I would ask you now to exercise the utmost discipline, as we travel the difficult road to economic stability. This discipline is urgently needed in the effort to change the pattern of foreign exchange expenditure, from the importation of non-essential goods to the importation of only the most essential goods.

I know that to some of us this will entail some sacrifice. But we must surely be aware of the greater stakes involved, and certainly you can see far enough into the future to know that what we are doing is for our children. Indeed, if we succeed even our generation will share in the benefits arising from the present exertions of our people.

East European Trade

In any case, we have started to explore the way forward, relative to the expansion of our export and other trade markets. You must be familiar by now with the feelers we have made toward tapping hitherto remote markets in East European countries. Since this is uncertain ground for us, both politically and economically, we are feeling our way carefully. For the moment, if we succeed at all in establishing trade ties with these countries, we must do so on a case-to-case basis.

What we are doing in this regard is neither radical nor dangerous, as some sectors would like to believe, for other open societies are already trading with these countries, including the United States.

RP-US Trade

Let me pass briefly on the future of Philippine-American trade relations. I know that many of you have this on your mind, particularly in view of the impending termination of the Laurel-Langley Agreement. I shall not repeat our stated policy on US parity. Suffice to say that it is not going to be restored in any future agreement on trade relations with the United States. There is consensus on this here as well as in America.

Hopefully, we shall evolve an even more judicious and enduring trade partnership with America. No less than United States President Nixon has given me his word that the U.S. will continue to maintain a viable and equitable business relationship with the Philippines. Given the goodwill and the respect which now characterize our relations with America, there is no reason why we cannot, in the forthcoming talks between the two governments, forge a new agreement vastly more acceptable than the Laurel-Langley pact.

Our Rich Potentials

As you can see, ladies and gentlemen, we are far from lost, far from being impotent despite the difficulties we face, and the long road still ahead. Our problems are implicit in a developing country, and our potentials are native to a country rich in natural resources, a country only barely scratched for the treasures it can yield.

To recall pertinent words from another leader, what we have to fear is only fear itself. Our business community, led today by experienced technocrats, has really nothing to fear, except its own doubts of its capacity to innovate, to renew, to pioneer.

Policy of Consultation

As for the government, I pledge, as President, to continue my policy of consultation. We have given meaning to the partnership between the public and private sectors. We have constantly pleaded for the strengthening of this partnership. God willing, and the electorate providing support, I shall enhance this partnership, and continue with greater vigor the program of development which has already started the widening of our national horizons.

I thank you.

Speech of President Marcos at the Opening of the ILO Asian Roundtable for Labor Administration as a Tool for Development, September 2, 1969

LABOR ADMINISTRATION AS A TOOL FOR DEVELOPMENT

By FERDINAND E. MARCOS

President of the Philippines

(DELIVERED AT THE OPENING OF THE ILO ASIAN ROUNDTABLE FOR LABOR ADMINISTRATION AND DEVELOPMENT PLANNING, WHO BUILDING, SEPTEMBER 2, 1969)*

As you already know, your conference in Manila coincides with our Presidential election season and I hope you understand that I could not be present in person to greet your conference today. I must go out and meet the voters not out of respect for my opponent, but out of respect for the people—for their right to demand an accounting from their President on his stewardship of the State.

I hope you will not allow this matter to distract you from your vital task in this Roundtable Conference. You will deliberate upon problems and possibilities of labor administration and development planning in the light of prevailing conditions in Asia. The Philippines, as host nation, intends fully to utilize this opportunity to learn from your own experiences and insights. We also hope to share our own modest experience in this field with you.

You could have not chosen a more important theme for your conference. Labor administration is, for most of our countries, relatively a frontier area characterized by many doubts and uncertainties. I think I speak for most of our governments when I say that labor administration is not the most likely sphere of government to receive urgent priority attention in the face of more imperative claims from other development sectors. I realize that on the other hand, in most governments in our regions, the ministry of labor is the most likely to have the lowest appropriation—probably because the human factor is not usually as tangible a thing as a road, a school, or a sack of rice.

And yet the most practical wisdom counsels us to give the highest priority to the human factor in development, not only in the sense that this is morally right. Human intelligence, human judgment and human skill must, after all, direct and mediate the impersonal economic forces that move a nation to progress. Moreover, in performing the function of social conscience for the government, the labor ministry underscores the principle that the purpose of all development is not simply to create wealth but ultimately to benefit, dignify and exalt the human personality.

The difficulties of labor administration in most of our countries undoubtedly inhere in the economic situation itself. For example, chronic unemployment works against the effective enforcement of labor laws and impedes the growth of free trade unions.

There is, moreover, an inclination for most governments in developing countries to establish the highest possible standards in the making of laws for the protection of the workers and their families. In the Philippines, we have had a long tradition of assuring legal protection to our workers. The Constitution of the Philippines must be one of the few written before the second World War which give the State a mandate to promote social justice, especially to protect woman and children labor. In some specific ways, the Philippine Constitution of 1935 anticipated the ILO Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944, which now forms part of the ILO Constitution, and whose substance is expressed in the principle: "Poverty anywhere threatens prosperity everywhere."

This mandate of our Constitution has been substantiated with a body of laws that includes the Minimum Wage Law, the Workmen's Compensation Law, the Woman and Child Labor Law, the Industrial Safety Act, the Magna Charta of Labor granting freedom of association and collective bargaining to workers, and more recently, the Agricultural Land Reform Code which extends all the rights granted to industrial workers to the workers in the agricultural sector.

The normal understanding of these laws is that they are designed to humanize the process of development, to bend the machine to the uses of man. I recall, in this connection, the profound observation made by His Holiness Pope Paul VI in the recent ILO 50th anniversary conference in Geneva, to the effect that technology must serve the worker, rather than enslave him, if we must attain the humane society we all profess to want.

Just as important however, is the fact that the well-being of the worker has been shown to have transcendent economic value. When productivity rises and the workers are allowed to participate in its fruits, the condition is attained for higher productivity and higher economic performance. But the more important reason, as Gunar Myrdal points out in his classic work on underdevelopment, Asian Drama, is that the quality of a nation's population, in the end, is more decisive for economic development than most other factors put together.

For this reason, in the Philippines we have decided to make human resources development a major aim and policy of our government. Not only has the educational system been revitalized and augmented with new facilities. For example, during the past three and a half years alone, more schoolrooms were built under our administration than all previous administrations put together beginning with the American colonial administration, in 1902 until 1965. But we have also given a new direction to our educational system. To complement the existing general and vocational schools, we have included a manpower training program which in the past nine months alone has already given occupational skills to about 45,000 out-of-school youth and jobless young adults. The aim of this program is to train about 100,009 young people a year in a range of 44 occupational skills. This is undertaken through a network of 137 training centers all over the country which admit the children of the poor free of charge. I should like on this occasion to acknowledge our profound debt to the ILO and to the United Nations Development Program for their approval of a project to establish a National Skills Manpower Training Center in the Manila area, which will be a pilot demonstration center for vocational instructors in our manpower training centers.

I note that the ILO has launched its World Employment Program which considers manpower training as a necessary measure for the promotion of employment. The promotion of employment is an aspect of labor administration and development planning to which, I hope, your conference will be able to give the fullest possible attention. This is a goal of every government but it can be attained only by giving labor administration full access to the planning board and setting employment targets in the context of development objectives. Under my administration, the National Youth and Manpower Council has been created precisely to ensure that our manpower objectives are fully reflected in our development planning. The Council coordinates the manpower activities of several major departments of the government as well as training policies in the private sector.

All this means that labor administration will become increasingly important in each of our countries, not only for the enforcement of labor laws, but also as a direct instrument for the promotion of economic and social development. I am glad to note that during the past three and a half years of my administration, the Department of Labor in our own government has increased significantly in importance as well as in stature. I know I forecast correctly the trend in all of our countries—a trend towards the increasing usefulness of labor ministries in the planning and implementation of development programs. For labor administration is, at least potentially, a major tool not only for the protection of workers but also for the acceleration of progress—progress in which all can share.

Your task in this Conference is how to sharpen this tool and raise it to its Optimum effectiveness. I know I speak not only for my government, but for yours, too, when I say that we wish you success in this important and innovative task. May I, at the same time, wish you a pleasant and memorable stay in our country which regards you not so much as transient guests but as brothers in a common cause and a common destiny.

Speech of President Marcos at the Opening Ceremonies of the Follow-up Seminar to the 1967 Seminar on Rural Medicine, September 5, 1969

RURAL HEALTH AND NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

By FERDINAND E. MARCOS
President of the Philippines

(SPEECH AT THE OPENING CEREMONIES OF THE FOLLOW-UP
SEMINAR TO THE 1967 SEMINAR ON RURAL MEDICINE,
UST, SEPTEMBER 5, 1969)

Two years ago, I stood in this very hall and exhorted you to accept the challenge of bringing medical science to the rural areas.

Much has taken place since that First National Seminar on Rural Medicine.

We have sought to carry out the various recommendations and proposals that emerged from that important dialogue.

Advances in Health

We have strengthened the structure and quality of our rural health services. We have in operation today 1,459 rural health units. But we know that these are still inadequate. To expand the services, we have increased the appropriations for rural health from ₱23 million in 1965 to ₱35 million in 1968 and ₱57 million in 1969. To make the program of free medicine truly more meaningful, we have raised it from four centavos per person in 1965 to 52 centavos in 1968 and 71 centavos in 1969. We shall not tire of raising this continuously, from year to year, to the extent that our government can bear the cost.

Consistent with the recommendation of the first seminar we have pursued a large-scale road construction program. In the three years of this administration we have increased the total span of concrete roads by 100 per cent; of asphalt roads up to 20 per cent; of feeder roads by 15 per cent; and that of permanent national bridges by 17 per cent.

You will recall that the first seminar also recommended an acceleration and intensification of the rural electrification program to promote faster economic development of the barrios. I am pleased to report that I have already signed the rural Electrification Law which will boost the development and economic growth of the barrios. This is immensely significant to us because electrification in the rural areas will enhance the usefulness of hospitals and clinics by making possible the use of X-rays and other diagnostic and treatment apparatus.

We have been able to “nationalize” all positions in the health services which used to be paid out of provincial funds. Now we can afford to give “hazard-pay” to health employees in the so-called hazardous areas. These developments will no doubt promote the efficiency of our health workers.

Special Programs

We have launched special programs to hasten the social uplift of the masses. As an example, your work has become a vital and indispensable component of the Central Luzon Development Program.

We recognize the socio-economic character of the problem in this particular area and therefore have embarked on a large-scale and long-range social justice program unprecedented in the history of that region. It is through the health service component of this program that we reach the individual citizen in that pivotal area and make him feel that the solicitude of his government truly comes to him.

The private sectors have cooperated admirably in this work. The Philippine Medical Society has sent teams of nurses and physicians to the hinterlands. I have received information that many of the provincial chapters of the Philippine Medical Association are very active in their program of volunteer rural health services. The medical schools have responded by revising their curricula. They now require rural internships for their students to prepare them for rural health work. Colleges of dentistry and pharmacy, I am told, have also amended their curricula and have included rural medicine to orient their students to rural health work. Many other agencies, both government and civic, are doing their share and I wish to acknowledge publicly their contributions to our goal of improving health services in the rural areas. The Department of Education, the Department of Public Works and Communications, the Department of Agriculture and Natural Resources, the Department of National Defense, the Presidential Arm on Community Development, the Department of Social Welfare, the Philippine Rural Reconstruction Movement, the Presidential Assistant on National Minorities, the Bayanihan, the private volunteers—all of them contribute significantly to our humanitarian mission.

Free Clinics

The control of diseases and the extension of health facilities to the remote barrios are major goals to which we intend! to address ourselves with increasing vigor. We have expanded health services and will provide free medicine to all needy citizens on a scale never before seen. We cannot afford to be complacent for we must reach that 60 per cent of our population that die without ever seeing a doctor or a nurse. To reach the people in the isolated areas of our country, I have requested the Department of Health, the Presidential Arm on Community Development, and the Philippine Medical Association to combine their efforts and begin a massive medical assistance project for the rural areas.

Our political charlatans will seek to obstruct us but we shall not be deterred from fulfilling our responsibilities to the less fortunate people of the country.

This program calls for mobilization of all rural health units which will work jointly with the Presidential Arm on Community Development and with the volunteers of the Philippine Medical Association. This will be an example of government agencies merging forces with a volunteer group on a nation-wide scale. Medicine and medical services will be given free to the barrio people through free clinics. This way we can bring medicine directly to the barrio people and to places where it is most needed. This program will cover all the 33,817 barrios of the country. The significant aspect of this program is that from 1,500 to 2,000 medical volunteers will be mobilized in all towns and barrios to give free clinics to the neediest people. This is a fine example of civic action. To insure a smooth implementation of this program of free clinics, a national coordinating committee has been established. In each province the project will be supervised by a provincial coordinator.

High Priority

Our rural health program will continue to enjoy the highest possible priority. No nation can achieve its goals unless the people are strong and healthy. The moral character of a nation and the effectiveness of a government are bound up with the physical fitness of its people.

The economic development and progress of any country depend to a large extent on the health of its manpower. Our nation cannot achieve genuine social and economic stability without an effective program of public health that will reach every Filipino.

I, therefore, urge you to redouble your support of the goals of our rural health program. This is how, on both the personal and official levels, you can help your country. For our program of social and economic development is, in a manner of speaking, anchored on the health of our people.

Thank you and good day.

Address of President Marcos at the Conferment of the Order of Kalantiao on Don Quintin Paredes, September 9, 1969

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Conferment of the Order of Kalantiao on Don Quintin Paredes

[Delivered on September 9, 1969]

A Tribute to Don Quintin Paredes

MOST HEROES ARE appreciated and honored too late. Too late, sometimes, because they are long dead when the homage comes; too late, perhaps, also for the living hero if at all he is recognized and acknowledged, because it comes long after the time of crisis and long after the triumph. And when the tribute does come, it is also always inadequate, a small measure of a deed that it seeks to honor, for the measure of a man is his genius, his competence, his strength and his capabilities. He is often marked only by the essence of the man or by tragedy.

Today, we are gathered in such belated and inadequate tribute to a man who devoted more than half a century of his life to the service of his people and of his country. He abides and he endures, a legend among his people. And there is surely nothing that we can do or say that will add to the stature of this man, save the fact that in trying to honor him thus, we honor the great heritage of our country.

For it is rightly said of such men as Don Quintin Paredes that the satisfaction of their lives does not consist in recognition of their work, but in the very work itself including all its drudgery, its sacrifices, and all its suffering, in the ceaseless and in the continuous crisis of action.

Yes, it is in the glory of achievement without reward that one finds heroism. Greatness without self-pity demands distinction or recognition.

We see his kind in men like Jose Rizal, Apolinario Mabini, Emilio Aguinaldo, Claro M. Recto and Jose P. Laurel, all Filipinos like us, but all of them also in some degree different and isolated from the rest of us. They are with us in their humanity and in race; but something also elevated them above the multitude, leaders walking several ten feet taller than their contemporaries, among their people, in the very affirmation, of their identity with them.

When we look at the history of this nation of ours, it is their faces and their omnipresence that we invariably see in the periods of crisis and in the periods of greatness. When we look for the sources of their greatness, we find them in the fortitude and wisdom of their mind, as well as the valor of their arms.

They were uncommon.

There were some who like Andres Bonifacio and Emilio Aguinaldo expressed this largeness, this greatness of spirit in the field of strife. Others like Jose Rizal, Claro M. Recto, Laurel, and Mabini expressed it through their pens and awakened their countrymen to our history.

And there were still others like Jose P. Laurel and Sergio Osmeña, Sr., whose birthday we also celebrate today, who worked patiently in the service of the government, sometimes unnoticed and unknown, and gave reality to the dream of a progressive and peaceful nation. The glory of their lives does not consist of one magnificent act of heroism as in war or in battle, or of one startling, soaring work of the imagination, but of a hundred day-to-day small achievements, which when summed up loom as a formidable and exemplary accomplishment. Their heroism, one might say, is the greater kind of heroism, for physical heroism is sometimes cheap as it is sometimes easy to die in combat. It is easier to receive a bullet in one's body than to withstand pressures upon one's spirit and one's soul.

Their patience and fervor in the midst of drudgery, corruption, weakness, are a necessary act of valor that comes when the battles have been won and the people are already awakened to their dream and to their freedom. When to have freedom is as common as breathing common air, then it is hard to be heroic.

Such a man is the Filipino we honor today.

From the time when he first went into the service of his government in 1906 as an Assistant Prosecuting Attorney in Manila, to the time of his retirement in 1961 as a Senator of the Republic, Don Quintin Paredes was a man whose life was interwoven with the deepest aspirations of his people.

In the service of the law, he fought fiercely for the rights of citizens and realized in his work the true workings of justice and the majesty of the law.

As a Senator, he worked for all sectors of the national community and authored many major laws for their benefit. For we, the younger generation, remember him as principally responsible for our Revised Penal Code and later on, after the war, he also participated in the formulation and enactment of the new Civil Code and the Magna Carta of Labor. And as has been said by Senator Tañada, he would rather be right than be President.

However, I would like to say that Don Quintin Paredes is qualified in every way for the position of President. He labored as Speaker in the House of Representatives and as President of the Senate, but these so-called training grounds for the Presidency failed to hurl him to the highest political position, perhaps because he wanted it that way.

But as in the case of Jose P. Laurel and Claro M. Recto, the substance of his work already made him a giant among his contemporaries and left its lasting mark on the history of this nation. And like them, retirement never really removed him from the scene. He abides and he endures.

As we look at the nation today, as we confront today's problems and face the new decade waiting just around the corner, we turn anew to the example of this man, to his words and to his deeds. The new priorities and the new challenges make him no stranger to our political life today, for he, like the rest of his generation, was a visionary in his time — a man who looked beyond his times and read the shapes of things to come.

It is indeed a happy occasion for me to award him the Order of Kalantiao, and in this connection may I say that it was not the order of Sikatuna, the rank of datu, that was given him because the Order of Kalantiao is a higher decoration and a higher order in the Philippines.

Up to now in the entire history of the Philippines only about six have been awarded the Order of Kalantiao. But every Ambassador who leaves our country, after completing his assignment here, receives the Order of Sikatuna. And since he has been known as a nationalist, and identified with nationalism, I believed that it was necessary that he be not identified with foreign representatives.

I am also doubly happy for this occasion because many years ago, he does not remember it perhaps, when he campaigned with my father, I used to take care of the horses and the provisions they needed on the campaign trail.

Don Quintin Paredes was the contemporary of my father and on his election campaign sorties when he was still Speaker of the House of the Representatives I used to give him a massage. I was a youngster in my teens, and ambitious to be like him, I swore that someday he and I would meet on equal terms.

I am indeed very happy that this occasion has come, and I have been able to award him the highest decoration that can be granted to a Filipino in our Republic.

Marcos, F. E. (1978). Presidential speeches (Vol. 2). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Speech of President Marcos at the Testimonial Parade and Review, September 10, 1969

SOME WORDS OF CAUTION AND ADVICE TO THE ARMED FORCES

By FERDINAND E. MARCOS
President of the Philippines

(SPEECH AT THE TESTIMONIAL PARADE AND REVIEW AT CAMP AGUINALDO, 10 SEPTEMBER 1969)

I thank you for your pledge of loyalty to me and as I receive this pledge of loyalty, I also ask you to pledge your loyalty to our flag and to our Constitution.

More than three years ago, you honored me with a similar ceremony on this same parade ground. And if you will remember, at that time, the Armed Forces of the Philippines was recovering from a severe blow of public criticism, for military men had been accused of connivance with smugglers, dissidents, and other lawless elements in our country.

I met with you and acting on your own recommendations, I instituted remedial measures at once in my capacity as secretary of defense. Your effective implementation of my directives brought into being a new type of soldier—the soldier-builder, the soldier of peace, a constructive soldier and not a destructive one, a soldier who learns not only to fight and win, but who has learned to build and to hold precious the free institutions for which he is often called upon to suffer, and perhaps to lay down his life.

Today, in the name of our people, for I know that the great majority of them appreciate and acknowledge their indebtedness to you, I should like to thank you for a job well done. Your commendable performance of your military duties as well as your concrete accomplishments in various economic activities are tangible proofs of your dedication to the service.

When our country, our people, were in doubt about their capability to build roads, our engineer soldiers started out to prove themselves with the former Highway 54, now known as the Epifanio de los Santos Avenue. And, using your engineers for development, you have demonstrated the capability of the Armed Forces of the Philippines as nation-builders by helping construct the North Diversion Road. Our people have not recovered from the pleasant surprise they had from viewing your activities in infrastructure.

You have sent out to every nook and corner of our country medical teams, civic action teams and contrary to the claim that we have sent the cream of our civic action groups to Vietnam, we have civic action groups in great numbers throughout the country, in accordance with the policy that I have established under this administration.

As your Commander-in-Chief I am proud to be able to say that we have a new Armed Forces of the Philippines, even as we are building a new Philippines. This is an Armed Forces of the Philippines that is not loyal to one person alone; it is loyal to the ideas for which our forebears fought hundreds of years, and loyal to the principles on which our Constitution is based. While other countries see their armed forces utilized in the subversion of their own government, our armed forces, and I repeat this, as I must continue to reiterate the truth in the face of treachery, prevarication and distortions, the Armed Forces of the Philippines has been the stabilizing factor in this country. Any element may conceivably threaten our government, our Republic, our free institutions, our democracy, but the Armed Forces of the Philippines will be as steadfast, as impregnable in the defense of the Republic of the Philippines.

Loyalty to the Constitution

In this land of the free where we encourage dissent, no man can rightfully demand personal loyalty. It must be earned. If this occasion manifests your loyalty to me, I accept it humbly.

Loyalty is Based on Trust

But loyalty is based on mutual trust, mutual respect, or on dedication to a common cause.

Today I ask you to rededicate yourselves as I do, to our common cause of freedom and liberty.

In war, you and I have demonstrated our loyalty to our flag. In peace, we have worked together to help free our people from the shackles of hunger, disease, poverty, and illiteracy.

The Soldier as Protector and Builder

My friends, we are fast approaching election day. I take this occasion to remind you once again to refrain from engaging in any partisan political activity. Your primary duty in all elections is to help keep peace and order.

In the discharge of your duties, I want you to exercise judicious care. Your acts can be misunderstood. In everything you do, try to make every man in our land understand, be he official or plain citizen, or a member of this party or that party, understand that the soldier of today is his protector, not his oppressor—a builder, not a destroyer.

Our soldiers must uphold the right of our people to expose and to oppose arbitrary power wherever it may come from. Our people depend upon our soldiers to protect them from oppressive and tyrannous acts.

A single act of abridgement of the people's freedom by servicemen alienates the people from their government. When the people lose faith in their government, anarchy ensues. This is the worst thing that can happen to a nation, for nothing can prosper in chaos and disarray.

It is to uphold freedom that I directed the immediate investigation of every constabulary, or navy, air force, or army man who may have threatened any of the freedoms of our people. It was said that there was an attempt to stop the publication of the Dumaguete Times; this I immediately had investigated. It was said that there were efforts on the part of the Philippine Constabulary to oppress citizens, in some provinces. These reports are being investigated. It is said that some of our soldiers have been too overzealous in pursuing the enemy in Central Luzon that they have violated some of the laws, like entering private premises without a proper order from a court. This I have ordered investigated. And if any government man is found guilty of violations of the law, whether he is in uniform or not, he shall be prosecuted and punished. But if you are performing your duty faithfully, in accordance with the law and the standards of an officer and a gentleman, rest assured that I, as your President, will give you the protection of the office of the Presidency.

Agreement on Subversion

Also, in the interest of preventing possible violations of civil liberties, I have directed the Secretary of Justice and the Secretary of National Defense to study the handling of highly sensitive cases concerning persons suspected of subversive activities. I am glad to know that Secretary Mata and Secretary Enrile had given top priority to this matter, resulting in the present established procedure that no charges of subversion shall be brought against any person by the military without prior and thorough evaluation of all evidence by experts of the Department of Justice.

I have approved this norm of procedure. And I enjoin all concerned to work out its effective implementation. In the impartial administration of justice, our people will begin to understand and to appreciate the meaning of security under the rule of law.

Weed Out Undesirables

The thousand acts of courage and the outstanding service of many of you can easily be overshadowed by bold headlines about the abuses and indiscretions of a few.

At the same time while it is unfair that the acts of one may affect thousands of the men and officers of the Armed Forces of the Philippines, you are all servicemen, you are all servants of the people like me, and therefore must bear with fortitude public scrutiny.

It is therefore incumbent upon you to purge the armed forces of undesirable elements whose actions tarnish your name and reputation.

I appeal to the civic-spirited citizens of our country to support our drive to rid the armed forces of misfits and corrupt officers by gathering enough courage to come forward and help investigators establish evidence to convict the guilty.

I am very happy to take note of the organizations that have come in to offer help to the week-end warriors of our country. These volunteers are now in the Air Force, in the cavalry, in the marines, and I noticed even a platoon of soldiers who are being trained by the members of our Olympic rifle and pistol team.

Now, this is a development that I would like to comment on. I congratulate the patriotism of these men and women who are giving a precious part of their time, their private resources, and their considerable talents, in order to develop our citizen army. For it is quite true, and I repeat this, that even if our armed forces can by itself defend our country against any, and I repeat, any enemy, it is the intention of the Filipinos to fight as one, to make it so costly for any prospective invader or infiltrator that no one may ever dream of coming to take our country again.

I have said repeatedly that our citizen army is the backbone of our national defense. And so in pursuit of that, we have the week-end soldiers, in the cavalry, using their own horses, their own equipment, and we have the olympic shooting team members developing a snipers group. Although I saw only three or four sniper rifles in that entire platoon, I would like this unit to be completely equipped the next time that they are paraded before us. And I thank the captain of the Philippine Olympic rifle and pistol team, Chito Feliciano for this service, and I also thank Col. Jake Zobel.

I call upon all the citizens, to join in this task, and I ask the chief of staff and the secretary of national defense to call upon our comrades who are retired, and utilize their talents in the organization of our citizen army, such that we have more effective national defense posture.

Small-Unit Leadership

In the past, I told you that the most important single element of the Armed Forces is the soldier, the ordinary soldier. He is the AFP to our people. He is the Army, the Air Force, the Marines, the Navy, the Constabulary, because he belongs with the elements who are in frequent and direct contact with our citizenry. If what he does is good, he projects a respectable image of the military and if it is not then the military has a bad image.

Perhaps we can look into the matter of upgrading the quality of leadership among our small units down to the squad and even smaller detachment. And I say this advisedly because many of the incidents that have reached the front pages of our newspapers, and the commentators of radio and television, have been incidents that involved small unit leadership. It seems our system of training has been concentrated on big units. It is possible that in the process of large-scale planning, the intrinsic value of the small unit might have been taken for granted, if not completely ignored.

Command Sergeant Major

In line with the development of small-unit leadership, maybe you can look into the experience of the Philippine Air Force, particularly in the matter of designating an outstanding enlisted man as Sergeant Major.

From what I have gathered, the Sergeant Major of the Air Force serves as an effective link between the commander and the enlisted men in his command. During inspections, the Sergeant Major has provided the commander with timely assessments of the state of morale of the command as well as of specific problem areas needing the immediate attention of the commander.

My friends, I reiterate my gratitude to you not in words but in action, and so today I am pleased to announce before you that I am signing this bill increasing the monthly base pay of soldiers in the Armed Forces of the Philippines. Now, this bill has been approved by Congress and it will probably take sometime before it can be implemented, but the bill is there and I would like you to listen to the increases: For privates, an increase from ₱130 to ₱180; private first class, from ₱135 to ₱185; Corporal, from ₱140 to ₱195; Sergeant, from ₱145 to ₱205;. Staff Sergeant, from ₱155 to ₱220; Technical Sergeant, from ₱165 to ₱240; Master or First Sergeant, from ₱175 to ₱260.

I now sign this bill into law in your presence. Now, allow me to say thank you to you; this is supposed to be my last year in office as your commander-in-chief according to my present term. It is my hope, however, that I will still be here next year to receive your pledge. We have worked together, we have fought in time of war and labored in time of peace to lift our nation upward, to independence and later toward progress. There is more to be done, each and everyone of us have our post, we have our respective assignments and our missions. Let every soldier do his duty. We cannot stop now for our people want us to carry on with me wherever you are assigned, whether you are assigned to posts in populated areas or to some distant base, such as the Turtle Islands, or the Batanes, or some unknown and forsaken area, just remember, even if you are alone we are with you. When you suffer, we suffer with you, when you feel aggrieved because there is too much criticism, remember that it is the essence of democracy for which you and I had fought. And now that we have this freedom, we must treasure it, we must encourage dissent, we must be irreproachable in conduct and in character. Even if you are alone, we are, I repeat, with you. Carry on therefore; if you fail, we fail with you, and if you succeed we shall glory in your achievements.

Thank you very much again, and carry on. Goodbye.

Address of President Marcos before the Chamber of Commerce of the Philippines, September 30, 1969

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
Before the Chamber of Commerce of the Philippines

[Delivered on September 30, 1969]

The Poverty Barrier Has Been Cracked

LET ME CONGRATULATE the new officers of the Chamber, the men who as they assumed office tonight presented their program of activities for the coming year. I note this for it is my hope that the two parties who now seek the popular mandate will similarly present their program of activities for the coming four years. If the officers of this organization find it necessary to prepare a program for governing your chamber even for one year, I think that it is necessary that the two parties present a program of government relating to our economy.

We are all looking ahead to the changes in the 70's, and we must present a plan to you now.

We feel that we have just passed a great danger, and insofar as the economic health of the nation is concerned, we have surmounted what used to be considered as insurmountable problems, owing to the perseverance and the unflagging confidence of our people in themselves.

We have demonstrated what can be achieved through foresight and the will to achieve and we have passed through the breakthrough years. But this will not mean very much in the next decade if we do not proceed with the same spirit in the coming years. There has to be continuity. We must take advantage of this momentum, we must accelerate the pace that has already been set. The vision must be sustained if we are finally to attain the progressive society of our dreams.

New international policies, unexpected problems of various national economies, will certainly affect us in the Philippines, and we must plan for this now. If necessary, we must change policy, we must change attitude, for the mental cast of the past will only be overwhelmed by the increasingly complex problems that will surely come in the future. It is evident, therefore, that political decisions must cope with this new complexity, and this means greater sophistication on the part of the decision makers.

In this context, the Philippines can no longer afford to be parochial or provincial. This risk is, of course, ever present; much depends, however, on the kind of leadership we have. It is also in this context that we have formulated the economic program that I would like to discuss with you now.

Basically, the program continues to strive for greater improvement in the living standards of our people and in our environment, which should foster sound economic growth. This goal is reflected in terms of increasing the annual average growth in real per capita gross national product from 2.5 per cent as envisioned in the fiscal years 1967 to 1970 plan, and 3.5 percent in the years; 1970 to 1974 plan.

Having started the momentum which has accelerated growth in the recent years, and I must add, having surpassed the major targets in fiscal 1967, the new plan aims to capitalize on this momentum to further accelerate the attainment of aggregate gains to more ambitious levels. The real GNP's are expected, therefore, to grow at an annual average of 7.1 percent, higher than the 6.2 percent average of the existing target.

Specifically the new program is geared towards the attainment of the following objectives:

First, generate more employment and provide various other social services i for a rapidly expanding population;

Second, further improve conditions of production, marketing and distribution in the agricultural sector, in particular, and the economy in general;

Third, rationalize the industrial sector; and Fourth, improve the balance of payments in order to increase foreign exchange available for the attainment of development goals.

But while the new plan envisioned is a continuation of the development process as embodied in the present or previous plan, it also seeks to place emphasis on new areas deemed instrumental or of sustained economic growth. Let no one say that this is just developmental rhetoric; I invite you to measure these goals against what has been planned and achieved in recent years. I need not cite statistics at this point. The claims are verifiable by a simple trip around the country.

One of the secrets of development that we discovered in the past three years is the concentration of limited resources on a given point, thus preventing what an economist terms as the overextension of limited resources, which is the cause of failure. When I was listening to your two Presidents list down all the objectives of economic development and say that we had to attain all these goals at one inclusive time, I decided that in the coming years we would request our two friends to sit down with us and discover once again that overextending limited resources is not the answer to our problem. Rather, we must concentrate our limited resources on given priority areas, one at a time, for to do otherwise,

I reiterate, would be to repeat the failure of the previous administration.

Before I proceed any further, may I again, at the risk of repetition, inform you of the growth that we have attained.

The economy's actual growth showed a 6.2 per cent increase in the last two years, as against the target of 5.8, and a 6.4 per cent increase in the last two years, as against the target of 6.2 per cent. This is the highest sustained rate of growth achieved by our economy in any given period since after the war.

I have chosen this occasion to announce the highlights of the government's draft five-year plan for the fiscal years 1970-1974. This plan takes cognizance of Joint Resolution No. 2 of the Congress of the Philippines.

But before I do so, it is necessary to review, no matter how quickly, the performance of the economy during the past several years. We can build the future only on the basis of present achievements.

The private sector has been a driving force in these years of vigorous economic growth. Tonight I am grateful for this opportunity to convey my appreciation to you as leading members of our dynamic private sector.

Our economic development has just begun. The process of evolving from an underdeveloped, dualistic and poor economy to an integrated, self-generating and ever-growing economy is a long process; indeed it may take a decade. The cycle of poverty is tenacious and enduring. And to break it completely requires a lifetime.

We can only begin, and we can only so orient our economy and accelerate our pace that no accidents of political leadership, and no accidents of political decisions, will alter the inexorable movement forward of our economy in the future. And that is why it is necessary that the same hand that guided our economy in the past four years, which saw the highest rate of growth and pace of development, should continue to guide it in the next four years.

We have not fully overcome the cycle of poverty but we have interrupted if not halted it.

There are critics, of course, who say that we should have overcome poverty by now, in just four years, but I repeat, it will require a lifetime to break the cycle of poverty in our country. If the United States, a highly progressive country, still finds poverty among its people, if other countries equally progressive find poverty among a great number of their citizenry, let us not be so childish as to think that we will be able to eradicate poverty among our people in a period of four years. We have cracked the development barrier, and this is about the most accurate statement that I could make; we have Cracked the development barrier that had isolated us in poverty and shut us off from genuine progress. These very cracks, the new gaps that we are creating, are the measures of our development and our grounds for hope. For paradoxically, in the sequence of the development process, the solution to problems at one level creates the problems at another.

The breakthrough in rice production and the initial impact of our infrastructure projects are creating shortages in warehousing and bulk storage facilities as well as under-capacities in domestic trade.

We are developing piers, only to discover that our domestic shipping is deficient. We are developing airports only to discover that our air navigation communications are deficient. The very success of our refinancing schemes for distressed industries, the general acceleration of economic growth, over-achievement of growth targets, initial successes of our Board of Investments and the increase in the generation of government-sponsored development projects, have increased our import requirements for capital goods and raw materials to a level above our past ability to earn foreign exchange. These are some of the problems we now face but did not face before I took over as President, when our rate of growth was not as rapid and therefore did not require this solution.

The aim of the plan is still the same: to break economic dualism and develop a vigorous, integrated, self-reliant and ever-growing economy. The new plan capitalizes on the development momentum to accelerate economic transformation. Real gross national product is set to grow at an annual average of 7.1 per cent. Per capita gross national product is scheduled to increase from 2.9 per cent in 1970 to 3.8 by 1974.

Now, specifically, the new plan commits itself to the following objectives:

- a. generate an average of 460,000 new jobs a year;
- b. upgrade and increase available social services for a rapidly expanding population;
- c. improve conditions of production, marketing and distribution in the agricultural sector and in the economy in general;
- d. increase the competitiveness of the industrial sector; and
- e. improve the availability of foreign exchange for the attainment of development goals.

We must now apply the lessons that we learned in the rice and corn program to other agricultural products, to other cash programs and food crops.

Finally, to further bridge the income distribution gap between the rural and urban sectors, land reform efforts will be intensified.

We must now actually look closer into the means of bringing about a new system of acquisition of land. To manage this, the Land Bank is eyeing a land swap project, and we are studying this. The marketability of land bonds will be improved by giving the Land Bank a preferred list of bids for the purchase of public lands selected for disposal. The preferred list shall work in terms of limiting purchases to the holders of Land Bank bonds. Land owners in priority areas of land reform will then have greater inducement to exchange their lands for Land Bank bonds and this in turn will enable more effective acquisition of land in the priority areas for distribution.

Now, in industry, the program contains a more detailed listing of priority projects, together with the investment requirements, thus enabling the rational restructuring of the industrial sector. These are the areas that the Board of Investments has provided with incentives to encourage private investment. Furthermore, taking cognizance of the role of technical research in agricultural and industrial development, the program includes an outline of the areas for research which will receive major government attention.

We have reached the point where we must now integrate agricultural and industrial activities, and this is one of the sore points in planning as well as in implementation. Just exactly what do we mean by the integration of agriculture and industry? People have different definitions of integration. However, we should start with domestic trade. There must be more efficient distribution of goods in the country between the producing and the consuming sectors of the economy. This is an essential complement of the integration of agricultural and industrial activities. Movement of agricultural commodities to industrial plants and consumer markets will be improved; industrial output will have ready access to urban and farm products. The end effect would be balanced growth, stable prices and the expansion of domestic products.

Direct government assistance will concentrate on pioneer or deferred industries as listed by this Board of Investments. Thus far, the Board of Investments has approved 120 out of 151 applications for registration. The total cost of these projects is some P1.8 billion. These projects will require some P211 million in loans and equity financing from government financial institutions.

The second investment priorities plan of the Board of Investments aims at the generation of integrated industrial complexes in food processing, metal processing and intermediate petro-chemical production. Total investment requirements for these integrated industrial complexes will run to some P6.3 billion.

Infrastructure projects will maintain their high priority in the coming years. Total investment in infrastructure facilities in the next five years are estimated at some P4 billion.

We will now look into the further extension of feeder roads. We have constructed in the past three and one half years about 12,000 kilometers of roads, and the feeder roads will be extended so as to complete about 5,000 kilometers more of feeder roads in the next several years.

We must develop our human resources, and that we have started with the manpower development program. We must continue with this, since this is one of the basic answers to unemployment; and we must provide increasing education, health, community development, social and welfare services.

The centers of manpower training will turn out an average of 100,000 skilled workers composed of school youths and young adults every year, who will be eligible for immediate employment.

The manpower plan is geared towards reducing the unemployment rate from the present 7.8 per cent to 6.3 per cent by 1974. This plan will absorb the 430,000 annual entrants to the labor force as well as increase labor productivity by some 4.3 per cent a year.

The plan on the matter of balance of payments suggests two programs to solve our present foreign exchange difficulties:

- a. re-structuring our external debt, and
- b. export promotion and diversification combined with rational import substitution.

Re-structuring our external debt will gradually eliminate those instances when we are temporarily pressed for short-term funds. In the past we relied too much on short-term foreign funds to tide us over the lean months. Such a method of financing forces us to come up with dollar payments even before development projects start producing. This imposes a heavy burden on our foreign reserves.

Re-structuring our foreign debt will enable us to postpone dollar payments to the time when these investment projects become productive and provide the dollars with which to pay their loans.

The import substituting industries approved by the BOI will save some $125 million in foreign exchange annually. And when the exporting manufacturers registered with the BOI become fully operational, they too are expected to earn $150 million annually.

We must continue to expand trade relations and thus we are even now experimenting with trade with East European countries in accordance with the recommendation of your Chamber of Commerce.

Finally in the pursuit of all these goals and in the implementation of various projects to attain our objectives, we will be guided by the principle of developing the potential of our own countrymen for entrepreneurship and economic leadership. This is the basic principle of Joint Resolution Number Two of Congress

Every encouragement shall be given by the government to Filipino businessmen and investors to establish and operate basic and integrated industries essential to economic growth. Industries in accepted areas of priority shall be accorded credit facilities.

On this principle of the Filipino's priority in his own country, the two major political parties take divergent paths. This is one of the vital issues now being submitted to our people for decision.

In proportion to the magnitude of the tasks we must yet attend to our resources which remain scarce. For that very reason, we must learn to utilize them fully and wisely, with minimum of waste, in accordance with the priorities defined.

In the past we tended to waste our resources by yielding to the temptation to spread them too thinly over the whole spectrum of local and national problems. If in the past three and a half years we solved the rice problem and built more first-class roads, than all previous administrations, and erected more schoolrooms than the combined output of previous administrations, the reason is that we selected the problems to confront and concentrated our energies and resources on them.

The test of management in business is always economic performance. There is no necessary identity of criteria for management success in business and in the government, but the performance of the Philippine economy in the past three and a half years in a period considered-critical for most developing national economies has been, in the view of the World Bank and other impartial authorities, quite outstanding. This result reflects not only sound economic management but also the vitality and drive of our private sector.

This is the best assurance that the progress we have gained is now irreversible. For the new vitality, self-confidence and competence of our people, reflected especially in their entrepreneurs and economic leaders, will protect these gains as foundations for continuing growth.

The present administration has started a new revolution. It is an unfinished revolution, but it is showing certain manifestations, and we welcome scrutiny of all sectors, the students, the labor elements, the public and private sectors, all who are looking into the deficiencies in government. Never before have the people demonstrated such an interest in the affairs of our government, and we encourage this interest. We welcome this because this is the very meaning of the partnership between the private and the public sectors.

This revolution, however, is barely half through and this revolution is best understood by the men who started it. The men who started it were those of us in the Nacionalista Party, and therefore we who belong to this party come to you with a knowledge of the motivations, the beginnings, the limitations, and the basis of this unfinished revolution.

We are, for instance, looking towards developing our industries, and yet right now the private sector has not moved into one of the richest areas of economic activity. We are supposed to have one of the biggest and most valuable copper deposits in the world, and yet we have barely started extractive mining of copper.

And many of you would probably be surprised to know that our country is supposed to have the richest marble deposits in the world, that every island in our country is supposed to have marble deposits. When we speak of marble deposits; we immediately refer to Romblon. However, studies made by the public and the private sectors show that the Romblon enterprise is limited to a few men, perhaps not more than 10 men. Now, the studies show that the value of our marble deposits is very high. The President of the Philippine Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Manalo, has referred to our nickel deposits in the Surigao area. May I call attention to the fact that nickel deposits are found all over the country, from the North to the South. In Davao, I think, there are copper mines to be developed, as in Zambales, and deposits are being discovered in almost all the provinces in the North.

At the same time, abaca pulp and paper are supposed to be of the highest grade, and yet we have done nothing to develop this area. Again, I call upon the private sector to come into these areas because this is an area from which the government shies away. And we furnish almost 90 per cent of all the raw materials for Nationalist China and Japan, and yet the private sector has not come into this particular area where government cannot enter.

All these are matters which we have looked into and have included in the plan. We look forward to a partnership accord between the private sector and the public sector.

Now I go into the requirements for the sweeping changes needed in our government. I have noticed that one of the questions often asked me is: What are the plans for changes in the government in relation to the utilization of private talent and the amendment of the Constitution?

May I anticipate the question here, and say that no other administration has utilized private talent as the present administration has demonstrated. In fact, I have been charged with pirating private talent from both industry and academic circles. There are many numbers of men who were pirated from private corporations, including one member of the Monetary Board who was borrowed from PHILAM. And so many of these private consultants are now working on our plan. I also wish to call attention to the fact that I have just received from the UP the new plan for the next four years. We have gathered about 300 consultants to help in the planning of development and we hope that they will get together as soon as the elections are over.

Address of President Marcos at the Inauguration of the Civil Aeronautics Administration Semi Automatic System, October 2, 1969

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Inauguration of the Civil Aeronautics Administration Semi Automatic System

[Delivered on October 2, 1969]

The Modernization of Airports

WE ARE INAUGURATING here a center which skeptics predicted would not be completed in five years, but which, as you see, is now finished. I was informed that it is now in full operation, but not being an expert on this matter, I have to take the word of those who are intimate with the project.

This center was built as part of the crash program aimed at modernizing our international airport before the end of the year. We are opening bids by November 7 on the construction of facilities for jumbo jets. I don't know why they chose a date just before the elections, but I can tell you that I had nothing whatsoever to do with the choice of the date. The proposed facilities for jumbo jets in the Manila International Airport will cost about P25 million.

I have also just authorized the construction of a number of domestic airports, about 36, worth about P36 million, to be installed from North to South.

From the start, in 1966, I knew that the country could not develop a pace economically without adequate infrastructure which includes, of course, the much needed airports to serve our more than 7,100 islands.

As a consequence of the high priority that we placed on infrastructure, we concentrated our resources on infrastructure, but at the same time we gave the stress to agriculture. Now that we have laid the infrastructure, perhaps we should now go into the building of the superstructure. This indeed is what we are trying to do now and this is what we intend to do in the next four years, God and the Filipino people willing.

I take pride in pointing out, of course, that no other administration has built as much infrastructure as we have in the past three years and a half. We have built, for instance, more concrete roads than this country has ever built from the turn of the century in 1902 to 1965.

I am happy to note that the private sector has been cooperating with the government on this matter.

The Philippines had the dubious distinction, around 1965, of being one of the three countries in Asia with the poorest telecommunications system. This has been changed in the past three years and a half. Growth in telecommunications has accelerated at the rate of 10.5 per cent per year. In capital alone, private industry invested an additional P8,264,000 in 1968, which was three times that invested in 1966.

Right now, I would like to explain the government's activities in civil aviation. We must provide civil aviation with modern facilities. This project which we have just inaugurated was designed not only to serve domestic aviation but also to meet regional aviation requirements, particularly at this time when the Philippines has become a focus of air travel on this side of the Pacific. In keeping with the requirements of the jet age, we are collaborating with the other nations in the region in the development of modern communications systems and the message switching center provides us with an efficient system of message transmission and reception.

In terms of speed, accuracy and capacity the center is adequate to meet problems brought about by faster aircraft, high altitude capability, and bigger volume of operations. And this is just the beginning of the development of a highly sophisticated system to handle the anticipated jumbo jets and supersonic aircraft. As we keep pace with the jet age, we should at the same time be able to make great strides in our national development program. There is no question that we will be able to maintain our pace. We have been able to do it because of the ingenuity, resourcefulness and efficiency of our people.

I take this occasion to pledge the support of the government, the national government and of the Office of the President, to all the efforts in this area, to attain all facilities needed by modern air travel. It is my intention to present to Congress as soon as it opens in January 1970, if I am still in the position to submit such recommendations, a development program for our aircraft and aviation facilities including the most sophisticated radar system, communication system, as well as facilities in the way of terminals and runways, so that Congress may be able to prepare a five-to-ten-year program of development. At the same time, we should immediately meet today the urgent requirements of air travel. I shall give air travel and the funding of facilities required for modern air travel the highest priority in the years to come.

So, I believe that you and I should get together and support each other so that we can finalize this plan.

Address of President Marcos at the 106th Birthday Anniversary Celebration of Andres Bonifacio, November 30, 1969

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 106th Birthday Anniversary Celebration of Andres Bonifacio

[Delivered on November 30, 1969]

The True Revolution

WE CELEBRATE TODAY the birthday of one of the noblest Filipinos, Andres Bonifacio. He affirmed the greatness of the race, not through an elite but through the common man, the faceless masses who compose the bone and sinew of any nation.

The revolution that Bonifacio ignited was a true revolution, for it was kindled by the essential intensity of feeling needed to bind men together under one cause, and it was undertaken to bring change to a country weighted by centuries of oppression.

The Cry of Pugad Lawin unleashed a chain of events which inevitably led to our independence. We stand here today as free men because a few hundred Filipinos, fired by a towering leader to great deeds, dared to challenge the vested power of a colonial overlord.

Today, we are in the midst of a new revolution. We seek a new victory, not of arms over a cruel adversary, not to found a new nation, but to reaffirm the old and give it a new meaning and a new dimension.

I believe that the present administration, which our people have summoned anew to lead the nation, has defined the shape and content of that revolution.

As in Bonifacio's day, it is a revolution aimed at change. It is not a revolution for the sake of revolution. It does not aim to create chaos, to achieve momentary novelty or to indulge pet notions. It is a monumental effort to provide an answer to the quandaries and dilemmas which have beset our people since we became a free and sovereign nation more than twenty years ago.

The revolution which we must fight today is that of survival as a nation.

Beyond that, it is a revolution aimed at intensifying awareness of ourselves, our birthright and our capabilities. And it is directed at the enhancement of the quality of Filipino life.

There are many among us who question such lofty goals, partly because the doubters have no faith in themselves, partly because they remain captives of an old order which, unfortunately, continues to exist in our land. I have often heard the greatness of the Filipino disparaged as myth. Indeed, considering the stagnation of our country since independence, considering the prolonged colonial hangover, considering the nature of our politics, it takes deep faith to believe in our powers and in our capacities, to reverse age-old conditions and to gain the higher peaks of achievement.

Aware of this mentality, and mindful of the realities of our situation, my administration from the very start set its sights on disproving these old wives' tales. The only way to do this was to make the breakthroughs toward those high plateaus of achievement — in other words to demonstrate our creative capacity, and to recall the greatness which once illumined our land through such giants as Rizal, Mabini and Bonifacio.

We made those breakthroughs by design in such prosaic but critical areas as rice and corn production, in the building of infrastructure, in the expansion of schools, in government efficiency and management.

These breakthroughs correct the old myth of the indolent Filipino. It is also a decision in favor of human priorities. What is the decision to pour all available public resources into the rice and corn production program if not a decision to serve the human being first? Food is a prime necessity; rice and corn are our staples. Therefore, we must first give our people sufficient food.

Yet there is an even more important consideration. Underneath, there is the need to affirm the capacity of the Filipino for meeting challenges. If in the past there were repeated failures in attaining self-sufficiency in rice, then this is the very sector for new enterprise. This is where we can prove ourselves, and forever establish our capacity to do and to succeed.

In the other areas where my administration has succeeded, the same twin considerations underlie the priorities and the goals. We built the roads to prove we could do the job, and at the same time to meet an essential need. Some call the roads impact projects, and they are right. But the impact is less on the visibles than on the intangibles, on the Filipino spirit, on the Filipino will, on his heart and mind.

Who will dispute that change has begun to be seen and felt in our country? Before even the people spoke at the polls, change was manifest. The rural communities finally woke up to their responsibilities, performing tasks in the partnership with the government, or carrying out programs they themselves planned and supported. And there were the youths in our universities and colleges, stirred to rebellion against intolerable inequities.

These are the forces of change which have been released by the revolution generated under my administration. And these are the forces which will expand the frontiers of that other revolution — the revolution of rising expectations. If I may say so, the present administration has moved those rising expectations of our people even farther forward, by asking for the return of the Filipino nation to greatness. What is wrong with extending a man's grasp farther than his reach?

We should not be intimidated by our problems. We should not fear doing more than we feel is our share. Increasingly, the history of man attests to the standard rule of civilization that solutions to problems create problems. But a time will never come when problems shall cease. This is true of all countries, for even the developed nations are weighed down by prodigious problems. Let us ask not that we should be spared the difficulties but that we should gain the necessary strength to overcome them.

What we should confront are the larger possibilities open to us. Let us believe in ourselves. Let us think in ever greater dimensions. Let us not shrink from the enormous responsibilities we have to meet lest we shrink as human beings.

It is true, as I have said, that we have made meaningful and dramatic strides in the last four years. It is also true, however, that much more remains to be done, for we have set a high standard for ourselves.

To these problems that lie ahead, we offer not panaceas, but hard work and sacrifice. Ever mindful of the struggles of Bonifacio, we are determined to finish what he had begun, and to meet the same challenges and obstacles with the same resolute courage and determination.

I therefore call on you to rally behind our own purpose as our forefathers rallied behind the cause of their own revolution.

Let us not be overwhelmed by problems, remembering that Bonifacio and his generation faced even greater obstacles.

If we ask of you to join us in our program of austerity, let us remember that Bonifacio asked of every man not merely the sacrifice of personal convenience but the sacrifice, if necessary, of one's life.

The call for unity that Bonifacio sounded in this very place in his own time needs to be sounded anew.

I ask every Filipino to join us in this new sacrifice. In doing this we assure you that we will not shirk from our own responsibility — responsibility to set a convincing example. We will lead the way.

Years from now our children, if not we ourselves, would reap the benefits of our sacrifice.

The Filipino nation is still being born and that is why we continue to agonize from the birth pains. Human beings, who live only fleetingly measured against eternity, are young and callow at twenty; in the same manner a nation may remain a fledgling after many centuries of existence.

We begin a new decade, a decade which is crucial to the whole community of man. The complexity of our age, the continuing divisions among nations, the encroachments of technology on humanity — all these form an ominous background for our national community which is still struggling to assert itself in the world.

But let us not despair. Let us be like those of the Katipunan, who, possessing only courage, faced impossible odds — and in the end won.

The odds we face today cannot be greater, surely, than those Bonifacio faced. And our options are many and greater, and the possibilities for achievement almost unlimited. If we succeed, if we build a nation that will stand, and which will give our people the dignity and the certitude of a good life, then we too might glimpse that destiny which gives Andres Bonifacio his secure place in the history of our country.

Second Inaugural Address of President Marcos, December 30, 1969

Second Inaugural Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos

My Countrymen:

Four years have passed since I took my first oath of office as President of the Republic of the Philippines. We have travelled far since then. On that year and hour when I first assumed the presidency, we found a government at the brink of disaster and collapse, a government that prompted fear before it inspired hope; plagued by indecision, scorned by self-doubt, its economy despoiled, its treasury plundered, its last remaining gleam shone to light the way of panic. But panic, we did not. Rather against the usual raucous cries of the cynics we kept faith, and in that faith persevered, until the passing of that terrible cloud.

We survived the agony, we passed the test.

The results of those endeavors are landmarks upon our nation now. We have conquered the first obstacles first.

But our task is not done. For the task of nation-building never ends. We must forge on.

You have given me the task of leadership by an overwhelming and unprecedented mandate. I thank you for your trust.

I lead this nation into a new decade, the decade of the seventies – a decade that is one of the most crucial in our history as well as in the history of Asia and of the world.

The world seeks to know whether man is indeed impelled by some strange instinct to self-destruction or whether its sciences on the relationships of men can catch up or overreach its natural sciences.

In Asia we must now forge a constructive unity and co-exist in purposeful peace, not on terms that must yet be drawn by a conquering ideology, but on bonds that now exist. For in the years of this difficult decade, Asia must decide whether in this vast region of one of the greatest of the world's peoples, it will build a sanctuary, or set up continental prison.

Decision cannot much longer be delayed.

In our own land, we have just begun building a nation. We have had to telescope in four years what other nations achieved in decades.

There, is a mortgage of dedication, of discipline, of self-abnegating leadership in the billowing fields of green sprung from miracle rice; on every road or bridge; on every school or hospital; on every house or irrigation; on every farm or industry; on every community project we have built.

For discipline is the other face of achievement.

But hear the strident cries of protest against self-discipline from the gilded throats of the privileged and the cynically articulate – they who have yet to encounter the implacable face of poverty. I hear the well-meaning cries of the uninformed and the naive. To them I address this plea. Let them share the burden with the grace and courage of the poor. Let them find common cause the people. Too long have we blamed on one another the ills of this nation. Too long have we wasted our opportunities by finding fault with each other, as if this would cure our ills and rectify our errors. Let us now banish recrimination.

There are too many of us who see things as they are and complain. Let us rather see things as they should be and aspire. Let us dream the vision of what could be and not what might have been.

There are many things we do not want about our world. Let us not just mourn them. Let us change them.

The time is now. In government I pledge the severest leadership in integrity as well as discipline. Public officials shall set the vision for simplicity within the bounds of civility. I ask in turn a response from the privileged. Let us be true to ourselves as the people of a poor nation struggling to be prosperous; whatever our personal circumstances, rich or poor, we are all citizens in poverty.

Today with us, self-reliance is, no longer an option; it is our fate.

The next few years will lay the basis for a reformation - a revolutionary reformation of our international and domestic policies - of our political, social, legal and economic systems.

Truly then the decade of the seventies cannot be for the faint of heart and men of little faith. It is not for the whiners nor for the timid. It demands men and women of purpose and dedication. It will require new national habits, nothing less than a new social and official morality. Our society must chastise the profligate rich who waste the nation's substance - including its foreign exchange reserves on persona comports and luxuries.

The nation's capacity for growth is limited by its foreign exchange earnings. Every dollar spent on self-indulgence is a dollar taken away from employment, from welfare, from education - from the nation's social and economic well-being.

The presidency will set the example of this official morality and oblige others to follow. Any act of extravagance in government will be considered not only an offense to good morals but also an act punishable with dismissal from office.

With such a new ethic, we will surmount the problems we are confronting now.

We must discard complacency embracing panic; rely on our efforts alone without rejecting the support of others.

Let not the future observe that being virile in body we multiplied in number, without increasing in spirit.

I do not demand of you more than I shall demand of myself and of government. So seek not from government what cannot find in yourself.

In the solution of our problems, this government will lead.

But, the first duty that confronts us all is how to continue to grow in this nation now a new heart, a new spirit that springs out of the belief that while our dangers be many, and our resources few, there is no problem that cannot be surmounted given but the will and courage.

Let every man be his own master, but let him first, and above all, be his own charge.

It is our destiny to transform this nation; we begin by transforming ourselves first. In this formidable task, no Filipino, no one in the land will be exempt whatever his station in life.

Neither wealth nor power will purchase privilege; wealth and power shall not outrage the conscience of our people.

Trusting in God and in ourselves, we must now pledge, my countrymen, that in homage to the vision of a race, there shall be in this spot of the universe, a people strong and free, tracing their ancestral roots to Asia, proud of their oriental heritage as well as western culture, secure in their achievements, a people daring to match the iron of the world without losing their essential humanity, eradicating social iniquity without encouraging anarchy, eliminating subversion without endangering their liberties, practising self-discipline and self-reliance without ostentation, attaining dignity without losing friends, seeking true independence without provoking war, embracing freedom even in deprivation.

Thus we prove to our posterity that our dream was true that even in this land of impoverished legacy, the wave of the future is not totalitarianism but democracy.

Address of President Marcos at the First Regular Meeting of the Rotary Club of Manila, January 8, 1970

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the First Regular Meeting of the Rotary Club of Manila

[Delivered on January 8, 1970]

No Cause for Fear

I AM HAPPY to announce that as of today, as of twelve o'clock, as of noon on the 8th of January, I am lifting the suspension of the grant of loans to export industries, especially mining and new industries, by the public financing institutions as well as the commercial banks.

There is some significance, I think, in my delivering my first general public speech this year before Rotarians. The motto of your organization is "Service above Self." I wish this could be the motto of the entire Philippines and the entire Filipino people.

It is understandable that everybody thinks of his interest first before he thinks of the interests of the nation. The businessman, his enterprise; the laborer, his job. Well, not only the laborer because even the politician thinks first of his job. I refer to the Senate President, who has been exempted from a fine because he needs all the financing he can get for the coming fight. I would like to believe, however, that financing has nothing whatever to do with that kind of a job.

But it is the favorite pastime of everyone today, newspapers included, to blame the government for almost everything, and all the government officials for all the ills in the country as well as of humanity.

And this too is understandable.

I gather from my sources of information that yesterday some of the newspapers carried the headline to the effect that the United States has rejected special preferences for the Philippines in the Laurel-Langley Agreement. I want to announce that this certainly is news to me, because we have not received any word on this matter from any official or unofficial sources of the United States government. This just indicates, I guess, or provides a gauge of, the accuracy of most newspapers. And this is not to speak bitterly and in a satirical manner about newspapers, but rather to show that indeed there is some slanting and there are some mistakes committed in the newspaper business.

While I was young, my father always told me never to believe two sources of news. One, women and the other newspapers. If there are any ladies here present I apologize to them, but I am merely narrating an incident in the past. It is not to say that I believe my father's advice about women, because I follow women, where they give the right advice.

Now, we are also told that the government has been spending much, especially in the last election. I would like to inform you that we spent more for public works in 1968 than we spent in 1969, and yet if you read the newspapers you will feel that the election was the principal motivation and reason for this splurge in infrastructure building. Then there is the news story that the projected deficit in the government this fiscal year is P1 billion. Now, even the supposed experts in the Central Bank — and I see some of them here — and in the Presidential Economic Staff and in the National Economic Council, and other high-ranking exponents of theoretical economics have not taken into account that we have a budgetary law; the Budget Commission can cut expenses before actual expenditures and even after the release of funds through treasury warrants.

So, what do we have? We have, for instance, cash balances in the hands of treasurers and disbursing officers amounting, as of October, to about P880 million not yet spent, and as of November, about P778 million. Out of this, about P300 million will not be spent. And yet this has been included in the projection.

In addition to this, we have releases through treasury warrants of public works funds, from 1967 to 1969. The savings from this again will be P300 million; and from January to June, or the end of June this year, there is going to be a savings of P100 million from current releases of the Budgetary Commission.

All these make a total savings of about P700 million, and this amount does not include the other savings that we are making now. So, in short, you would have the usual deficit, which is an annual thing that goes into capital expenditures and does not go into such things as salaries and operations of the government which are often referred to as general expenses of government, or what are generally itemized as General Government Expenditures as distinguished from Capital Outlay.

Anyway, we have P300 million let us say, although from my estimate, it will be about P230 million. Let us say we will have a deficit of P300 million. What do we intend to do with this deficit? We are going to finance this by tapping non-inflationary sources. Examples are the sales of treasury bills. The original proposal was for a total sale of treasury bills of about P200 million and another sale of about P200 million, and another sale of about P300 million to government bonds. I understand the Secretary of Finance, however, and the private sector have agreed to limit sales in the first place and give first priority to treasury bills amounting to about P150 million or P120 million, to be projected into bigger amounts later on when necessary. The idea is to sell these to the people, utilizing the money that they already have and, therefore, not increasing the money supply.

Now, talking about money supply. We are all afraid of money supply. Does anybody ever study the distribution of the money that we have? Nobody has ever had. Everybody says, Oh, we will increase the money supply to P4.4 billion. And how much of this is in the form of demand deposit, and how much of this is money in circulation? Only P1.9 billion is money in circulation, the rest are demand deposits.

Now, out of this P1.9 billion, how much is in the hands of those in the centers of population and how much is in the hands of the great majority of our people? Only P500 million is in the hands of those in the provinces and P1.4 billion is in the hands of a few people in the centers of population, like Manila. Well, this is the reason for the alleged liquidity of the economy, because of the pressure exerted by all this money in the hands of a few people on our supply of goods and services.

And so, my friends, you have a phenomenon, where here in Manila, you have a possible scarcity of supply, although here again, the study indicates that there has not been any diminution. On the contrary, there has been an increase in supply in Manila and other areas of population. In the entire Philippines, for the present anyway, forget the next quarter or even the quarter after next — for the present, there has been no decrease in supply. Then why all this fear that there's going to be some scarcity? Because everybody is talking of scarcity, of austerity; even the President is talking of austerity, and he has given away all his worldly goods, he has given up, he is desperate. Well no, I merely say that there is enough supply provided we continue the normal course of our lives.

But there has been a slight fear, starting with the housewives who buy four times more than they require, then the retailer, then the distributor, the wholesaler or whatever his name is, he who comes between the supplier and the distributor. Then the supplier or the importer or the producer, and this has produced a chain reaction. Everybody buys more than he usually does. And as you have the phenomenon of everybody buying more than the requirement for a normal period of, say, one week. Now they are buying for one month, or even three months, four months. Result: a temporary shortage of supply, and everybody sounds as if this is a permanent situation, and yet this is not so.

The supply is there, and are they content with this? No. Because of this abnormal and this distortion of demand, we have authorized the importation of an increased volume of essential commodities.

Now, let's go to imports. Everybody has asked the question: why did the government allow all the people to import so much in excess of export earning? This is the fault of the Central Bank, this is the fault of the Monetary Board, this is the fault of the commercial banks, this is the fault of the President, it is the fault of the government.

Now let us see. We are living in a free society. We have not established controls. We have not imposed controls. You and I, all of us agreed we would do away with controls. You remember, there was some kind of a devaluation in 1965, and there was a lifting of controls by the previous administration. We did not impose any safeguards. That was the first mistake, and we did not then start to voluntarily agree how to use our earnings.

Now what is the complexion of imports in the Philippines? Did you know that 86.4 per cent are capital goods? Some of them are raw materials and the others are machineries: capital goods brought in here to industrialize our country. In short, therefore, there was an intensive effort to industrialize in this country, to convert our predominantly agricultural economy into an agro-based industrial economy; others call it a balanced agro-industrial economy. Now, let me repeat the percentage — 86.4 per cent of, all imports coming into the Philippines on which we spent our hard earned dollars were capital goods. And so my friends, it is quite obvious that the imports were legitimate and the intention was good. Yes, we are over-anxious and there are some industries that really have to re-structure and alter their pattern of activity and conduct. We have to convert the sources of our present raw materials from foreign to domestic, meaning, we have to produce our own raw materials; instead of bringing them from outside, we must produce these goods locally. An example is pulp. There are still a lot of people bringing in raw pulp. High-grade pulp can be produced from abaca and, yet, nobody has tried this, although there are some application now.

Tourism—we have to get involved more intensively in this. We are going to increase the number of tourists coming to the Philippines. As of this year, the record is 120,000. Is that correct, 120,000? And people who go to Bangkok total about 400,000, and to Hongkong, about 800,000 to 1 million. And to the Philippines, 120,000 tourists.

So, today, I have ordered that we now study the possibility of opening the airlines to foreign traffic without limit for one year, for experimental purposes. I wanted to announce it here, thinking that Tony Roxas would place me on television, but apparently, he is on austerity too. Anyway, through the radio, which is covering me live, and I understand the Voice of the Philippines, I hereby announce that we are going to remove all the obstacles to tourism here in the country.

We are going to see what we can do about the air agreement with the United States too, because this was suspended in 1961. You will remember that there was already an air agreement between our two countries, but because of the reduction of the flights of the American carriers, the air agreement was suspended. I would like to see this air agreement renegotiated. We are ready to help those who will help us, and if the foreign airlines will promote the routes coming to Manila, we will open our airlines to them and allow them to land as often as possible in Manila.

I have given, and I am giving again, formal notice to the Immigration Bureau and to the Foreign Office to punish all officials who, because of discourtesy; timidity or, worse, laziness, do not attend to the tourists. According to the tourists I have talked to, they are made to feel as if they are not wanted here in the Philippines. The transit visa is good for seven days, extendable for another seven days up to a maximum of fifty-nine days. But the tourists are compelled to return every seven days to obtain an extension. Now we are going to change all of this.

And according to them, the people in the foreign Office and Immigration act as if they don't care whether the tourists come here or not. I am giving notice to those' employees: anyone caught doing this is going to be dismissed immediately. In addition, I am removing the requirement of a transit visa. The tourists can come in now without obtaining transit visa. And we are merely going to require, of course, a confirmed reservation in a hotel and a reservation to go back to where they come from. That alone will allow entry into the Philippines.

Then I have directed the protection of tourists in Manila and the development of a "tourist belt." I would like Danding Romualdez to be sure that the P200,000 contribution of the Monetary Board for the Tourist Belt is approved by the Monetary Board. And I have directed the police of Manila to assign 25 men to patrol, in both uniform and plainclothes, the Roxas Boulevard area and Luneta Area, Ermita. Metrocom will also assign another 20 men and 5 patrol cars for this purpose alone.

At the same time, I have directed the development of Corregidor; the contracts for the development of that area which was formerly known as the Officer's Beach Area will now go apace. Tagaytay, as you know, is being sold by the Philippine National Railways by public bidding, and the winner of the bid should develop the Tagaytay Lodge. Bataan, the Dambana ng Kagitingan, is now ready to receive tourists, but a restaurant has to be put up. All of these have been attended to.

I have also directed the temporary assignment of two military hydrofoils — one between Manila and Corregidor, one between Manila and Bataan — to the BTTI with the agreement that the cost of operation and maintenance will be at the expense of the BTTI, pending the reorganization by Tony Delgado and his group of a carrier system. All of these are instances of what we are doing.

With respect to the export industries, I would like you to know that we are studying the possibility of the retention scheme, meaning, 25 per cent of additional earnings in dollars of all export industries will be authorized to be retained by the exporter, provided he utilizes it for either expansion or any of the purposes that may be required for his own particular industry and does not sell it to a third party.

We are also studying the possibility of giving export incentives, by tax rebates, or tax exemptions. We are opening up the Free Trade Zone in Bataan. Two warehouses are up. In two or three months, all the other areas will be available and they will be leased to processing corporations at a minimal rate, at practically nothing. We are going to finish the roads and highways in Bataan that will connect the various towns with the main highway to Manila. One of the priority projects will be what is known as the Bataan causeway, from Manila to Bataan. There are proposals for the legalization of gambling. This, I would rather leave to Congress to decide later on. That will be one of the headaches of Senate President Gil Puyat when he gets reelected to the Presidency of the Senate.

I would like to say that we are doing everything to meet the present situation.

Are we in crisis? Sort of, but not the kind of crisis which you should fear or you should panic about. I would like you to go to the barrios and to the provinces. Do you know the atmosphere there? It is so different from the atmosphere here in Manila.

In Manila, it's like going underwater. If you go skin-diving like me, you must know what this means. You feel the pressure on you and you feel the lack of air after a few minutes, especially if you have not got your tank on, and you have to go up for air. That's Manila.

You go to the province and you feel the exhilaration, confidence, trust of the people and the ambition of the people. You feel the motivation towards a common goal. Here, everybody seems to think of himself alone and to gravitate only towards his own interest. But I am always gratified when I go to the provinces because there, you see everybody thinking of nation, of people, of the Philippines, of country. Here, you probably ask the question, what will happen to my business? There the question the people will ask is, what will happen to our country? What will happen to our nation? Are we going to fight all over again? If so, when? And I always answer no. We are not going to fight a war. This is a more sophisticated kind of war; perhaps, for that reason it's a more difficult war.

And so, perhaps, it is necessary that I, as President, now clarify to you exactly the precise character of what is in the minds of everybody here, in this center of population — the balance of payments problem, and I shall then close with this.

Is it a crisis which should make us despair because it is unsolvable? No. It is manageable, it is temporary. The problem is not due to a collapse in our capacity to produce or to export. Our export earnings remain healthy. We have suffered in coconut, in the coconut products, by about 15 percent. So, there is more of an even balance. There was a drought in the last two years, but there has also been an acceleration of production in other areas of economic activity.

The next year or two will see a more vigorous acceleration of the growth of our exports.

Our exchange expenditures, of course, have risen rapidly, as I said, more rapidly than our earnings. But this problem is not one of export earnings and imports. No, it is one of the structures of our foreign exchange borrowing. It is not just current disbursement, purchases of essential consumer goods, raw materials, capital goods, because this would be quite easy to remedy. A simple budget that has been adopted by the Monetary Board will settle this immediately. What has made our present problem more serious, however, is the structure of our foreign obligations. You all know that our foreign obligations have been short-term. We have unfortunately financed the foreign exchange requirements of our development with credits of short maturities. Foreign exchange required to meet our maturing loans has begun to claim alarmingly large quantities of our foreign exchange reserves. I am told by my advisers that because of the increase in proportion of short-term debts, the total payment for interest and amortization of foreign obligations of the country this fiscal year ending June 30 will take over one-half of our export earnings.

Now, how much are our annual export earnings? P1,500,000,000. Now in order to provide the total and permanent solutions to the problem, we have taken the following steps:

First, a more direct action to program the use of our available foreign exchange. Now, what does this mean? It means budgeting of dollars. We earn $1.5, all right, let's spend $1.2. We save so much. The target was $200 million, now we have compromised on $150 million savings, or 10 percent of our dollar earnings. By budgeting, what do we mean? We mean that we determine our income, then we say, we will not go beyond this income. On the contrary, we will spend less on this or that. So, we will have to make savings in some of the items of expenditures.

Second, we have requested the US Commercial Banks which have outstanding advances to the Central Bank of about, and I guess this is the first time that we talk of the total amount, US$242 million, to defer to the end of June, I this year, some US$172 million of maturing notes in order to give us time to work out a more permanent restructuring of our external obligations. We have made a similar request to European and British banks who have outstanding loans to our Central Bank of about US$38 million, of which US$35 million is maturing between now and the middle of this year.

Third, in order to meet our needs for some immediate working balance to tide us over the first quarter of this year, we have requested some 23 American banks to release us from a negative pledge of US$40 million worth of gold that we hold in our reserves. This will permit us to borrow an equivalent amount from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. They have granted us this particular request. We are also tapping other sources to advance up to US$ 100 million to our Central Bank for so-called working fund requirements.

Fourth, the severe measures that have been taken by the Central Bank to program the use of our foreign exchange by direct regulations are temporary and are emergency measures. We have thus asked the International Monetary Fund to assist us in firming up an adequate stabilization program and to mobilize adequate stand-by credits to stabilize our exchange situation.

Fifth, ultimately, we must finance our continued growth through the use of more suitable long-term credits. Since it will take us some time to develop the projects and negotiate suitable long-term project loans from financial agencies such as the Asian Development Bank, the World Bank and the credit institutions of our main trading partners in the United States, Japan and Europe, we are seeking government-to-government credits of long-term maturities to finance our major and essential import needs over the next three years. For this purpose we have asked the World Bank to assist us in organizing a group of capital exporting countries into a consortium to provide credit of suitable terms to the Philippines, and the World Bank has agreed to do this. They are sending a team later this month to work out the details.

The IMF consultative group is arriving on the 10th of January. That is why I decided to come here and deliver this speech on the 8th so that they know that I have spoken about these matters before they arrived.

Since these steps will need some time to work out, I have sounded a call for austerity and for sacrifice, but this does not mean that everybody is going to stop laughing and start digging his grave. I was surprised when they asked me, when I announced that I was giving away my properties or those that I can legitimately give away, whether I was preparing to go into a monastery or something. It's just that I don't want to be burdened with them. You travel faster when you travel light and I want to travel light. I don't want to be held back by property and the demands of property, and I think that, as a leader, I must set an example. I hope that you will follow this example too.

I have repeatedly said, we cannot shape our future by despairing, by complaining or mourning. In the midst of all these problems, there are many opportunities and, I earnestly urge you to look for them. You are in a better position than many of us in government, to look into the situation and find out what the opportunities are.

I welcome your advice and I look forward to continued consultation with you. I have indicated to the Senate President my wish that I would meet with the different industries, repeatedly, periodically, especially the export-oriented industries. As I said, I have met with some of you who are in the importing business. I have met with those who are producers of products for domestic consumption. I have met with the exporters of logs, I have met with the exporters of coconut products.

I intend to meet with all the businessmen of our country and have a dialogue with them. We want to work with you. I am not going to strike out all alone and work out a solution to all your problems without consulting you. No, I am going to ask you to recommend what solution should be adopted by the government. And I will ask the legislative leaders to do the same. I will ask that there be continuous consultations between all the elements of our society. I am going to consult, too, the labor groups and perhaps the student groups, because this world we are building anyway is intended for the young. Many of the things that we are planting now we will never see grow and bear fruit; but the young will see the fruit of all our labors.

I have said that the leadership will be exercised by government. Yes, but leadership is nothing without the cooperation of those for whom that leadership is intended. You are the persons who make commerce and industry move. There is now need not merely of talking about partnership between the government and the private sector, but a need for us to really act as partners.

I call upon you to bring about a more productive partnership between the government and the private sector. On my part, I pledge to you, I shall utilize all my powers in order that this partnership will not only be initiated but may continue to bear fruit in the years to come.

Address of President Marcos at the First National Convention of Filipino Priests, January 14, 1970

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the First National Convention of Filipino Priests

[Delivered on January 14, 1970]

An Age of Renewal

WHEN I WAS invited to speak before you, I did not know that this was the First Convention of Priests in the Philippines. So I inquired; I sought information from those immediately around me, and I was told that the conferees were indeed rebels sitting down together to present their views. And I was quietly, and in hushed tones, informed that my presence might signify not only tolerance by authority, or government, but in fact a grant of license or privilege to mount a rebellion. But after some intense and, should we say, diffused arguments, we came to the conclusion that I started my career as a rebel, and therefore I have a kinship with the rebels.

As I come before you today, I am reminded of events in 1942, about 28 years ago, beginning with reports among the officers and men in Bataan that the high command of the USAFFE had decided to surrender. And the young men, is the officers and men in the frontlines, the outpost lines of resistance, the main line of resistance, the reserve line which had bore the brunt of attack, were shocked by this information. After so many months of privation, of fighting, of blood and death, we were going to surrender. And the young officers decided to organize a group and seek permission from the high command to speak out their minds.

In the army, as I guess in the church, the younger officers are not supposed I to speak unless given permission to do so. This is one of the strictest rules in the military. You first obey and, if you are alive after obeying, then you may question the order. But this time, it was a question of national dignity and of a policy which was decided upon and imposed without the frontline officers having been consulted. And this is something which has never been written about nor talked about, because it is one of the well kept secrets of the military. The young officers then approached the generals according to military protocol and after properly saluting, requested permission to speak. And after a hurried consultation among the brass of the USAFFE in Bataan, permission was granted.

Then the spokesmen, one of whom is speaking before you now, conceding that surrender was inevitable asked that the young officers be permitted to break out without surrendering their arms. The immediate answer of course was that this meant violation of the laws of land warfare, and that when a unit surrenders upon the orders of a commanding officer, the subordinate officers and men were duty bound to obey. And we were informed that any violation of such an order was subject to court martial and punishable with death. We then inquired whether there was any assurance of the security of the officers and men who surrender, especially those who had been engaged in intelligence work like me, and it was said that the enemy was supposed to be honorable and would follow the worthy tradition of the victor in war, which is to treat the vanquished with proper respect and decorum. However, the issue required a staff meeting which was again an innovation, because Captains and Lieutenants never attend general staff meetings. It's just like the priests of the parish attending a meeting of the hierarchy of the church. But it happened, and with proper respect again we pointed out that there were strong indications that we would all be wiped out either in a concentration camp by disease, malnutrition and illness — all of the sort of mischance we were aware of — as well as the possibility that the enemy did not have the facilities to take care of so many surrendered soldiers.

And this discussion went on until Finally, the older officers said: 'We have not given the order to surrender. We authorize small unit commanders to decide what operations they should engage in before surrender. This will legalize all activity including a breakout.' So this, in a way, not only tolerated but legalized the actions of some of the officers and men who escaped from Bataan and the Death March and engaged in, what is now well-known to many of us.

I am now reminded of all these. I note there is a meeting of minds, apparently, between the Bishops here and the priests. I do not know whether to classify the Bishops also as rebels, but I am indeed glad to be here in this happening as Father Dimen has called this — in the mod term. I am sure that my remarks will be interpreted by some of my critics as meaning that I am antagonistic to the Bishops because of the letter that they published in the newspapers before it reached me. You know, protocol is supposed to dictate that nothing be published of any communication to the President until after he has received and answered it. But when this was brought to my attention, I said: “But those are Bishops and whatever they say I follow.” And I didn’t say that with tongue in cheek. I actually meant it. You see, I belong to the generation who knew a tidy world, tidy, cleancut, and cognizant of the clear demarcation line of authority between things of the spirit and things of the world. But I have also found in my long experience in the government that when all else fail you refer to things of the spirit and sometimes miracles happen.

This is one of the periods in our history when all of us are praying for miracles. And, therefore, I welcome the support for our people, support for the Republic, from all quarters whatsoever, and, certainly one of the most welcome quarters would be that of our church and our ministers, who have taken it upon themselves to administer to the spiritual needs of our people.

But in coming here today, I feel like an explorer. I have stumbled upon a strange and different world. I feel like Ferdinand Magellan. I am sure that this is the same feeling that a priest feels when he is invited to attend a gathering of men of government. I am sure you all know what it is to exist in two different worlds. We come into each other’s world as, what would you call it, special intruders or special performers. When a priest is invited into an affair of state, what is he asked to do? He is asked to deliver an invocation or say the blessing. And when a man of government is invited to attend a gathering of priests, I supposed that he is asked to deliver a speech, which includes both an invocation and a blessing.

But in this gathering I must confess a greater sense of awe and a feeling of strangeness. In the past, as I have said, according to tradition, our distance from each other is derived from an apparent, a different, a classical and traditional difference of function and performance. You attend to the needs of the spirit, and we in government attend to the needs of the body. Well, nowadays, I think there is no clear demarcation line between what is needed by the spirit and what is needed by the body.

When we speak of morality for instance, and I speak of a new age, a new social and national morality, I speak not only of material things, rather I speak more of the spirit, because it is a change in the heart and in the mind of man that I seek, and in doing this I employ not only the authority of government but my moral authority, the authority of a man elected as a leader by our people. And yet, this is the kind of authority that you employ too.

I see many familiar faces here who belong to our once tidy and well ordered generation. I don’t recognize them as priests, in view of the absence of the usual habiliments of priests, but I guess this is a part of the change that Father Dimen proposed. I gather that the formal attire that has been officially accepted by the Church is the Nehru shirt, but I gather too, that all kinds of apparel are tolerated nowadays.

One day in Malacañang I saw a priest come in. I recognized him as such because he was an acquaintance, but he had long sideburns. Hooked hurriedly at the Cardinal, Cardinal Santos, who was present to find out his reaction to the apparition, and I could feel the Cardinal wringing his hands in dismay.

Seriously, speaking, I was listening to Father Dimen, even as I inquired from Father Suñga too, about the purposes of this convention. And there came to my mind the inquiry: What was it really that we always thought about priests? Because one speaks of attending to priests now in their old age, and to security of the priest. And I am reminded of what one of my younger children told me when I inquired about this matter. What do you think happens to priests when they grow old? And this precocious youngster of mine answered, Oh, they go to a never-never shadow land, like the prophets of old, and they are attended to and they thrive upon the well-deserved ministrations of the Lord through His birds and other creatures.

This reflects, I guess, the feeling of affection that one feels towards priests in general. This legend, like all other ancient and beautiful fables, I suppose, must go, and before long I must tell that young child of mine that this concept is just like Santa Claus, that he existed a long time ago and he will exist for many young children for sometime to come. But you depart from this land of fable, from this land of legends when you have reached, shall we say, the age of puberty, and lose it completely until at a later age, perhaps, you find there is need for such fables, such legends all over again.

My experience with the ways of the Church taught me a long time ago that the priest was someone different from the rest of humanity because of his garb and bearing, and his way of thinking. And whenever I exhort, up to now, whenever I exhort the workers in government and wish to identify myself with their loneliness in office, when they have to make decisions or they have to travel into the far corners of our land, the despoiled corners, the areas of deprivation, and must dedicate themselves completely without any restraint whatsoever because of present and future demands, I speak to them of the priesthood, of the high priesthood to which they must dedicate themselves.

But today, no such telltale signs seem to exist. In this so-called age of revolution and reform, bewildering changes of course have caught up with the Roman Catholic Church. It has caught up with the traditional habit of the priest, and more important, with his outlook on the here and now.

Yet, it is quite ironic really, for these changes have served to bring the priesthood — each and everyone of you — closer to all of us laymen. I don't feel as an intruder here because everywhere I look I seem to find a face, a mind, not really that distant or different from me as to be unable to share my anxieties about the society we live in, and my aspirations for its advance.

I know that whether you are priests or not, you too are involved in the problems of our nation, and that if any man suffers, you suffer with him, as I suffer. And that if any plan fails you condole with me as you condole with the entire nation and the entire people.

I would not presume to tell you of the many instances of renewal and reform that is happening within the Church. I would much rather wait for you to acquaint me, to explain to me the revolution that has visited the Church.

When I received your invitation to this convention, one of my aides remarked jokingly that the Philippine Priests, Inc., is some kind of a "trade union inside the Church of the Philippines."

I see the humor in his remark, but I also see the truth in what he said. It seems to me that this unprecedented movement to organize the Filipino clergy into one homogeneous body that can provide for its development and protection, and that can serve as a voice for its needs and for the needs of the individual priests, draws its inspiration and techniques perhaps from labor unionism, partly.

I find in your present movement the real meaning of what the Church underlines when it says she believes in "social democracy," and that she believes in "social justice."

I cannot believe that anyone, neither the individual priest nor the Church Hierarchy, could find in this movement any cause for sadness or alarm. For clearly it is a good wind that blows hither. The fact that many of the respected Bishops are here, who can doubt the manifold gains that it augurs within the Church? Who can doubt the benefits that it will bestow on the national community?

For the moment, the present convention is directed to the task of winning rights and status for the Filipino priest. I gather it is as it should be. In the beginning, your movement must seek to test its capacity to survive and prosper. And I have no doubt that it will survive and prosper.

I see, however, in your movement an enlargement of your participation in the work of making our country a better place to live in, which is to say, plenty. It means everything that we aspire for.

It is often said that the crisis which confronts us now exceeds mere questions of economics and politics — it has to do with values. To surmount this crisis in such a way that it will never occur again requires moral courage and moral strength on the part of those who make up our society.

In the conscious and zealous defense of these values, your work is crucial, perhaps more crucial than mine. Those of us whose work is to lead or to govern look to religious groups and of course our parents and our schools to make our people aware of the values that make our society strong. And I cannot but be reminded that in the last century our society was made strong by three Filipino priests — Fathers Gomez, Burgos, and Zamora. They helped forge the Filipino nation, even way ahead of Rizal, way ahead of Bonifacio, way ahead of Aguinaldo and his First Republic. I presume that all of you, since you are priests in their image, more than us in government, you are called upon today to follow in their footsteps by helping to strengthen the foundations of our nation.

March 22, 1970

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Graduation Exercises of the Philippine Military Academy

[Delivered in Baguio City, March 22, 1970]

The Military as Guardian of Society

THIS IS THE fifth commencement exercises of the Philippine Military Academy that I have attended as guest of honor, a privilege which I value very much, and God willing, I shall be at the graduation ceremonies of the Philippine Military Academy in the next three years.

Now, that is quite clear, let me not be misquoted by anyone. I said three years.

The reason I have accepted each of your invitations with great delight is that there is a special atmosphere on this campus which invigorates me and all those who come to participate in your ceremonies, and which revives the enthusiasm for such old-fashioned creeds as honor, loyalty, patriotism, integrity and human dignity.

It has been a long time since anyone has spoken of these old virtues. They have been forgotten by an impatient generation.

As it happens, these qualities have been drawn into new focus since I have been here last. Last year, on this same occasion, I spoke of the need for a gradual and peaceful development in our society. I emphasized then that the military was increasingly called upon, owing to its peculiar skills and resources, to contribute to this national development. But recent events have shown beyond doubts that there are certain elements in our society who do not share our passion for gradual and peaceful growth. They are determined instead to participate in an unnecessary and ruinous crisis, in which the transformation we all seek shall be accomplished with one swift and final blow, no matter what the cost, no matter what the price.

In a word, the democratic ideal of peaceful and self-actualizing growth is today actively challenged, as the alternative of violent change is pushed upon our people by elements which have no use for traditional values. The military, which I had asked during my first administration to perform an important role, is today called upon to give to the nation not only more, but all, of the skills and resources peculiar to it.

The military is in a situation today where it must demonstrate the superiority of the democratic ideals and processes of change by its ability to fight and readiness to sacrifice for this, for the democratic process in a free society, in time of peace and in time of hostilities.

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of our people have the desire as well as the competence to transform themselves peacefully into a progressive society. We have over the past four years put this desire and this competence to work, and today we see the change that has evolved as a consequence.

Indeed, the desire and the competence for rapid but not wrenching nor destructive, self-defeating, change have intensified and escalated with every successful act of reformation simply by declaring our awareness of the social and economic ills we must confront, as when I said in 1966 that the country was sitting on top of a social volcano when I spoke before the clerics of the Catholic church and the hierarchy of the Catholic church. We put the nation on a new course of disciplined and steady growth. The revolutionary activity that followed that declaration of restlessness and impatience has been unprecedented, not only in its initiatives, but also in the manner and scope of social and economic measures that have been carried out.

I need not go into them, I need not go into agricultural development, into infrastructure, into economic development, into the increase in manufacturing as well as the increase by leaps and bounds of those services and requirements we directly need in our country. Nor will I go into the change of heart and mind, and of the soul and spirit of our people. But let me point out that of necessity, initiatives and innovations in the process of developing our society have had necessarily to operate within the democratic framework.

Many people sometimes forget what this means. This means the tedious, painful, patient, loving work not only on the part of the leader, but on the part of the people themselves. Unfortunately, the impatience that we declared and put to work over the past four years provided a bandwagon into which communist revolutionary strategy has leaped and has since appropriated as its own.

But this is the flexibility of communism. If you study the history of any country where communism has obtained power, you will discover that it has never ridden on popular support, but rather it has ridden on popular movements, irrespective of what they were and whether or not they were in accord with the basic principles of communism. There have been instances of this, as for instance, where communism has ridden on the popular support of religion, or popular support for capitalism, which as you know is a direct contradiction to what communism stands for.

I am sure you in the military are with me in my persistence to gain change peacefully and gradually, although swiftly whenever possible — in short, to pursue the course of development that I have chartered in accordance with the plans made by the National Development Council. Even more vigorously than before, our government will put the nation through the process of change in every field and by every lawful means — in agriculture, in industry, in the public services, in the government administrative machinery.

I have no desire to be coerced or tantalized out of this resolution and this course. I have long comprehended the need for reform; I have always been intimate with the longings of the poor and the deprived for a greater share in the wealth of the nation. Accordingly, I have launched every possible measure that would fulfill those longings in due course.

On the other hand, communism would, if it could, lay everything we have already gained to waste by attempting to seize the powers of government by force and violence. In this bid to unseat and demolish public authority as constituted by the democratic process, communism will utilize, and indeed is even now utilizing military power.

Your role, as members of the Armed Forces, is therefore very crucial.

You and I seek primarily two things right now and they are, first, stability in our economy that begins with monetary or currency stability; next, social reforms that would remove all the inequities in our society. These are the immediate goals of the government and the next four years will be devoted to attaining these ends, from which all other government reforms must begin. No matter how numerous our reforms may be, no matter how vigorously we may pursue them, we will remain forever in crisis if we do not first attain this objective of monetary stability. Towards this objective we seek to accomplish only one thing, namely, the immediate solution of our balance of payments problems, which will establish a reserve of foreign exchange and thereby create a strong currency that will no longer be subject to erratic alterations in value as caused by foreign influences. Next, we must attain social equity, or social justice. A more vigorous land reform program is necessary, declaring as many areas as possible as land reform areas. We shall seek to banish from our land all traces of feudalism against which we hear today so loud an outcry, although many of those who do so are without understanding of the meaning of feudalism.

An integrated social program has been formulated. The program implementing body is headed by the First Lady. We will include socialized housing, transfer or build new factories in depressed areas, create new jobs, new opportunities. We will establish agro-industrial areas. We will establish free trade zones; there is one now in Bataan. It is my plan to put up free trade zones in Visayas and in Mindanao. We will provide low-cost housing for the masses. We know how urgent the need is for low-cost housing, but over and above all of these, we will root out corruption in government to a degree we have never witnessed before.

We have already dismissed more people in high places for corruption and graft than were ever dismissed by all previous administrations put together. We will continue with this relentless drive at all level. We will continue with what has been called the “green revolution”, utilizing techniques and resources we employed in the successful propagation of the miracle rice variety which has marked us as one of the great rice producing countries in the world.

It is only here in our country that we do not appreciate this achievement. When you go to other countries, the first thing that they will ask you is about our rice, because the Philippines has made its mark in rice production. One lesson that we have learned in our successful rice program is this, that no problem is insurmountable to a people determined to help themselves.

Let me repeat that to you because I want you to remember this wherever you are and whenever you face any problem. There is no problem that is insurmountable to a people determined to help themselves. There is no doubt that we will attain our objectives if given the time and support of the people. It is certain that in time our people will thank themselves for their patience and foresight. But it is a truism that we cannot satisfy all the people, especially those who call themselves radicals. And this is also true of the Communists. Whether we reform government or society or not, ultimately and at last there will come a time when there will be a military confrontation with the communists.

And I want you to remember this, too, to remember that about 4:40 in the afternoon of March 22nd, here at your graduation ceremonies, I warned you, that under my administration or under other administrations, ultimately there would be a military confrontation here in the Philippines between democracy and communism.

Right now, there is no group that can successfully win a revolution, that can overthrow the government. But communism does not think in terms of months or even years; it can even plan in terms of decades if necessary. Even if they were to try to mount a revolt now, either in desperation or in the expectancy of taking over the government, and we should overwhelm them as we have overwhelmed them in the past and as I am certain that we can overwhelm them again, just remember this, you who are graduating today, you will meet them again in the battlefield. You will meet them for they will try and try again, whether I am President or not, for this is the basic strength and weakness of communism.

Once a body politic has been contaminated, you cannot root out the germs of communism. This is my message to you this afternoon. Someday you will be facing Communist troops. You will be facing the armed elements of the communist conspiracy, and when you do, remember that your Commander-in-Chief warned you this afternoon to be prepared always for such an eventuality.

Yes, this is true of the Communists in the mountains and the Communists in the cities. This is true of insurgents and of subversives; this is true of the armed elements and the sophisticates and the intellectuals. So long as the government remains in the hands of those believing and living in democracy, the Communist elements in our midst will continue to seek to destroy us, for that is the only way they can survive.

Ultimately, therefore, they will seek, as I have said, a military confrontation and failing in that, seek again another military confrontation, when they feel strong once more. Do not be lulled into thinking that we can count on this, just because the radicals have said that they will no longer demonstrate. Either in the belief that they have sufficient strength to overthrow the government or despairing over their failure to gain popular support, they will seek to use force to attain power. And like it or not, these elements will have to surface in a last ditch effort to seize control of the government. But we shall not hand the government to them on a silver platter. While I am President communism cannot thrive in the Philippines.

However, when that time comes, when this confrontation comes, you in the military must not be caught off-guard. For you are the first line of defense of our people. You are the ultimate guardian of the democratic process.

Yes, we will generate reform. We will spread over the length and breadth of our land all the blessings that come from a progressive and liberal government such as ours. We will root out corruption, we will give land to the landless, we will give jobs to our people. And there shall be prosperity, for I can foresee this, but even if we do succeed in attaining these objectives, communism will still drive on and it will still seek to overthrow the government by military force. Remember that dictum of Mao Tse-tung — power comes out of the barrel of a gun. So what they cannot attain, as they have never attained anything, by popular support, they will do so through the barrel of a gun.

You are steeped in the tradition of a democracy. In this country, the military is not divided between the right and the left. It is united; let it continue to be so. If the time came for the Armed Forces to utilize all the resources at its command to frustrate the aims of our misguided countrymen seeking to take arms against the government, it would afterward be its duty to withdraw once more into the background to give way to the restoration of civilian authority. Then, it shall assume its accustomed role in a peaceful and just society.

Now, what do I mean by this? I mean that let us assume a situation in which, owing to the seriousness of the Communist challenge, either by means of subversion or by direct armed confrontation, it becomes necessary for me as President of the Republic of the Philippines to exercise extraordinary powers. Even right now, of course, government has sufficient ordinary powers to contain the Communist menace. The nation can therefore assure itself that the government will need no recourse to any unusual measures as long as the same menace is not enlarged.

In the event the Communist threat becomes a positive danger which would imperil the safety of the state, the President of the Philippines will have no other choice but to assume those larger powers within the Constitution which our forefathers have seen fit to grant to the President as a means of self-protection for the state. For instance, the Constitution says that the President may call upon the Armed Forces to quell disorder, riot, rebellion. This is not an extraordinary power. We exercised this power when Malacañang was attacked by rioters, when we called upon the military to help the Metrocom and the police of Manila.

Then the Constitution reads, in the event of invasion, insurrection, rebellion, or imminent danger thereof the President may suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus or declare martial law. Now, here are two awesome powers of the President. What are the basic conditions for the exercise of these powers? They are, first, that there is invasion, insurrection, rebellion or imminent danger thereof, who decides whether there is imminent danger of invasion, insurrection, or rebellion? Only the President. No one can question his authority, not even the Supreme Court. This has been decided by our Supreme Court, and by all courts of the lands wherein the same constitutional provision exists. What can the President do? He can suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus or declare martial law. What is meant by the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus? When you suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus you suspend the power of any court to order one who has custody of any person to bring this person to court and produce the body before such court.

In short, with this suspension the military is authorized to arrest anyone without a warrant of arrest, who in good faith they believe will prejudice the state in the situation in which it is in. Now, note that I said, “Who in good faith they believe will prejudice the position of the state in the situation in which it is in.”

Now, what is a proclamation of martial law as compared to the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus? He merely tells the commanding officer or the commanding general of the troops that occupy any part of the country to assume all powers of the civil government, executive, legislative, judiciary. Many of you are going to become generals, I guess, I can see it. Many of you will be in command of units. It is my hope that whoever is President at that time will never find any occasion either to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus or declare martial law. Because a declaration of martial law is replacement of civilian authority by the military. The civilian authority is completely pushed out and the military commander becomes the entire government. What he says is law. That is why sometimes I smile when I receive all these urgent telegrams sent to me by many people from all over the Philippines, urging me to declare martial law. I get all these telegrams saying, what are you doing, Mr. President? Now, while the danger can still be met, declare martial law.

Now, do they understand what martial law is? It means that the military government, the military becomes the entire government, unless I, as Commander-in-Chief, put on my uniform and say, I am in command of the entire military. I assume all the powers of the government.

Now, this should not be taken very lightly. We must never reach this stage, this point, if possible, and that is why the military must always be prepared because as long as the military is united, so long as the military is stronger, so long as the enemy does not underestimate us, then there will be no military confrontation.

And that is why I bring this matter before you today. You must always keep the military strong and ready for any eventuality.

In either case, the military plays a great, if not a crucial role in our country. When the state becomes irreversibly engaged in a decisive confrontation with a particular danger, the military steps in as the final guardian of the state's safety and the protection of the people's welfare. When the civilian authority collapses completely the military takes over.

With the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, with the proclamation of martial law the military takes over.

Nevertheless, in our system of government, and I must emphasize this, the supremacy of civilian authority is never lost, whether we are in a crisis or in an emergency, the civilian authority is still supreme. It may seem only to disappear in that awesome situation which martial law creates. The consequent military take-over in such an emergency is actually made, however, in continuing obedience to the democratic vision. In the emergency I have described, the military takes over for the sole purpose of reestablishing civilian authority. Remember that, the military takes over only for the sole purpose of reestablishing civilian authority.

As you can see, then, the military has an obligation to remain consistent with the democratic ideals of freedom and of respect for human dignity. The conditions of emergency I have described as a consequence of a serious communist threat are necessarily confused and even chaotic at first, giving rise to inclinations in conflict with the ordered ways which we are accustomed to.

In such an event it is incumbent upon the military to comply even more rigorously with the creeds of honor and patriotism and integrity. I am glad that all these are deeply ingrained in the graduates of the Philippine Military Academy, who are expected to provide much of the leadership in the country's military forces.

Nor are the precepts which make for good and sturdy character less desirable in a time of peace and orderliness. While waiting for a military confrontation with the foes of our democratic values and institutions, the military must constantly prove itself reliable and trustworthy, if it expects our people to accord it continuing respect and support in a time of disorder.

The military, in time of peace or war, must take special care that lives and property are safeguarded and individual freedoms respected. It is the soldier's duty to face danger, as you all know, not to save himself or promote his welfare at the expense of the civil society. This is the burden of soldiery. This calls for the utmost in courage and discipline, but this is necessary if the military is not to be alienated from the society of which it is a part.

Imbued with the basic ideals of democracy and raised on the lessons of courage, discipline and honor, which are part of your traditions, the military is, and must be, at all times the sobering and reassuring force in our society. In a world that seems to have grown callous and more reckless, the old virtues which grow out of the traditional sense of honor have become almost an anachronism.

However, I ask you to value them. I ask you to hold them dear to your heart. They are your anchor. When you are in crisis hold tight to them. This is the experience of a young old man who stood fast through many desperate situations.

Your ideals are your only hope for survival, and I repeat, whenever you meet a crisis hold true to these ideals and the tradition of honor, discipline, integrity, and you will not pass up any opportunity for greatness. I ask you to demonstrate this as young men, the kind of young men on whom the country can depend.

To each and everyone of you I say congratulations and I salute you in the name of the Filipino people.

Nourishing the Spirit

KARAPAT-DAPAT NA SA Araw ng Kasarinlan ay bigyan natin ng gantimpala ang mga katangi-tanging ambag sa iba't ibang larangan ng minana nating kalinangan. Unang-una, sa agham, pananaliksik, at siya ay walang iba at aking uulitin na naman, si Ginoong Nemesio Mendiola. Sa panitikan, si Ginoong Lazaro Francisco. Sa kasaysayan, si Ginoong Esteban de Ocampo. Sa sining, si Ginoong Gerardo de Leon, Diosdado M. Lorenzo at ang panghuli ngunit hindi nahuhuli, si Ginoong Leandro Locsin. At sa musika, si Ginoong Fajardo.

Upang maunawaan ng lahat ng ating mga panauhin, pahintulutan po ninyo akong magsalita sa wikang Ingles.

Today we celebrate our Independence Day, with just pride in our heritage. But for a country to be loved by its people and esteemed by others, it must be a country epitomizing beauty and grace.

A nation is not a nation without a cultural life, nor a people a fully realized people without art to enrich their existence, and there is no beauty without culture, no grace without art. The creation of beauty, it has been said, is the ultimate act of freedom.

Thus, if I were asked why, today, in the celebration of our freedom and independence, we speak of beauty, I would reply, because beauty is the ultimate act of a man living in freedom. Thus, as we seek development as nation, we invest our human and material resources in cultural development, we are investing them in the economic development of our country.

Tonight, we honor those who have posted distinguished achievements in the field of culture. We are honoring writers, painters, musicians, architect, the scientists and other creative Filipinos who have proven their worth and who have in their works in the past year reaffirmed the Filipino genius.

We honor them today on the anniversary of our freedom because they too have offered their share of sacrifice at the altar of our independence, for every act of creation is an act of freedom and it helps build the structure of freedom and independence. Every act of freedom strengthens freedom itself.

It is refreshing for me to speak tonight of issues and matters well removed from the political field, or from the purely material, which, I observe, are what obsess most our countrymen, and for that matter much of the world today.

We consider tonight the subjective, the intangibles, the things of the spirit. These are no less real than roads, schoolhouses, or rice. These nourish a nation as much as trade and industry, as much as politics and food.

For independence and freedom would be empty and meaningless without the grace of culture or the inspiration of art.

It is often observed that Asians are inherently inward people. The inscrutability of Asians, which Westerners make much of, may only be a manifestation of intense inner communion, the stillness of the spirit. One might say that Asians are spiritually strong. That is why we have the capacity to endure, to endure adversity and pain. We have lived through massive famine, through endless wars, earthquakes, floods, locusts, and numberless upheavals. Yet the Asian's serenity prevails.

Do you wonder, therefore, that Asia has predated Western culture, that it has flowered in between holocausts?

This Asian tradition is reflected in the Filipino people, despite the entrustment of foreign civilizations. We have the potential and the capacity to flower culturally, once we have discovered our true identity.

It has often been said that the modern dilemma of the Filipino is his identity crisis. This might well be true. We belong to two worlds — you and I. We have the veneer of the West, while deep inside the spirit of our past tug at our psyche. We are enticed both ways, we have a conflict within us. The resolution of our dilemma will lie in the direction our resurgent nationalism will take. I do not say that we cannot make the best of two worlds, but I strongly persuaded that we can assert ourselves as a people, as an Asian people, if we allow our instincts to prevail. In so doing, we can become a people unique, although not apart either from the Asian heartland or from the larger human family.

But in order to come into our own, so to speak, we must now begin, more energetically than ever before, to deepen our culture, and take the best from our cultural heritage.

Celebrating all things Filipino, in art, in music, in the dance, and in literature is only the beginning. We must also document our times, not only in the rigid framework of history, but against the larger horizons of the arts.

I do not think that our final goal as a people and as a nation is to become an economically prosperous nation. I do not think we even desire to be a so-called world power, with military might to prove it. I do not think that we aspire alone to full stomachs, or a munificent industrial complex, or a well manicured suburbia. If I may say so, what we envision is a viable nation of freemen; yes, free, and that is important because it is only in that milieu that we can enrich the spirit, through unrestricted cultural development.

So while we strive to give the body its due — food, shelter, comfort— and the nation its rightful place in the sun— viable, respected, and productive — we must do our best as well to nourish the Filipino spirit, to reveal its hidden beauty, to make it speak of its bright visions, and to build a precious legacy for other generations of Filipinos.

Only when we have succeeded in nourishing well our spirit can we consider ourselves as a people fully realized.

Meanwhile, for tonight, I am happy enough to present these awards to our creative citizens who have stood out from among their fellows. I congratulate each and every one of them. They deserve our gratitude, they deserve our respect for their achievements. I hope they will always remain artistically fertile, and fruitful. I hope they will do even more distinguished work. Artists must grow too, and develop, and only through the intensity of their work and vision can they succeed in doing this. I must congratulate the Cultural Center of the Philippines, and in all modesty I take note that the First Lady is the Chairman of the Board of Trustees. To each and every one of them, I extend the congratulations not only of the President of the Philippines, but of our people, of our nation, the Republic of the Philippines.

I must take special mention of the architect of the Cultural Center, which has risen grandly by the Bay, no other than Architect Leandro Locsin.

Our writers, singers, dancers, musicians, writers, engineers, architects have a sublime task to perform, now and throughout their lives. It is their task to reveal our country and its people to the world, and more importantly to reveal, the Filipino to himself. If they succeed their achievements will live through all ages. And no man can ask for more than immortality.

Address of President Marcos at the 15th International Conference on Social Welfare, September 6, 1970

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 15th International Conference on Social Welfare

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel, September 6, 1970]

The Quest for a New Society

FIRST OF ALL, let me extend to all of you the warm welcome and hospitality of the people of my country, the Philippines. We are greatly honored by your choice of our country as the site of your Conference. May you find your stay in the Philippines enjoyable and — most of all — fruitful.

You come at the tail of one of the worst floods in the history of the Philippines. You come at a time when our social welfare agencies, both public and private, are engaged in a great deal of work. It is my hope that there will be no flood during your conference.

I gather that the committee of representatives yesterday approved a resolution expressing the gratitude of all the participants to your friend and humble servant, the President of the Philippines, for my invitation to a reception to all the participants to the 15th International Conference on Social Welfare which you are attending. But in view of the disaster caused by the recent typhoon and the destructive flood, and many of our provinces to the north of the City of Manila are still under water, you have suggested that we cancel this reception that I have offered. I thank you for your commiseration for the sufferings of our people. It is my hope that while I am denied the privilege and the honor of meeting with you personally at Malacañang Palace, somehow we will meet each other under more auspicious circumstances.

Your conference theme— New Strategies for Social Development— to my mind, reflects a realistic and urgent recognition of the problems that challenge the modern world, especially that portion we call the Third World or developing countries. Indeed, new strategies are needed, not because the old ones have failed, but because new pressures, new problems are upon us.

I know that all of you are aware that social problems are the moral consequences of economic problems. It is said that if a man is hungry, we have an economic problem, but if a man is hungry and resents it, we have a social problem.

All of us are haunted by the glimmerings of an ideal society, the old Inca society, described by Prescott in the following terms:

“If no man could become rich in Peru, no man could become poor. No mendicant was tolerated in Peru. When a man was reduced to poverty or misfortune (it could never be by fault) the arm of the law was stretched out to administer relief. Not the stinted relief of private charity nor that which is doled out from the frozen reservoirs of the parish, but in generous measure, bringing no humiliation to the object of it and placing him on the level with the rest of his countrymen. . . Ambition, avarice, the love of change, the morbid spirit of discontent, those passions which most agitate the minds of men, found no place in the bosom of the Peruvian.” I reiterate, this was the old Inca society.

It would seem to me that most societies today aspire, more or less, to this condition. For is this not the tendency in the welfare of Scandinavia and Britain, and do we not now find traces of it in the United States itself? Everywhere you turn in the world today, you find the deep concern for the poor, the very young, the aged, the handicapped and the unemployed.

Modern morality rejects the ruthless doctrine of the survival of the fittest. Liberty, equality, and, above all, fraternity shape the desires of all humanity.

You meet at a particular time, when we are, as has been stated here by Secretary Abello, on the threshold of the Second Development Decade. The first decade has not been dramatically successful, and we hope that the new decade will be better. And we hope that the conditions of the world will improve, since all of us know that without peace, many of our countries cannot prosper as they should.

Good societies are established over decades of peace and tranquility, over decades of unhindered efforts towards the achievement of desired goals. And for us in the developing nations, they can only be achieved when there is no exploitation, and, where there is need for it, assistance without humiliation—in the same manner that the old Inca society assisted its poor.

It would seem that the developing peoples require and demand too much to achieve their goals. This is unfortunately so, apart from the fact that we must also require and demand very much of ourselves.

Our economic conditions determine our social conditions, but in many ways, our own social attitudes will dictate how much economic growth we can achieve. Our societies still retain certain traditional features which hinder development. But we must understand that these traditional features often reflect our own regard for what is human in us, as we can see, for example, in our close family ties and friendship in the Philippines. Our problem is how to harness our humanitarian instincts in the service of national progress and prosperity. For there is little doubt that if we were to disregard these instincts, we could achieve economic development—but at the risk of dehumanizing our peoples.

On the other hand, excessive national poverty also dehumanizes. Especially national poverty in a world where some nations are too rich and too powerful. Here lies the root of agitation and “the morbid spirit of discontent.”

There was a time, perhaps, when the poor were ignorant of wealth. But in this day and age of rapid transport and communications, it is no longer possible to hide the wealth of the few amidst the poverty of the many. And more than that, the poor no longer blame their condition on the gods.

Gone are the days of the resigned poor. We have, to begin with, the intelligent, even the intellectual poor—the new poor. Universal education has destroyed the intellectual barrier between the rich and the poor; what remains merely is the social barrier. There is no other way of reading the student unrest especially in developing nations. It is a fact that we must face.

It is a fact all nations must face.

We are witnessing the emergence of a new generation mindful of the full possibilities of technology and the rationalization of production. It is a generation impatient with so-called sacrosanct economic laws and the arguments of vested interests, whether global or national. It demands a new or renewed sincerity.

To the aged, we can still explain the limitations of society in caring for them. For they matured in that same society. But to the young, the student and the unemployed young, the demand is action, not explanation, for in their own way, they have already explained the society in which they live. They demand a new society.

There are, to be sure, the dangers of impatience. A generation, no matter how dynamic or brilliant, rejects the wisdom of the past at its own peril. But as we counsel patience, we must somehow act with swiftness. And even as we act, we must demonstrate the superiority of challenging freedom over bovine slavery, we must show that all material things must be achieved for man—that the state, ultimately, exists for man and not man for the state.

This Conference, therefore, has awesome responsibilities. It presents to the minds of all its participants the anxieties of the age. It has to confront the quest for a new society.

Not one, not a few, but all are challenged.

In thus welcoming you once more, I earnestly pray for your success in meeting this challenge.

Address of President Marcos at the Testimonial Review of the Armed Forces of the Philippines, September 10, 1970

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Testimonial Review of the Armed Forces of the Philippines

[Delivered on September 10, 1970]

The Tasks Ahead for the Armed Forces

ON BEHALF OF the Filipino people, I accept with gratitude this pledge of loyalty of the Armed Forces of the Philippines to its Commander-in-Chief. Yes, I have invoked the name of our people because in truth and in fact it is they who are the real and ultimate object of this loyalty.

This occasion, therefore, is more than a mere ritual. Its deeper significance springs from our democratic way of life and our firm determination to preserve it. For this pledge reiterates the basic democratic principle that civilian authority supersedes military authority. In reaffirming their loyalty to their Constitutional chief, our men and women in uniform manifest again their commitment to this tenet and their resolve to serve our people.

Commitment and service are necessary at this stage in our nation-building. At the start of my administration, I saw it clearly, and I stated it forcefully, that the task of nation-building called for the total mobilization of national resources and the integration of all efforts.

The individual Filipino remains the most precious and the most indispensable of our resources. The object of all our labors, he is at the same time the principal factor in achieving our goals. Our effort will reach far, or fall short, depending on the intensity of his commitment and on the quality of his service to our nation.

I always derive much pride and satisfaction in holding up the AFP as a model of commitment and service, in war or in peace. To its men and women, commitment is their solemn oath, service is their way of life.

My affection for those in the Armed Forces of the Philippines springs not only from my experience of once having been one of them, as indeed one of the most memorable, if not the most memorable, periods in my life has been that of a soldier; but my affection springs also from my close observation of their discipline, their organizational cohesiveness and unity, and their unstinted devotion to duty.

For this reason, I decided at the start of my administration, to utilize the Armed Forces for national development. My trust and conviction have been; amply vindicated.

The participation and accomplishments of our Armed Forces in the socio-economic development of the nation are a matter of common knowledge. I need not speak of the thousands of kilometers of roads constructed by them, the equally numerous schoolhouses and buildings and other infrastructures constructed and being constructed by the AFP. All this speaks of the magnitude and sincerity of their commitment. There has hardly been any region in the country, nor any significant national undertaking in which the Armed Forces have not been called upon to render assistance. This I have done advisedly in order that the Armed Forces may be involved in everything relating to nation-building.

And because they have demonstrated their worth and dependability, the Armed Forces are continuously being called upon to assist even civilian endeavors.

But more than the tangible benefits, impressive as they are, what should give us deeper satisfaction is the fact that in participating intimately in building the sinews of the nation, our Armed Forces have developed a social conscience.

No longer are they strictly bound in thought as well as in application by austere military tradition. No longer is their concept of service confined to killing and the training to kill in the preparation for war; but increasingly it has embraced the work of strengthening the fabric of peace.

More and more, they are being asked to participate, even to take the initiative in some instances, in community development projects, in maintaining and improving peace and order, in expediting the administration of justice, and other tasks which before were considered exclusively civilian responsibilities.

We in the Armed Forces should welcome this emergent role, and so should our people as indeed they do. Far from being the omen of incipient militarism, they should on the contrary be viewed as indications of the people's growing confidence in their Armed Forces.

The Armed Forces on their part must prepare for this role as thoroughly as they prepare for their role in war. By and large, the preparation of the soldier for this new role has been sometimes an on-the-spot adaptation to actual situations. Schooled in military traditions, he finds his military attitudes and habits inadequate responses to complicated social problems, and he is left to improvise and to adjust. I would like to make the following observation. It is a tribute to the adaptability and flexibility of the military man that he has succeeded in his non-military activities, sometimes even without any guidelines from civilian authority. His success would surely be greater if his preparation were more sufficient.

In the many troubled and depressed parts of the country today, particularly in Central Luzon, the AFP's social conscience is at work. I am pleased to say that the results have been very satisfactory, in ameliorating the living conditions of the masses, in reawakening their initiative, and in regaining their confidence in the Armed Forces and the government.

But even as the Armed Forces have been heavily involved in the immediate and more urgent problems of enhancing peace, their primary duty is still to maintain the national security.

Modernization has been the accent in the development of the Armed Forces. The surface and air mobility of their various components have been significantly improved with the arrival of new equipment from our staunch and strong ally, the United States of America. Their weapons inventory is likewise being rapidly modernized with the recent acquisition, and the anticipated delivery, of modern arms, some of which we have bought with badly needed funds. We expect shortly a tremendous improvement in communications facilities with the operation early next year of a modern communications network that will link together practically all tactical elements in the field. Hand in hand with these improvements, the AFP recently effected a reorganization in order to achieve greater efficiency.

Along with modernization, we are making our armed forces more self-reliant, more self-sufficient. Research and development programs are being geared towards the utilization of local talents and resources for defense needs.

The internal Communist menace of subversion and insurgency, which a few months ago threatened to escalate into serious proportions, has been effect-lively stemmed. We can now say with confidence that the dissident tide in Central Luzon, where this threat is focused, has been turned.

The Armed Forces of the Philippines have done much, and have also suffered much, in containing this threat. Not only have scores of soldiers been maimed and killed, their wives widowed and their children orphaned, but often in the pursuit of the goal of peace and security, the pursuit of the goal set by civilian authority, the Armed Forces of the Philippines have often been maligned and their achievements denigrated. Such unfortunately is the price of liberty and freedom. And we in the Armed Forces of the Philippines must always be willing to pay this price. Not only must we be willing to lay down life and treasure, but, we must also be willing to bear assaults on our honor if that too is part of the price for defending our country's freedom and sovereignty.

Of course, the credit does not belong exclusively to the Armed Forces. For the people of Central Luzon should also be credited for their support of and participation in this move. The people of the region, who have finally decided to stand their ground against dissident imposition and depredations, and they must share in the credit. Questions have often been asked. What was the beginning of the Barrio Self-Defense Units or the Self-Defense Force? I know and I would like to reveal that the Barrio Self-Defense Force was started upon the request of the people of Central Luzon themselves. And that is why I smile to myself when I hear some alleged representatives of the people of Central Luzon questioning the Barrio Self-Defense Forces. The Barrio Self-Defense Units, the people of Central Luzon, in cooperation with the government troops, have contributed to the success of many military operations against the dissidents and have severely reduced the mass support of the dissidents. They have denied to them the barrio as a source of information, as a source of recruitment, as a source of supply and a source of moral support. And, today, I must reiterate what have said in the past. The Barrio Self-Defense Forces shall be maintained for as long as the barrio people want them. When we all have reached the stage when the barrio people themselves directly or indirectly ask for the dismantling of the Barrio Self-Defense Forces, then I will order such dismantling but not before the people who have initiated it demand its removal.

In the task of maintaining general peace and order, which normally is a police function, the Armed Forces by sheer necessity have been made to assume the leading role. This is true in many parts of the country, where the local police force is either inadequate or incompetent to maintain peace and order.

Now as in any democracy there are forces at work that are deliberately trying and will continue to try to deliberately discredit not only the Armed Forces of the Philippines but democracy itself, to undermine the people's confidence in that system of government. Pointing to isolated unfortunate incidents and excesses allegedly committed by the men in uniform, they seek to foist upon the people a fear of their Armed Forces as a tool of oppression. But in the debris of recent crisis as in the civil disturbances and, more recently, in the last natural devastation, the flood, they exposed their own falsehoods and they exposed their own evil designs. They are not interested in reforms, are not interested in improvement, they are not interested in progress, they are interested in grabbing political power.

The Armed Forces exist for one purpose, to protect the state and the people from all enemies, whether from within or without. Upholding the people's liberties, as much as preserving the integrity of the state, is inherent in that purpose and central to the oath of office of every member of the Armed Forces. It is being reaffirmed on this occasion by the men and women who are the defenders of our democratic institutions.

In these difficult times we are going through, the Armed Forces have been the mainstay in insuring internal stability. In the event that established order and authority will be seriously threatened from within, and this I do not now foresee, the Armed Forces shall be the bulwark of our society.

Men and women of the Armed Forces of the Philippines, the responsibility that you bear in these times is tremendous. The prosperity and tranquility that we seek for our people demand the utmost from you.

I know that you will not fail. Just as you have proven your mettle in the field of battle, I am sure you will acquit yourselves with honor in the field of peace. And therefore, it is my honor and pleasure to announce once again that I have directed our Armed Forces of the Philippines and the Budget Commissioner to immediately implement the increase in pay for all enlisted personnel in the Armed Forces of the Philippines. I gather that they are in the process of implementing this order. I understand that this will mean an increase in pay for the lowest ranking enlisted personnel, the buck private, of from P130 to P180, and so on up the line.

It is my hope that we shall be able to immediately attend to all other needs relating to further increases in basic pay, including those of the civilian personnel of the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

I also wish to announce the promotion to the rank of General of some of four officers.

In the Philippine Constabulary, I have promoted the commanding officer of the 2nd PC Zone, Col. Paredes; I have also promoted to the rank of Brigadier General the commanding officer of the 3rd PC Zone, Col. Dumlao; I have today also signed the papers promoting to the rank of Brigadier General the commanding officer of Task Force Lawin, Col. Jazmen; in the Philippine Army, I have promoted to the rank of Brigadier General the commanding officer of the 3rd Brigade, Col. Cauton; and I have promoted to the rank of Brigadier General the present superintendent of the Philippine Military Academy, Col. Ugalde, and the commanding officer of the General Staff College, Col. Perez.

To each and every one of them my congratulations. I am continuing to reassess all the recommendations made by the Secretary of National Defense, Chief of Staff and the Board of Generals on the promotions to General.

I have accepted the pledge of loyalty of our men in uniform, in the name of the people, and I repeat, we regard our people as our anchor in these difficult times.

I am your President and Commander-in-Chief, but only temporarily. So, you actually pledge loyalty not to a person but to a symbol, the symbol of the sovereignty of our people. May it always be so — that you remain loyal to that symbol whoever he may be, and to the Constitution, and to the Republic of the Philippines.

Marcos, F. E. (1978). Presidential speeches (Vol. 3). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines]

Speech of President Marcos, The Economic Prospects Are Brighter Now, September 22, 1970

The
Are Brighter Now

Economic

Prospects

YES, I DID cancel a few appointments to come here. One of these appointments was a long distance call from Washington from the First Lady. The previous speakers, especially Mr. Arambulo, referred to the fact that I am all alone in the Palace anyway so I might as well be with the businessmen and commiserate with them. You must admit, we must all admit, that businessmen no matter how good looking, make a poor substitute for the First Lady.

But I am indeed very happy to be with you. The business leaders of our country are in this organization. And, of course, it was only last month that I came before you and during this meeting I expressed optimism about our national ability to dominate every possible difficulty that the economy might face. Present conditions indicate our optimism was not unjustified.

Our difficulties, as you know, are new, and now we can say that it was undue pessimism that made some of our commentators refer to them as crippling, devastating, overwhelming ills. Actually and in truth the experts will tell us that there are very few truly sick or ill economies in the world, although there are underdeveloped ones beset with many difficulties. If our economy had been sick as diagnosed by some of the would-be: prophets this nation would have sunk long, long ago.

But consider the crisis that we have gone through. How many were those who were ready to evacuate their homes last January and February, during the demonstrations against the well-to-do and against the establishment? How many were ready to donate, say, twenty-five percent or even one-half of all their worldly possessions in order to meet the problems that we had then? But now, they have forgotten all of this. Haven't we? This is I think an indication that things have fared well in the past several months.

The lessons of the last few months point to one thing. We are now convinced that there is no problem whether of a local or national magnitude that insurmountable, provided we are willing to make the temporary sacrifices that go with the solution of these problems.

And I advisedly utilize the term "temporary sacrifice." I remember when I was preparing to become a teacher of law before the war. I read one professor's commentary on his wisdom. He said: I write books, my lectures are original and initiate new theories, but when I begin to repeat myself, then I am called wise.

Tonight, I am going to repeat some of the basic formulas that we adopted as far back as 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969 because often times we, and I include myself, the planners, the policy makers, the implementors, the citizenry, forget the primary and ultimate objectives because of the more peremptory and more urgent although temporary, harassments that come from the sides. It is said that the true mark of a leader is seen when he remembers the main thrust and movement which he has initiated and, disregarding the hurting, often painful, harassments that come from the sides, moves forward with resolution and seeks the attainment of the objectives which gave purpose to the original plan.

The historian Arnold Toynbee once propounded a theory of history and development. He said that every civilization responds to a certain challenge, which merely means, I guess, that when there are no more challenges to a civilization, that civilization begins to decay and degenerate. But when the challenges arise and impose a burden upon the people then the people must gather the strength to show that these challenges and burdens do not faze them. The very survival and vitality of a civilization has always depended on the response given by a people in a given historical time when the challenge is made. So we do not determine the success of any nation by the absence of difficulty but by the manner with which the people face difficulty nor do we consider successful a country or a people because of the absence of a crisis but because of the manner by which they saw through the crisis. It is also said that the great peoples on earth have been the peoples who have conquered almost insurmountable obstacles.

It seems to me that this historical theory is particularly applicable to the conditions of our national economy.

Had we despaired instead of taking the proper measures to meet the problems that faced us this year, our economy would have indeed become sick by now.

We started this year, as many times before, with a balance of payments problem. This was the original problem. We sometimes forget this. We knew, however, that this was not the root of the problem: It is the nature of the development process of a country to incur a certain amount of trade deficits. The basic problem was in the structure of our external debt, and we all agreed about this.

We chose to retire previously contracted debts and finance them with short-term loans, instead of contracting long-term obligations to finance development projects, which, by nature, have a long gestation period. And this was true not only of government, it was true of the private sector.

Laudable as the objectives were, this situation could not last without recourse to further foreign borrowing. But there were certain restrictions which made it difficult for the country to obtain the necessary loans.

And I refer to those restrictions because I heard some of our wise men asking, why did we not borrow on long-term conditions before? Why have we thought of it just now? Let me speak of these restrictions.

What were these restrictions? These are contained in Republic Act 4860. First, the Flag Law, which gives an initial advantage of 15 per cent. Very few people realize that a 30 percent increase in the margin of profit is quite a big one. Now, we shall not speak of the advantages enjoyed by Filipinos because there are advantages that we deliberately and voluntarily contrived. But I refer to it as a theoretical cause for the increase in costs. Secondly, the provisions that the Philippines can only obtain loans from countries with which she has diplomatic relations, thus excluding those member-countries of the United Nations with which the Philippines has no diplomatic relations but with which we are willing to grant loans on terms more concessionary than can normally be obtained, and I refer to this because I listened to, and I read, comments to the effect that we should follow through on these loans from other countries, but the problem is, the law does not allow it. And, of course, I am being blamed for not borrowing from these countries notwithstanding the fact that there is this limitation. Now, thirdly, the provision that loans can only be obtained for self-liquidating projects. We have made a study of the various powers given to executives all over the world and we are one of the few countries where this limited provision exists.

This explains the lopsidedness of the external debt structure towards short-term loans, a condition that necessitated the measures which you are now familiar with, namely: the "floating rate" adopted in the February Central Bank Circular 299 and 306, the roll-over of loans from the American commercial group the passage of the Export Incentives Bill; the dollar deposit scheme; the amendments to the restrictions of Republic Act 4860 now in Congress, and the creation of the External Debt Management Office.

As a result of these measures, international reserves at the end of June showed considerable improvement over last year's level. This amounted to $210.6 million, making an increase of $34.3 million, or 19 percent, over reserves of a year ago. So if you hear anybody say that we have progressed, yes certainly we have progressed in some areas, but our original objective has been only partially attained.

During the first semester of this year, foreign exchange receipts exceeded disbursements by $36 million. For the same period last year, foreign exchange transactions showed a net disbursement of $16 million.

In merchandise trade the latest available data show that for the first five months of this year, imports totalled $445.3 million and exports $415.8 million. This resulted in a trade deficit of $29.5 million, compared to a deficit of $118.7 million for the same period last year.

On the other hand, on the basis of the external debt schedule as of June 30, 1970, the debt service ratio for FY 1970 is fairly high at 9.521. But from then on, it tapers off to 0.165 by 1973 and 0.021 by 1980.

Not a few, I know, consider the measures taken by this administration to be heroic, including those who have spoken before me. Some call them severe, but none, so far as I know has responsibly debated with the necessity of these measures. On the contrary, some of the measures, if not all, were proposed by the business sector of the Philippines. Those who contend, on the other hand, that the government should not have allowed a situation to develop in which these pleasures would have to be undertaken, do not appreciate or are deliberately blind to the routine problems of a developing economy.

But anyone, with an economic sense, I suppose, should know that the economic situation is part of our historical development, that we could not push the economy forward to modernization without cost and effort in terms of sacrifice and discipline. And now comes the question, but why 1970? Well, probably, the most direct and frank answer to this is, because it just happens that the sacrifices and discipline that were required after the elections of 1969, when the political pressure was strong, no longer exist.

As a matter of fact, to keep the economy going, we should learn the habit of discipline so that the gains we have achieved would not be dissipated. And I am certain that the businessmen of the Philippines understand and realize this.

The prospects, to begin with, are brighter now, precisely as a result of these measures undertaken. Our external debt servicing capacity, to begin with, has increased. A comparison of the projected debt-service ratio—that is, the ratio between debt service and current earnings—with the maximum considered permissible by development experts (20 to 23 per cent according to the Federal Reserve System) shows that the country can contract additional loans as early as 1971, assuming loan terms of 8 per cent, a 2-year grace period and in 12-equal annual installments.

The view from this point of our national progress is therefore entirely encouraging. For the first time since the bleak years not very long ago, when the nation despaired of our economic future, the rest of the world regards us with faith and confidence. Our economy has been restored to that state of health and vitality which assures other countries of the world, notably the developed ones of the competence of the leadership and the citizenry of this country to pursue sustained growth. What is the evidence of this confidence? We are now deluged with offers of loans but under terms which we may not be able to accept because of the imposition of the International Monetary Fund conditions. Financing institutions and governments abroad, assured of this new Filipino competence are now willing to extend us credit in large amounts to enable us to undertake further development. The World Bank has lately assured us that it is ready to extend to us a loan of $75 million every year for the next several years. The Export-Import Bank is busy in the restructuring of private sector loans, dollar loans. Financing institutions in Europe and Japan have rendered us tribute, Banks in Great Britain, (the latest word from this sector appeared, I guess, in some of the newspapers this morning) are ready to finance our rural electrification program. All of them have come forward with declarations of confidence in the Philippine economy, in the form of commitments.

Under the 20 per cent assumption of maximum permissible ratio, and speak now of the debt service ratio, the country can safely borrow up to $1,326 million from 1972 to 1974.

Now, there are some people who are worried about indebtedness. And my only explanation for this, as Filipinos all know, is the attitude of, say, the old school hacendero who has a thousand hectares but, in the way of the traditional conservative investor, refuses to borrow money to put in an irrigation system and make his land more productive. But his children, having been trained in the new economy, insists upon borrowing, let's say, half a million pesos, in order to put in an irrigation system. There is this conflict you see. A conflict in concepts in agriculture, in industry, in government policies. It has been my persuasion to decide in favor of the bolder, more progressive course for the economy.

Of course, we must take precautions. Now, going back to the hacendero who owns a thousand hectares. If we were to follow his policy and that is, let the land stagnate as long as we do not lose it, let the farm give us only 30 cavans of rice per hectare, but let us not take a chance, let us not risk, let us not gamble, because he calls borrowing a gamble, if we followed this idea, we would not get anywhere. But his children insist upon the irrigation system. So, now, they borrow P500,000 or say even a million. Now, if the hacendero were to utilize this P1 million for a new Cadillac or a Rolls Royce, or spend it in the fleshpots of Roxas Boulevard, as some people do, now that would be a different matter. Then, it would be a losing gamble. But if the money goes to an irrigation system; and the irrigation system not only doubles but trebles, even quadruples, the yield of the farm, then, my friends, the loan is not a risk, for it increases not only the value of the property but increases as well the landowner's profits. This is the simple way of explaining this conflict between the two schools of thought in our country today. Schools of thought in conflict not only in government, I repeat, but also in the rest of the private sector. And I, as President, have had the honor and the pleasure of deciding in favor of the younger economist, the younger economist who says, we have rich natural resources but we cannot develop them if we just stand still and let these natural resources lie fallow, because we refuse to borrow any capital to develop them.

The choice is easy. There are only two alternatives open to the government for raising funds — tax or borrow. When you tax, everybody complains; when you borrow, those who do not know the facts complain. Since there are fewer people who complain when you borrow, I guess that even from the viewpoint of numbers it is better to borrow.

Under the 25 per cent assumption of debt service ratio the country can borrow as much as $815.5 million in 1971, and for the Four-Year Development Plan period and that is from 1970 to 1974, a total of $ 1,652 million. Up to 1977, new borrowings can reach a total of $3,832 million. Now these are not just figures that I have just set up for this speech. These are figures arrived at after months and months of study by experts, not only local but foreign.

With these assumed terms, therefore, the total borrowings required by the Four-Year Development Plan for FY 1971-1974, namely— 1,170 million, can be contracted without posing any threat to external stability. As a matter of fact, the acquisition of such loans, in making possible the attainment of objectives set out in the Plan, will aid in strengthening the Philippine peso.

The Plan, moreover, envisions the expansion of exports at 8.3 per cent per annum, with the main thrust coming from minerals, specifically copper, nickel, and iron ore concentrates, sugar, copra, and other coconut products. On this basis, the trade gap is expected to gradually narrow from – 140 million in FY 1970 to – 80 million in FY 1971, and eventually close during the Plan period.

I spoke of the main thrust in mining. We are now working on incentives to be given to oil prospecting. They have just struck oil somewhere in Brunei and it is the belief of many that oil exists here in the Philippines and, therefore, we are studying the possibility of giving tax exemption to the first two firms that discover oil in the Philippines.

In the event, however, of a shortfall in exports resulting in an annual growth of 7.9 per cent per annum in FY 1970-1971, imports would have to be compressed to a 3.6 per cent annual growth in order to close the trade gap at the end of the Plan period. Since imports cannot be contracted without affecting economic growth, any shortfall in export receipts would mean increased borrowings.

Therefore, it is my pleasure to announce to you today that in accordance with this basic policy, we have drawn up the Export Incentives Bill, which Congress has passed.

Now, allow me to read some of the provisions of this bill. I do not think that many of us realize the importance of the Export Incentives Bill.

This act is entitled, An Act to Invigorate the Country's Export Trade as a Means of Accelerating Economic Growth by Granting Certain Incentives and Exemptions to Registered Export Producers, Export Traders and Service Exporters, Repealing Export Incentives Granted under Republic Act Number Fifty-One Hundred Eighty-Six and for Other Purposes.

Now, I need not define to you what is meant by export producers. You know that this means those that are registered with the BOI, in accordance with this Act, and engaged in the manufacture or processing of export products. What are registered export traders? They are those which derive at least 50 percent of their gross income for the year in which the incentives are claimed from the sale abroad or export products bought by it from two or more registered export producers.

And what are registered service exports? They are persons registered with the BOI, engaged or proposing to engage in rendering technical, professional or other services which are paid for in foreign Currency, but not limited to, the fields of law, medicine, accounting, management, valuation, appraisals, engineering, construction, geodetics, surveying, teaching, etc.

What are export products? The export products provided for under this law are those which are manufactured or processed products not more than 80 per cent of whose individual F.O.B. Philippine port value is attributable to imported raw materials. May I repeat that. Not more than 80 per cent of whose individual F.O.B. Philippine port value is attributable to imported raw materials.

And what are the incentives for registered export producers? Every registered export producer shall enjoy, for a period of 10 years from its registration, a tax credit equivalent to the sales, compensating and specific taxes and duties on the supplies, raw materials and semi-manufactured product used in the manufacture, processing or production of its export products. That is, 10 years of the tax credit; and every registered export producer shall be entitled for the first five years from its registration to deduct from its taxable income an amount equivalent to a portion of the total export revenue for a particular year.

Tax exemption on imported capital equipment and tax credit on domestic, capital equipment. There shall be incentives to registered export traders, and the Board can grant additional incentives. These shall include all or any of the following: to use an amount equivalent to double its direct labor cost in applying the formula for reduced income tax provided in paragraph so and so.

So, you can see that this particular law, since it is now law, will indeed serve to encourage Philippine exports. And with the expectation of improved export performance, surplus and invisible transactions will increase the inflow of investments and investment income payments.

With the expectations of improved export performance, a net surplus in invisible transactions and increased inflow of investment income payments, the current account deficit is projected to decrease from $251 million in FY 1970 to $178 million in FY 1971 and to $153 million in 1974.

As projected in the Plan, the country will continue to incur deficits under the capital account as well as amortize past debts. In addition, to maintain a certain minimum of security against currency instability, the Plan provides for an average annual increase of $45 million in international reserves.

Finally, the financing of these transactions will involve additional foreign borrowings amounting to $1,170 during the Plan period—exactly as projected in the Plan.

I alluded to a historical theory at the beginning of this talk, and I said that the measures we have taken this year were in response to a challenge to the national economy. The Four-Year Development Plan, which I discussed at length last month in a meeting with you, is also a challenge. It is not a self-implementing blueprint but a guide to economic action.

By citing what we have achieved thus far, I do not mean to give you, much less those in government, the planners and the policy makers a sense of euphoria. Things are looking up, to be sure; we have gone far, that is certain; but they do not spell an end to effort and discipline.

I would prefer very much a relaxation of credit and I notice this is a very sensitive point with respect to businessmen. But if I may not be criticized by the present generation I would be damned by future generations for irresponsibility and this I will not accept.

Our problems have been man-made and human ingenuity, effort, and discipline, which, also derive from man, can therefore solve these problems. The essential thing is that we should work and work together, and I know that the businessmen of our country and members of this organization will continue to work together.

May I congratulate you for assuming the burdens arising from the various problems that we are facing. Oh, yes, they say the businessmen complain, but it is the right of everyone to complain. But I know that while complaining, each and every one of us realizes that we still must shoulder the burdens that have been imposed upon us by circumstances.

I congratulate the leadership and the membership of this organization, and it is my hope that we will continue this dialogue that we have maintained through the past several years.

Address of President Marcos at the UNIDO-ECAFE 1st Asian Investment Meeting, September 23, 1970

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the UNIDO-ECAFE 1st Asian Investment Meeting

[Delivered on September 23, 1970]

Foreign and Regional Development

Investments

I GREET THE various ambassadors and those who have gone out of their way to participate in this UNIDO-ECAFE 1st Asian Investment Promotion Meeting in Manila.

We welcome this meeting sponsored by UNIDO-ECAFE to bring together proponents of industrial projects in developing countries with prospective investors from developed countries in these various projects. In taking the initiative to organize forums like this, UNIDO and ECAFE recognize the limitations of foreign aid and the ever-increasing importance of private foreign investment in assisting the economic growth of developing countries.

The past few years have seen a growing disenchantment on the part both of developed and developing countries with the efficiency of foreign aid. The flows of aid reflect this. In 1957, the net flow of financial aid to developing countries amounted to about $3.5 billion. In addition, $400 million were received by multi-lateral development agencies.

These flows of financial resources reached a peak in 1967 when developed countries contributed about $5.9 billion directly to developing countries and over $700 million to multi-lateral development agencies. Since 1967, it seems that the desire of the developed countries to increase their foreign aid has somehow slackened.

On the other hand, net private investment and loans, especially in the form of export credits, have doubled in twelve years from about $3 billion in 1968, and there is no sign that this growth will slow down. Most of this increase has been in the form of loans, since between 1956 and 1968, net private direct investment has increased by only $425 million from $2 and 1/3 billion to $2 and 3/4 billion.

It is therefore relevant to talk at this time of ways of stimulating private investments by developed countries in the developing countries of the world. Historically, private investments from the advanced countries have been made in such areas as mining, petroleum production and other extractive industries. In 1966, for example, less than 30 per cent of these investments were made in manufacturing and most of those manufacturing investments were in enterprises designed to serve only the domestic markets which have surrounded themselves with high protective walls.

The opportunities for such highly protected, import substituting type investments in manufacturing in many developing countries have disappeared fairly fast because their domestic markets are small. Furthermore, the difficulties of competing with foreign firms for such limited domestic markets have been the usual source of pressures and irritants. The apprehension of foreign investors that as time goes on the initial welcome for the new technology and foreign capital in manufacturing will wear out probably stems largely from their experience in these import substituting, highly protected, domestic market oriented areas of manufacturing activities. These pressures for national participation will of course become less as national partners are taken into the ventures. Some far-sighted foreign firms which are already in these ventures have in fact taken steps to induce greater investment participation from nationals of the host country, either through the sale of a portion of the foreign ownership of the enterprise to nationals or by accepting capital contributions from the nationals to provide the funds required for the expansion of the enterprise.

Many of these pressures for greater national participation can be substantially avoided if the foreign entrepreneurs set up export oriented manufacturing ventures. This will enable the enterprise, in which the foreign investor has made his investments, to overcome the disadvantages of the limited market which a developed country normally offers for many kinds of manufactured products. It becomes possible to establish an economic size plant without necessitating a monopoly in the domestic market.

In this connection, we welcome the assistance by UNIDO-ECAFE in promoting greater trade among developing countries in the ECAFE region. It recognizes the technology and economic realities that capital-intensive projects often require a far greater market than a particular developing country can offer. These factors favor the establishment of a regional industrial complex which will enable capital-intensive projects established in individual countries of the region to serve the other countries of that region. We also welcome the efforts of the UNCTAD to obtain unilateral tariff and non-tariff preferences from the developed countries specially with regard to the output of relatively labor-intensive manufacturing activities in developing countries.

Foreign investments and foreign trade are therefore corollary and complimentary and we would ask the prospective investors from developed countries to consider the mutual benefits that would arise if these were linked to one another.

The Philippine experience seems to bear out the various impressions on foreign investments that I have shared with you today. After the World War II, for example, we granted parity rights to American citizens partly because of the hope that American investments would thereby flow in massive amounts into the Philippines. However, it was only during the 1950s when we instituted foreign exchange and import controls that substantial American investments came into the Philippines, mainly for import substituting, domestic market oriented industries. This influx apparently was due largely to their decision to get within our tariff walls in order to avoid being left out of a lucrative domestic market. It now appears that it may have been better in our policy on foreign investment to have given greater guidance and exercised more discrimination in our welcome to foreign investments. For this reason, the Philippines has recently passed two complimentary laws, R.A. 5186 and R.A. 5455, to set the ground rules for foreign investment, indicating their rights as well as the specific areas where they are welcome. In making explicit the positive role that foreign investments is envisioned to play in this country, we have listed the preferred areas of investment in an annual Investment Priorities Plans. In preferred non-pioneer areas, foreigners are allowed to invest in up to 40 per cent of the common and voting shares of the corporation. In fact, they are encouraged to invest on a minority basis in these enterprises because they receive the same incentives given to 100 per cent-owned Filipino firms, including tariff protection and a guaranteed share of the market. Moreover, there is no limit to the extent of their beneficial ownership—the proportion on non-voting shares they may hold.

In the pioneer-areas, foreign investment is particularly welcome. Not only are there more incentives for pioneer than for non-pioneer enterprise, subject only to the requirement that the enterprise must attain 60 per cent Filipino ownership within twenty years. This twenty-year period may be extended by another twenty years if there is not enough Filipino capital willing or able to buy the shares or if there is some other reason which our Board of Investments considers sufficient to warrant such an extension. Foreign investment is particularly encouraged in these pioneer areas because in addition to their finances they possess the expertise needed to carry out the pioneer projects successfully. Our government's policy is that the development of those projects where the capital requirements are too heavy and the technical skills presently too specialized for Filipinos should not be postponed because there is a pressing need to accelerate the growth of the economy and generate more employment.

In all areas of business activity permitted by our Constitution, except in retail trade, foreigners may invest in up to 30 per cent of an enterprise, outstanding capital stock on the sole condition that the Board of Investments be informed on the investment for purposes of record. Foreigners may own more than 30 per cent of the outstanding voting capital stock of an enterprise provided that the Board of Investments approves the application for such an investment. It should be noted that the Board is directed to grant this authority unless the investment is in business activities which are already overcrowded, adequately exploited by Filipinos, or inconsistent with the Investment Priorities Plan of the Board.

I have just signed the Export Incentives Act which grants greater incentives to export oriented ventures, especially when they utilize local raw material and fare labor intensive. While the Act presently gives foreign firms in pioneer areas all the incentives that are granted to Filipinos, I have suggested to Congress in approving the Act that certain amendments should be subsequently included to grant incentives to foreign firms even in non-pioneer areas provided that their entire output is exported. I made this suggestion because I am convinced that foreign investment has a legitimate and necessary role to play in the growth of a developing country. I am confident that so long as the host country recognizes the justified profit motive of the foreign firm and so long as the foreign firms recognize the objectives and aspirations of their host country, the flow of private foreign investments into developing countries will increase substantially.

In closing, I extend to all of you the welcome of my country. May our meetings bring; new initiatives into the ECAFE region, generate employment and intensify the economic development of this part of the world.

New Goals for the Movie Industry

WHEN I SPEAK to this gathering of film producers, artist and technicians. I am aware that I am speaking to a group whose work is vital and whose influence is enormous in our society. Those of us whose work is to lead and govern; look to this community to provide our people a vital and purposive entertainment industry and to harness that industry for the task of building progressives and healthy nation.

I would be dishonest not to admit that the mere experience of meeting and associating with the beautiful stars of our film industry is for me already a very real pleasure, but tonight I am even more pleased that aside from this signal-pleasure, I am accorded the honor of addressing our film producers, those men, who more than any other group govern and direct the course of our film industry.

For a long time now I have wanted to meet with you to discuss the problems that obtain in your work and the way by which all of us, you in the industry and I in the government, can use our resources to solve these problems and to really develop our motion picture industry. The present state of the industry, where it is indeed and how it is making use of its opportunities, suggest to my mind that there is a great deal that we can do to upgrade the quality of our films and to make them truly relevant to our lives and to our history as a nation.

Philippine cinema has simply reached the point where it must either advance or regress, either live or die. This is not to say that the opportunities for a good and prosperous life as an industry are not there; they are there, have always been, and today the opportunities have never been more inviting. We need only to consider the state of the cinema in America, Europe and Asia to see how vital this medium can be in our lives and how self-sustaining it can be as an industry.

It is for us now to seize these opportunities and make our film industry a truly vital force in the lives of our people and in the economy of our country. And I would like to tell you tonight that you are not alone in dreaming of this advancement; this concern, this hope, we share in common.

But saying that we are one in this hope is surely not the same thing as saying that it shall be realized. We shall have to inquire again into the basic goals of our movie industry and nourish it with those goals that are enduring rather than ephemeral, if we are to realize this hope. Above all, we must see the problems not merely in the light of each producer's special concerns, but in the light of common goals and larger concerns.

This I submit, requires long and thorough study.

To begin with, there is the problem of technical facilities presently available to the industry.

In a world literally exploding with the wonders of new discoveries in the art of film-making, the Filipino film continues to use sub-standard equipment and technical know how. We continue to make do with what we had two decades ago, and it is not surprising that our product has remained the same — a pale comparison to the work of other filmmakers in the world today.

Yet the problem of equality is not to be explained merely by the absence of technical equipment. Complementary to this lack of technical facilities is an even graver lack of talent and know how to inform the local cinema. By this, I do not mean any lack whatsoever of good actors and actresses. This we have in abundance; what we do not have are the directors, writers, film editors and cinematographers who more than anyone in the industry are responsible for the quality of the film product. Our film industry has simply failed to attract such talent into the business; the few talented film-makers whom we had some years ago have since left the industry for greener fields.

In saying this, I do not mean to belittle the obstacles that confront every filmmaker and producer whenever the cinema is bound by the canons of popular tastes and mass consumption. The making of one single film requires such a huge investment, that to recover it, the film must be seen by a good portion of our film-going public. And it is surely no new discovery of ours that what is considered artistic or excellent is more often than not the dish not of the mass but of the elite.

Yet, granting that our local films must seek its audience among the masses in order to survive, it is my belief that even in the task of providing good entertainment the local film industry leaves much to be desired. Today, we seem to mistake the popular for the vulgar, and even for the patently obscene.

Even if we confine our goals only to good entertainment, I submit that such entertainment can be made relevant to our lives, can be reflective of what is uniquely Filipino, without ceasing to be popular. The fact is many of us have a tendency to underestimate the capacity of the masses to appreciate what is good, and because of this underestimation, most of our films retain this obsessive tendency to be unintelligent and silly.

It seems to me that more than the lack of capital obtaining within the industry, the reason for its failure to be self-generating and self-sustaining is to be found in a confusion of goals and a fear of treading what is not safe and has not been tried before.

This fear and this confusion has constricted the imagination of the local film industry. And like any other enterprise, the absence of imagination results in stagnation and decay.

To infuse new life into the industry, we must re-examine therefore the goals of our movie industry, and having done this we must map out a new course for development. Then and only then can it begin to attract new capital and new talent, which alone can be the basis for its advance.

The presence of an association such as this is a good beginning for such a re-examination. Because you are the guardians and the lifeblood of the industry, a consensus of opinion among you can have sweeping effects on the industry.

It is my belief that the solution of the problem facing the industry cannot lie simply in the institution of a government subsidy for the industry or in the reduction of taxes on local films.

My administration is prepared to extend to you every assistance in your plan to develop the industry, but the price of development demands on your part the will to lift it from the morass in which we find it.

I am hopeful that this group and the other film organizations will pool their resources and conduct a thorough study of our motion picture industry. In such an undertaking, my administration is prepared to assist you at once.

On the basis of such a study, we can then make plans together for a concerted and joint development program.

I must now summarize and conclude.

I have tried to delineate to you what I take to be the problems of our film industry. I have charted the opportunities open to you as film-producers and financiers. I now leave it to you to explore them further.

It is my hope that having seen one another again, neither you nor I shall be overwhelmed by the problems before us; and knowing that we share the same hopes, we shall not flinch.

Marcos, F. E. (1978). Presidential speeches (Vol. 3). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Address of President Marcos at the 22nd National Convention of the Philippine Jaycees, October 1, 1970

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 22nd National Convention of the Philippine Jaycees

[Delivered at The Plaza, October 1, 1970]

The Philippines Beyond the Seventies

MR. YATCO, PRESIDENT Liwanag of the Philippine Jaycees, and those two energetic leaders, Tony Pangilinan and Boy Calo, I understand, are all engaged in political activity. I don't know what the Comelec will say about them, for I haven't heard of any of them filing their papers of candidacy.

The public enthusiasm, the cheering and the boos, the rousing political meetings and the pervasive propaganda, the urgency of a political campaign are missing in the race for delegate seats. The Comelec, of course, and the Constitutional Convention Law have prevented all this. Thus, we are experiencing an experiment in political campaigns.

The pendulum has swung from one extreme to the other. From an extreme of prolix speeches, of sound and fury in campaigns, of excessive expenditures, we have moved to a rare modulation, even to a veritable paucity in the discussion of issues and in light shed on the men running for a convention seat.

Anyway, I am indeed very happy to be here with you. Your President will bear witness to the fact that I was so eager to be here that at 9 o'clock I was all prepared to come here, only to be informed by my advance party that there was not a single Jaycee here at the Rizal theater. Worried that perhaps some mishap had befallen the entire Jaycee organization, I had my men make inquiries, and I was informed that you were engaged in a demonstration. But it was the kind of demonstration that we welcome, the kind of demonstration which we all hope everybody will engage in, which would show the enthusiasm of the young.

I greet each and every member of this convention. You represent various regions of the country. Indeed, I see here my friends from Sulu and Cotabato, and I am very glad that they were able to come, notwithstanding the reports of an impending tribal war. At least, that is what the papers say. I have just received the report on this matter of Secretary Ponce Enrile, who arrived in Manila barely 30 minutes ago. I sent him to the South to find out what the situation was. I always do. Whenever I read anything serious in the newspapers, I always send my own investigators. It is better to find out directly because sources of information are a little bit unreliable nowadays. I said just a little bit unreliable, mind you.

Well, you and I belong to the younger generation. And I hope you will pardon me if I include myself. And the younger generation, as you know, is obsessed with what is going to become of the world and of our country and of our people. Whenever there are any new plans, we speak of the present decade, the 70's. This decade is supposed to mold the future. This is the womb of the days to come. But today let me talk to you of the future after the 70's.

What will be the image of the Philippines and of this part of the world after the seventies?

We can almost hear our critics or detractors voicing the old saying, "Take care of today and tomorrow will take care of itself." There was probably a time when we could survive and even flourish and indeed progress, with this old attitude. But that was sometime ago. I do not believe that is possible now, in this modern world of cataclysmic, sudden, shocking change.

There is nothing we can do about the present, so some people say except to live with it. Present problems are the result, however, of past action or inaction, which led me to say that the role of a President or a leader of the people is to correct the mistakes of past leadership and past Presidents. You therefore become so occupied with rectifying the errors of the past that you seldom have enough time to plan for the future.

Well, it's about time we started planning for the future. And as soon as became President in 1965, you remember, I organized Presidential Commissions that have since been working quietly. Presidential study groups from all sectors were put to work to tell us, tell me, tell the decision makers tell the planning groups, what we want the Philippines to be twenty year from now, thirty years from now. I even asked the military planners, "Fifty years from now, what will the Philippines be doing in the matter of security. What will we do with the military bases, or with the SEATO, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization? What will be our policy with respect to Red China? What do we expect Red China to become? Will time be at moderating influence or will this conflict between Russia and Red China continue? Will it explode?" These are the questions that the leader asks the experts, the men who probe into the future and therefore can give some kind of a guide to the decision maker. When we say that we are solving present problems, we are actually merely managing them, according to some observers, or controlling them by temporary "crash" measures.

But the future is yet to come. We can anticipate its main outlines and provide in the present the solutions to problems that will arise.

That is, for good or ill, the way of the modern world. There are many who say, why don't we leave that to the younger generation? Anyway, that's going to be their world. But the younger generation will certainly damn us if we do not now lay the basis for the decisions that they have to make, ten years, twenty years from now. And when I say "they," I perhaps mean you. I understand there are 53 candidates from the Jaycee membership for delegates to the Constitutional Convention. Oh, that may not be enough to control the Constitutional Convention, but it certainly will exert an influence on the Constitutional Convention, if all of you get elected.

As businessmen and modern managers, you know that this is also the way of modern enterprise. You want to know what your business will be like, or how it will be operating two years, three years, five years and better yet ten to twenty years from now. This is but simple foresight for to be unconcerned about the future is to surrender to circumstance which is not the way and the character of man. The human specie is supposed to be differentiated from all other vertebrates by his capacity to change his environment, present and future. And by environment I don't refer merely to his physical surroundings but to the ideas that create those physical surroundings.

Projections are common, common to both business and to the public sector. You also know that we live in a world of rapid change, as I have said, shocking, cataclysmic, sudden change. And what is a decade in the history or the life of a nation? It's just a dot in the continuing history of a country. It was not so when the world was younger, I suppose, when economies were parochial, and a change in one part of the world took a pig, long time to reach the other end. But in our modern times, a decision in Moscow or in Washington or in Peking or in Cairo or Tel Aviv, will reverberate throughout the world in a matter of minutes if not seconds, and Crisis may come and go in a matter of hours or days.

As a developing country, there are tremendous demands upon us. You will know this. Even the developed countries which have all the resources and skills to meet the problems of the future have to plan ahead.

You see the big industrial countries planning now in terms not of 1975 or 1979, but in terms of the year 2,000, and the Philippines will again be left behind if we do not also do the same. And notwithstanding all this long-term planning, all these projections, sometimes things go awry. Plans fail to respond to unexpected situations, and therein we find the human factor at work. You can appreciate, therefore, the urgency with which developing countries, already limited in resources, limited in capability must prepare for the future that is even now daily gaining upon us.

I have often quoted the wise observation in reply to the question what must a man do in Asia in order to progress, and the answer was in Asia, a man merely to stand still must run. To stand still, you must run.

In a previous speech before another group of business and industrial leaders, I said that the prospects for the seventies, in so far as the economy was concerned, had become brighter because of the discipline we imposed on ourselves this year.

I note that the theme under this administration of President Liwanag is self-discipline and this is indeed something that we must all think of seriously, and practice and implement individually and as a nation. We voiced optimism about solving our balance-of-payments problems, and our optimism was well rewarded, yours and mine. In March, for instance, I think the exports amounted only to about $35 million. In May and June, they went up to $125 million. In January of this year the dollar reserves were only about $175 million. Now, they have gone up to $235 million. We have been able to restructure about $300 million worth of short-term loans. We have been able to pay standby credits. I notice the ambassador from Japan is here, Ambassador Urabe. The Japanese government has extended to us a $50 million standby loan. And today, October 1st, the consultative group of about 12 nations called or invited by the World Bank is meeting in Paris on the Philippine 4-year economic social-development program to look particularly into the opening of investment and trade credits, supplier's credit, and other accommodations that may be extended to the Philippines after having, shall we say, passed the peak of crisis. We are now trying to consolidate our stronger position, gained from all this self-discipline, for the entire strategy of meeting the balance of payments problem rested on self-discipline. And self-discipline is not too pleasant when you come to think of it. Discipline presupposes and connotes restraints self-denial, and self-denial is never popular, whether with the younger people or with the older people, whether with males or females.

Now, notwithstanding the difficulties we encountered, we are moving forward. This does not mean that we have solved all our problems. No, not by any means. But we are over the hump and we are now moving forward to the other plans that we had prepared sometime last year.

I have often been asked: why were these decisions made in 1970, not in 1969 or 1968? The decision makers were notified of this crisis, which was approaching sometime in August, September, October, November. And here is one of the weaknesses of our democracy that must be met, and that is, the political pressures which often require the postponement of urgent decisions.

There was an election in November and, predictably, everybody kept postponing decisions that could affect the political campaign. I, for one, had insisted upon an immediate decision, strong in my confidence that irrespective of whatever decision would be arrived at the political results would not be affected. But I was overruled. I was overruled and the decision was delayed; not until 1970 was there a definite decision made.

Here you see again the workings of what I have always described as managing, merely managing the circumstances, managing and trying to survive. We must now plan ahead.

Within the period of the 4-year Development Plan, which is now being discussed in Paris, we were to have an increase of 6.5 per cent in the Gross National Product. Now, these are familiar figures which you already know but let me repeat them for the television and radio audience who, I understand, are listening all over the country this morning. Anyway, the constant increase in population is anywhere from 3.2 to 3.5, and assuming that we will not be able to control it, you would see the narrow margin between progress and retrogression. We must control our population growth now. This is one of the things that we must plan for, not only for the decade of the 70s but for the next several decades. Speaking of population control, well, I think I am a faithful practitioner of this particular science, or rather, the Presidency has imposed on me this particular discipline.

Though we need to talk of population control now, do you know that the results of the steps that we are taking toward population control will not affect this generation? It will affect the next generation or the generation after that. But we must take steps now. This is what I mean by the long projection.

Of course there are many people who say, why should we bother about these long term programs when there are many urgent things that we must attend to at this time — peace and order, roads, and others of immediate concern. Well, I don't know about Makati, but that's what they say in Manila. But this is merely to emphasize the fact that there is a perennial tug-of-war between the immediate, short term, urgent peremptory requirements and the long-term but lasting demands inherent in the long projection, the growth perspective, the plans for generations ahead and not only in the next 40 days. Caught in the middle of this tug-of-war is always the President. Congress for example approves all kinds of laws. They will approve P7 billion worth of appropriations when the income of government is only P3 billion. So you have a deficit of P4 billion and the President is supposed to create the P4 billion. And when he cuts down on expenses in one part of economic activity, either of the private sector or that of government, he gets blamed.

But, I guess, that is why you are President, I keep telling myself. You are President so that you can be blamed for things that nobody else can be blamed for. But that's true. That is why if the President is capable, whenever there is hesitation, whenever the decision makers and the planners hesitate from an unwillingness to assume responsibility from an unpopular decision, it is the duty of the leader to assume responsibility immediately even if it may make him unpopular. This is the role of the leader.

And I speak of this because the Jaycees is a leadership group. This is a pool of leadership on which the country will draw in the future. Just remember what I have said today — that if a leader tends to be a weathervane, always trying to feel the pulse of the people and go with the wind, he will never be able to love the country or the nation. Not only once, but very often, he will have to stand alone and accept the worst possible accusations against him, knowing fully well that he has chosen to assume the responsibility and the blame for decisions imposed by circumstances.

As I keep repeating, and as I wrote to Bongbong the other day, loneliness is not to be feared. He is all alone there in the Worth Abbey School. He wrote me yesterday that he has learned to clean a bathroom big enough for ten boys in five minutes flat. Of course he was trained in the palace, but as I was saying, and I have been telling him always, loneliness should never be shunned by anyone who wants to be a leader because when you are a leader, loneliness is always the other side of the coin, not only of freedom but of leadership. You can never be free unless you learn to be lonely and alone. You will never be a leader unless you are capable of making decisions and assuming responsibility alone.

I am heartened by the fact that your convention theme this year is self-discipline because this is precisely the very heart of self-discipline. I do not foresee any time in the immediate future when we can safely discard self-discipline without forfeiting the future of the Philippines.

When a country is prosperous, is rich, is big, it can afford to make some mistakes or even many mistakes. But when a country is developing and is small, its resources are limited; it cannot therefore afford even a single mistake, especially in planning and implementation. A single mistake could be a reversal and a retrogression, and may mean the loss of decades of hard work by the government and the people.

And thus the importance of the competence of a leader, and this competence depends for effectiveness upon the men whom he chooses to help him acquire the facts on which he bases decisions.

We are called upon to secure our nation — economically, politically, socially — in a world that changes so rapidly.

The essential question for leadership is this: what will the world be like beyond the seventies? In our present reflections, especially where they relate to the economy, we only take account of certain fixed factors, such as the end of parity in 1974, the termination of the Laurel-Langley agreement, and its possible replacement, eventual peace in Vietnam with the promised withdrawal of American ground forces, and I say ground forces advisedly, the continual, if gradual, growth of our neighbors in Southeast Asia and in Asia in general, and the development of certain specific relations in the regions.

Now this specific relations may pertain to cultural, industrial or economic and even political relations. It behooves the leader, and you are leaders, to look into the various facets of such relationships. What are the alternatives? What are the options that our government may have? And if you were in the place of the leader, what would you do? We want to see a peaceful cooperating Asia so that it will not be dominated or overwhelmed by what may be the natural law of the jungle, which seems to prevail even in this modern age, which in some societies dictates that the rich shall grow richer and the poor, poorer. We can manage this law only to a certain extent. Beyond this still is the law.

In the late seventies, what will happen to Japan, and the United States, Australia, Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore? Japan, which is now an industrial society, may join the United States as a super power. What will be its inclinations? How do we in the Philippines propose to live in this new context? How about Red China? As I said in the beginning, will there be a moderation among its leaders? Will they discard the old philosophy of an Asian hegemony under the domination of Red China? How about the Russian threat? The new bases being put up on the islands of the Indian Ocean? What nation in this part of the world has a maritime tradition and therefore may pose an external threat to other nations? What is the prospect of the clash of ideologies not only in our country but in other countries in Asia? What do we intend to do about this? How about diplomatic relations with Russia? With Red China? With the other socialist countries?

Will there; be diversification of our products and diversification of our markets, and if so what are we doing about it? These are the questions that arise in the mind of a leader because certainly it will be a sad, sad thing if you and the succeeding generations will say that Marcos did not even think of this problem, when it was in his power to mold the beginning of a progressive policy. Well, I must tell you that as of now the developing countries still have the three major requirements for living — food, shelter, and clothing— as their principal problems. As of now, the Philippines is not any different. We must alter and change this obsession and this concern, we; must grow beyond this problem.

We need, therefore, to make projections, as I have said, so that we can relate the demands of the future to our own goals as a nation. We need, as well, to reformulate our goals, because we cannot wed old goals to new conditions.

For this purpose, as I said, I have established presidential commissions or study groups. One group of about 300 scholars have already submitted their studies and their recommendations, and they are “eye openers.” It is my hope that we will be able to get some of you to participate in these study groups in this projection, for I shall continue to call on specialists in the public and in the private sector, to look closely into the problems beyond the seventies. This nation can no longer move in the world with its traditional blinders. Without intellectual discipline and foresight, we will not be able to survive, much less progress.

But we cannot wait until such a staff or commission shall have submitted its report. We know now the problems of our cities, some of them. The second problem, next to pollution control, is pollution. What are we doing about it? Look at the Pasig River. I remember when I was young, I used to be a member of an outboard motorboat racers group, and we used to race down the Pasig River. I turned turtle right in front of Malacañang, or rather, just behind Malacañang. But the water was so clean that it was a pleasant swim to the river bank. Well, one of my cabinet members fell into the Pasig River sometime ago and he almost died, not from the effort of swimming to the shore but from the contaminated water.

Pollution is not true only of the Philippines, it is also true of Europe, of the United States. What was it that somebody said of Lake Erie in the United States? He said that if you fall into the Lake, into lake Erie, you do not get back to shore and you do not get dirty, you disintegrate.

And when we speak of pollution, we go into the problem of conservation. Some people have made fun of my obsession with conservation and indicted me for inviting General Lindbergh here to emphasize the need for conservation. But this is one of the problems not only of this decade, not only of the seventies, but of several decades to come up to the year 2000.

I have cancelled many forest concessions. I have set aside anywhere from 1 million to 2 million hectares of land so that they may not be touched by any commercial or industrial enterprise, and I have been attacked on this by critics who say that I am blind to the requirements of the modern world.

But my feeling is that pollution and conservation are the twin problems that go hand in hand with population control. This is going to be your problem when you become the leaders of government and even now as business leaders. When you make decisions you will be confronted by all these problems. The dangers of pollution are upon us; and they will get worse, they will affect the genetic future of Filipinos.

Now, the ecological balance is in danger and we must do something about it. If we are able to attend to this problem now it should not be through the obsolete vision of past plans but in the light of what shall happen 10 years from now.

Can you imagine, therefore, the difficulty of a leader when he is asked to put more funds into the effort to maintain the ecological balance? From the viewpoint of the great majority of our people this concern is not too urgent because they feel that the available money must go first to patrol cars or telecommunications facilities of the police, or arms for local policemen, or public works because the roads were destroyed in Casiguran, and things like that. You have a difficult decision right in front of you, and while you are making the decision nobody is helping. But that is why you are a leader because you are supposed to stand straight despite harassments from all sides, and while you are trying to maintain your equanimity, you must also have the presence of mind to solve present and future dangers.

The nature of social unrest has imperceptibly changed. The old dissidents were very much concerned about land and land reform. But we have now dissenters who question even the entire system, even as this system, unbeknownst to them is changing — and will even be more drastically changed, perhaps, in the next two years.

We decided sometime ago, when I was still President of the Senate in fact, on the adoption of the land reform code, that we must split the big haciendas, encomiendas, feudal estates. Well and good. We must give five hectares to each family; this is known as the family size plot. Well and good. That is to say, the idea was good about a generation ago, — or as late as 1950, let us say. Came the 1960s, and there were an average of five children among those who acquired land under land reform. And so the five hectares have to be subdivided among the five children, and each one gets one hectare for one family.

Now comes the following generation and there will be five more children, as per average. I have only three so I am below the average, I guess. But we are going to subdivide the one hectare all over again, and every new family will have one fifth of a hectare. So the entire system of land reform is under question now. And the immediate answer, of course, is cooperatives. I have always said that if any principle of socialism or communism is applicable to our people and to our situation and problems, let us adopt it, without adopting the political ideology of dictatorship, of godlessness, and even of an elite group ruling our society without elections, and which rely on violence as the only instrument of change and reform. Let us adopt those that fit our requirements. We are now experimenting with cooperative farming, as you may have noted.

You see, therefore, the changes in almost every new decade. The educational system has changed while our backs were turned to our problems. School boys and girls are no longer naive trusters in the future, they want to make their own future and I don't blame them. I was interviewed sometime yesterday and I was asked, how do you feel towards these demonstrators? And I said, I feel friendly towards them because not too long ago I led some demonstrators from the University of the Philippines myself. I was also a demonstrator and I know their feelings. I realize the urgency of attending to their requirements because they believe they are right. And maybe they are right. We have to listen to them no matter how radical they are. We must listen to them provided that they do not use violence. They will find in me a collaborator in the effort to make a better Philippines.

Now, what are the consequences of these changes? The consequences of these changes, of these developments, to future leadership are shattering now.

There is the rapid obsolescence of ideas — even moral sentiments. Slowly the world is turning into an open society. I will not talk of Copenhagen, Stockholm, Amsterdam or London, or pornography or the new standards in art. Although we don't see very much art in it, it is there. And no matter how you try to stop it, it is coming. As I said, there is a rapid obsolescence of ideas — of moral sentiments, of standards. Of course, we will try to maintain our old values. And at the same time, try to sympathize and understand the new developments. How many development economics ideas have come and gone in the last 10 years? Apart from the fact that economic systems are not pure and have cultural undertones, the strategies of a decade ago are not so useful now as they were then. Old visions of national frontiers gave way to new exigencies. Who would have believed, for example, two years ago that West Germany would sign a non-aggression pact with Russia? But they did, they just did and with this single action, the very nature and complexion of European politics completely changed.

What about our own politics, domestic as well as international? It has been said that the perceptions of many politicians are so many years behind actual realities. I am rather inclined to agree with this. Frankly, we hear the same hoary protestations against taxes, the same platitudes about government expenditures and operations and the same ancient platforms withered by time.

Only now are we witnessing the integration of politics with social policy, and this a new development. The National Social Action Council, to name but one example, is a triad of effort between the ecumenical church, the civic sector, and the government. Who would have imagined that this could be possible during our time? We have begun to realize that the survival of society, its progress, depends on collective effort, on a plurality of leadership, rather than a single center, which tells people what to do.

With the obsolescence of ideas naturally goes the traditional concepts of leadership. The criteria now surmount administrative or legal abilities but are more emphatic on vision, on energy, and the charisma to transmute ideas and programs into reality. Social status, political heritage, will not be the main issues in the late seventies and beyond — but the capacity to make people move forward and towards goals which they themselves have set.

How about the church? Well, you now have church ecumenism. We are not far from political ecumenism. Now, let this not be misconstrued again. Some people might misread this to say that Marcos has prophesied that democracy and communism will get together, and that in the Philippines there will be both communism and democracy. I did not say that. I say that in the future more and more, if man is to survive, there will be political ecumenism. And I refer to the future, the long future, the seventies and beyond.

The challenge before us, therefore, is a challenge, I would say, to intelligence and imagination. It is not our difficulties, whether in resources or anything, that will cripple us—but the way we view our difficulties. Of course, all resources are scarce; they will always be scarce in a developing society. The difference lies in the choice of priorities. And in the ingenuity of the people and leadership. But above all things is the mental picture that we have of the society that we hope to bring about in our world, in our region, and in our country.

Our reformists do not have a clear picture of the society they want. Because that is the very nature of reform. They do not go beyond the slogans of equal opportunity, equal rights, because, as I said, we have failed in the longer projections. Let us help them, let us help the reformists. Let us help them project the future, and perhaps prepare for them a vision of what they want and what perhaps we want as well. There should be goals and there should be progress. We need to be more specific; we need to make our vision operational.

Discussion, my friends, is only useful when it leads to public education. It is, therefore, imperative that we develop the intelligence of our people, their imagination, heighten their imaginative ingenuity and their self-discipline, so that they can understand fully the implications of the challenge.

The challenge says that we must often do two or more things at the same time; never have we been challenged with this before; always in the past we have been asked to consider one thing at a time, and we found out that was the secret of achievement. But now and in the future, we shall be compelled to do three things at a time. The challenge is simultaneous. First-things-first was effective as a policy in a stable world; in a changing world, the challenge is many-headed and I repeat, simultaneous. We will be fighting on many fronts. We must learn to do so now, not tomorrow, not in the future, but now. If we cannot cope with this situation, if a leadership cannot emerge capable of making us cope with it, then I must say that we shall merely drift as a nation, no better than a man who lives a hand-to-mouth existence in a neighborhood that is affluent.

And that is the difficulty in a democracy. Because in a democracy, everyone must be heard. And while you are fighting on many fronts there will be many others who will call attention to other fronts, and while you are hard-pressed in a crisis, other crises will be created by those who do not wish you well. But this is the very meaning of democracy.

So now, we must work, we must study. We must understand our world. I ask you, the new leaders, to understand your government, your community, to understand yourselves because, my friends, this is, and I repeat, the very start of the projections for the late '70's and '80's of which I have spoken.

We must begin to understand the world in which we live, the new ideas, the new values, the new concepts, the new initiatives. To misunderstand them is to completely fail. I trust that you, the Jaycees, will lead in understanding this new world.

Address of President Marcos at the 5th Anniversary Program of "Let's Talk Business", October 21, 1970

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 5th Anniversary Program of "Let's Talk Business"

[Delivered on October 21, 1970]

Let's Talk Progress

I CONGRATULATE THOSE who have initiated "Let's Talk Business." I have always regarded your group as a brave little company because, like all those who deal with prognostications and projections you must think and act with courage. In an unpredictable and unstable area like economics, there is constant need for such boldness, matched of course by an equal measure of knowledge and expertise.

I think it especially propitious that I should have this opportunity to discuss our economic prospects and the remaining problems we must face. Many salient phases and problems of our economic development you have already discussed on your various programs, and if instant solutions were not actually perfected here, at least we gained some perspective by examining our problems and our directions, our initiatives and our present situation. I hope that tonight, we have been able to do this and that I shall be able to provide further light by way of this short talk.

Perhaps the question that should be asked is, where is the Philippines today? Where are we in this first year of the new decade of the 70's?

While it is too early to evaluate fully the efficacy of the measures we have taken to counteract the balance of payments pressures which had been mounting through the years since even before I became President, a comparison of the country's external debt structure as of June 30 this year and that of a year ago gives some favorable indications. For whereas last year, of a total loan outstanding of $1,480 million, short-term borrowings accounted for 42 per cent, this year, of a total outstanding loan of $1,880 million, short-term obligations accounted for only 17 per cent. We hope to be able to attend to this 17 per cent.

This indicates the soundness of our new attitudes to the development process. For one thing, in the first half of the sixties, from 1960 to 1965, the government chose to retire the debt that it had previously contracted, instead of contracting long-term obligations. As a result, the trade deficit in some years was even compounded by net outflows in the capital account. This was an impossible situation. No country in the world has an infinite supply of international reserves; yet we had to finance not only the excess of imports over exports but also the net outflows of capital.

In contrast, today we accept as a matter of principle that trade deficits are inevitable during the development process. This is true not only in the Philippines, it is true in every developing country. These trade deficits, however, need to be financed. And since these deficits generally represent investments on projects which have a long gestation period, their financing is normally achieved through the inflow of long-term capital.

You are of course familiar with the exchange reform and stabilization program which have impressed the monetary authorities outside of our country. We shall not talk of them tonight therefore.

But let me say, however, that the resulting foreign trade picture for the first half of 1970 is quite satisfactory. International reserves, $165 million at mid-year 1969 and $126 million at year's end, were up to $210 million in 3 mid-year 1970. This was largely due to the favorable developments in merchandise trade. While import payments fell from $575 million in the first half of 1969 to $534 million in the first half of this year, export receipts increased from $441 million to $515 million.

Consequently, the trade gap, $134 million last year, was reduced to only $19 million this year. And as I have already stated we have projected, and we expect on the basis of performance in the past several months, a surplus of $35 million at the end of December this year.

Now, on credit restrictions. We have been talking here of money in circulation. What has been the effect on the money supply, by credit restrictions?

The net effect of the measures we adopted was a contraction of money supply by P122.5 million from the end of 1969 to the middle of 1970 for the period of six months. I repeat we contracted the money supply by P122.5 million. Now, this may not be acceptable to Mr. Cabarruz and the rest of the big money group, but this is what has happened.

The first semester of this year was similarly characterized by fiscal restraint, so that while government cash operations for the first semester of FY 1969 yielded a deficit of P89 million, transactions during the first half of this year, the first half of 1970, did not end in a deficit but with surplus of P92 million. This reversion resulted not only from the moderation in expenditures but also from the increase in revenues derived from new taxes and better tax administration.

At this point, I wish to call your attention to an important empirical truth in our economic life. This is, that as the development process gets under way, the demand for infrastructure facilities is greatly intensified. At the same time, higher incomes, the increasing complexity of the economic and social environment, and the spread of popular education bring to bear increased demands for government expenditures.

Now, if all of these demands by the times should be financed, there would be a need to increase the proportion of government revenue to total national incomes. It is in recognition of this need that, in recent years, serious efforts were made not only to broaden the tax base through new tax measures but also to improve the efficiency of the tax collection machinery. Consequently, while in FY 1969 the ratio of government revenue to GNP was 8.4 per cent, the ratio, in FY 1969 was up 9.4 per cent.

Now, we still are not contented with this; we hope to be able to increase this. We have been thinking in terms of 12 per cent, as in other countries, but we are still a little way to go.

For this reason, this Administration has opted for the alternative of rapid growth through a budget deficit against the alternative of stagnation under a sterile but allegedly balanced budget, a budget that may consist of nothing but salaries for government employees. We feel that the government should borrow, but it should borrow principally for such, capital expenditures like irrigation systems, hydro-electric projects, roads, piers, airfields, warehouses, factories, ships and the like; otherwise the country will stagnate. In the past four years, capital expenditures grew at an average rate of 34 per cent per year. Current expenditures, in the meantime that we have been holding back, grew by 14.5 per cent per year. Furthermore, under the capital account, expenditures for economic development predominated throughout, maintaining an average ratio of 0.64. Under the current account, on the other hand, economic development expenditures recorded the biggest increases, running at an annual average rate of 23.6 per cent.

There is a current feeling that I am spending or we are spending too much on the Armed Forces. I would like to inform you that according to the records, we have been able to reduce expenditures of our Armed Forces from 17 per cent to 14 per cent of the budget.

In FY 1969, had we chosen to move sluggishly towards the already long delayed fulfillment of our growth aspirations, we would have continued to live in the false comfort of excessive caution and timidity. Instead, we faced up to the realities of our economic situation and acted accordingly. Those who would not sympathize with our aims or who could not bear to see the government succeed for whatever reason have sought to sketch a dark picture of the deficit spending that a full-size development program has made inevitable in the meantime that adequate sources of revenue do not exist. But this was a decision which government had to make as soon as I became President and I hope that on your part you will comprehend the requirements that we have had to fulfill.

In 1969, as you probably know, our economic goals necessitated a recourse to borrowing to bridge the financial gap. What was this gap? This gap amounted to P750 million, which was occasioned by expenditures for projects of a most needful and indispensable nature. Here in Manila and in other centers of population the question is often asked, "My God what deficit spending! Where did it all go?" I wish some of our people here in Manila would go around the country, would travel on the roads we have built, count the school houses, the hospitals, the irrigation systems, the hydroelectric systems for these are where we have spent this money.

When I was still a Congressman I used to make very interesting studies on how much a president averages in expenditure per province. I discovered that most presidents averaged 5 million per province during their entire four-year terms. Five million per province. Now, let us go to Bulacan or Rizal, and let us start with Bulacan, the smaller province. Do you know how much we spent in Bulacan in four years? We spent P400 million, and yet so many people here in Manila ask me, where did the money go? As if the public officers were running away with the money box of the treasury.

No, we have been spending this for what we feel are priority projects. Now, we may differ about what our priority projects should be, but certainly we all agree that we have to start spending on economic projects or we will stagnate. I agree with you though that we must spend on productive enterprises. Now, even that term productive enterprises has been the subject of long and serious and intense debate not only in the planning group but also in Congress.

These projects, for instance, that we have been talking about may include the Philippine-Japan Friendship Highway and the establishment and maintenance of more schools. I need not repeat here that we were, able to put up about 90,000 school rooms in four years. And that project does not amount to just small money. Also we spent on the construction of bridges, such as the one we built across the Cagayan River. Did you know that before I became President, there was not a single bridge across the entire length of the Cagayan River? And that whenever there was shortage of rice on the eastern side of the Cagayan River, there was a surplus of rice on the western side of the same river? This was so because rice could not be transported across to the other side since there was no bridge. We are now building several bridges over and across the Cagayan River, and across many rivers of our country.

We have also financed more power and irrigation projects and flood control facilities, but at the same time we have provided the necessary peso counterpart for necessary dollar borrowings. Calamities got their own share of our [increased expenditures.

Oh, yes, I have been asked, how has the series of typhoons affected the projections? The sugar people tell me that the projection for the industry should probably decrease by not more than 5 per cent, but the copra people in some provinces are worried. Catanduanes industry is completely wiped out so far as copra production is concerned. And abaca in the Bicol provinces, they say, has been greatly affected, but the other provinces were not as seriously affected as we had thought. So, this is our situation.

What of the years ahead?

In order to generate further investment activity, the bulk of public capital expenditures shall be concentrated on the continued provision of infrastructure and other social overhead facilities. We cannot lose the momentum now.

In this respect, the rural electrification program has high priority. At present, only 7.5 million of our entire population variously estimated from 37 million to 39 million, enjoy the benefits of electricity. Of this number, four million live in Manila, two million in other urban areas, and only 1.5 million in rural areas. This means that in the farms and barrios only one out of every 16 families enjoys the benefits of electricity.

The importance of electrification and our competence to provide it have been recognized even abroad. Only recently, favorable endorsement of our rural electrification program was secured from English and American bankers and financiers. Of course, some people have asked why the First Lady intervened in this offer. Now, let us see what her intervention was. She was asked what the Philippines needed, and you know she and I keep conversing about these things, and she is pretty well versed on the needs of our country, as well as I am. And so she pointed out frankly that one of the primary requirements and needs of our economy was electrification, and that is why she was asked to all these conferences on projects on electrification.

What are the other areas where we should undertake greater effort? Of course, these areas will include, and you have brought this out here, export encouragement, industrialization, population control, and control of our environment which includes such things as conservation and anti-pollution measures.

In earlier days the higher rate of population growth was perfectly consistent with economic progress. However, times have changed. Resources have in general become scarce relative to population and must now be efficiently allocated. And that is why more and more we refer to the planning group all the request for allocation of resources. This is galling in a way, yes, we admit that, and sometimes it may be prejudicial to specific areas of economic activity. But there is no other way of working out the development of our country.

We shall also devote increased effort to the formation and support of agricultural cooperatives. The remaining requirements of the land reform program must be met with increased means and energy. The program to distribute free medicines in areas where they are most needed will be intensified. The manpower program; the upgrading and expansion of education where we would like to see our high school graduates capable of entering industry with the skills to earn a living, the increase in the salaries of teachers, the resumption of the infrastructure development — these and more will call for great public investments. We cannot, where we are now, ignore these requirements without sliding back to the poverty and frustrations, and what is more, the tyranny of inaction that characterized our past. We broke away from these more than five years ago. We cannot go back to them.

Private investment, on the other hand, shall continue to be induced into those areas that are considered economically desirable, as set out in the Priorities Plan of the Board of Investments, considering employment generated, foreign exchange earned or saved, the extent of the use of domestic resources, and the existence of forward and backward linkages.

I think it is now fairly well established that the prospects of growth and progress in our country are considerable, even — or perhaps especially — in the eyes of foreign observers. As one New York banker informed the monetary authorities, perhaps foreigners have even greater confidence and trust in our future than we have ourselves. You are probably aware of the favorable reaction of the international community that met in Paris earlier this month as well as the meeting in Manila under the sponsorship of UNIDO/ECAFE investors with Filipino entrepreneurs in need of capital, to the efforts of our government in economic development. Taking due recognition of the impressive progress that has already been made by us, the consultative group came to the agreement that the present financial difficulties, and I quote verbatim, the present financial difficulties could be overcome within a short period. As a token of confidence in the capacity of our economy for accelerated growth, most of the countries represented in Paris expressed support of the World Bank whether on the proposal to form a consultative group for the Philippines or on a bilateral basis with the Philippines.

This is an opportunity for me to say that most of the credit for our progress and for the confidence we have developed abroad in our economy belongs not to any special group but to our own people. Their understanding and cooperation, their willingness to think in terms of our large goals and to forego small immediate comforts, and their trust in the competence and dedication of their chosen leaders — all these have been essential, and will continue to be essential in the years ahead.

I have no doubt that the application of these moral and spiritual qualities upon a vast potential of our country, itself already partly fulfilled, will produce that degree of national transformation that is the highest aim of all our thoughts and deeds. And I am certain that the discussions in the programs of “Let’s Talk Business” have aided in establishing this confidence and this trust.

I congratulate again all those who had had anything to do with and have participated in “Let’s Talk Business” on the program’s 5th anniversary.

Speech of President Marcos at the Kick-Off Ceremonies of National Education and Fund Campaign of the League of Puericulture Centers, November 16, 1970

Speech
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Kick-Off Ceremonies of National Education and Fund Campaign of the League of Puericulture Centers

[Delivered at Malacañang Palace, November 16, 1970]

Defusing the Population Bomb

TO SHOW THAT we are supporting the puericulture centers, as are the other leaders here present, may I ask the First Lady to hand over our personal contribution to the puericulture national and educational and fund campaign.

I have just contributed a thousand pesos. The national government is contributing to the puericulture centers about P721.800 every year. And this year we will increase this contribution to the puericulture centers. It is quite true that the puericulture centers now constitute a permanent institution in our life. Fifty seven years ago, the first puericulture center was established. May I note, before was born. Since then the puericulture center has metamorphosed from conventional health center into a multi-purpose institution, and to an active agent of community development.

The puericulture centers are the clinics of the poor. By and large, the centers attend not only to maternity cases, as they were originally intended to do, but also provide general medical attention. This explains why the masses of our rural region regard the puericulture center as an important part of their lives. Now, you know why the First Lady and I are always here with you. Of course, the First Lady and I are always together whatever maybe the problems that we are facing.

But the reason we have taken these puericulture centers under our wing, as it were, is the fact that we, more than anybody else, realize the important role the puericulture center plays in the lives of our poor people, the disadvantaged elements of our society. Of course, the old puericulture centers have been further revitalized by the organization of the National League of Puericulture Centers which now sponsors this yearly program. It is a recognition of the role played by these institutions in our country that I have included puericulture centers in the major programs of our government since in fact I assumed office in 1966. In the health program, there are special or specific programs like, To Save a Life in Every Barrio which is under the supervision of the First Lady because it is a social welfare program. And puericulture centers play a major role in this endeavor.

In our miracle rice production program and in the home gardening or vegetable production program, among others, we have also harnessed the puericulture centers. Now, when I created the Population Commission sometime ago, before the election, before the 1969 elections — I was advised against tackling the population control problem before the elections because they said this was politically explosive and therefore I should not commit myself one way or the other before the elections — despite the study made by the leaders and their advice, I took a gamble because I realized that our people have strength and foresight, and so I went before the people, before the electorate and I said, the population problem is a problem that we must face now. We cannot delay facing up to it and any candidate for President or for any national office must take a stand on the population control problem.

I then appointed the head of the League of Puericulture Centers as a member, one of the leading members of the Commission on Population. I also appointed Bishop Gaviola to the Commission, to represent the hierarchy. Bishop Gaviola, the Secretary General of the Catholic Church, and I were taken aback when we saw the resolution being prepared; we were taken t aback because we felt that there might be opposition from the members of the Church hierarchy considering that the resolution adopted by the Population Commission left to the individual conscience the matter of determining what method may be adopted in family planning, whether the artificial or the natural method. And, as you know, these are quite controversial. But Monsignor Gaviola was in the Population Commission and he approved the resolution, and so did the members of the hierarchy of the Church whom I also consulted. And because of this, we went full force into the Population Control Program.

Today, the puericulture center movement has 802 centers while the Population Center League has 802 members. There are 1,400 municipalities or towns in the Philippines. There are also 1,400 rural health units, and, as you all know, of course, before I came to the Presidency, there were only about 300 complete rural health units. When I conducted a survey in 1966, I discovered that 60 per cent of the population of such regions in Mindanao and the Visayas and the Mt. Province never saw a doctor. Yes, 60 per cent of those who died in 1965 and 1966 had never seen a doctor or a nurse in their whole lives.

And so here was a country and a people, ostensibly living in a civilized society, in a progressive state and democracy, yet 60 per cent of those among the people who had died had never seen a doctor or a nurse.

We therefore looked around to check how we could supplement the medical and health efforts of government. It was touch and go for a while because there were many who thought that the public health program was a little too ambitious. To put one rural health unit in every municipality, they said, would bankrupt the government, but we went ahead. And now when they ask me where a lot of the money spent by the government went, I point to the rural health units, to the doctors and nurses, to the dentists and the midwives, and to the puericulture centers, to the PACD, all the health facilities and services which have gone into the rural areas. In many parts of the country today, the puericulture center has preempted or taken the place of government in helping the medically indigent.

We are now about to start the medicare program which is at the core a program for the medically indigent. We are just waiting for the time when we can gather enough resources. Commissioner Sychangco is here. Commissioner Sychangco has grown old from raising funds for the programs of our government.

My dream and my goal is to see a puericulture center established in all parts, in all centers of population, of the Philippines. That means you still have 600 centers to go, that you will need 600 more before you will have a puericulture center in every municipality of the Philippines.

And while I am President, I will extend you all available help and support in order that you can attain this goal.

One of my proposals to Congress was for government aid to the puericulture centers, and this bill was introduced by Congressman Sanchez sometime ago, but you know we were facing so many urgent problems then as now, so the bill did not go through. It was proposed that P6,000 be given as aid to every puericulture center without a maternity unit, and P8,000 to every puericulture center with a maternity unit.

When the Congress will consider this I do not really know, but perhaps you can exert pressure on the members of the House and the Senate, especially the latter. Maybe they do not realize the importance of the puericulture centers in the provinces, but you and I know. Our people depend on you, on the puericulture centers and we must persist, patiently perhaps but unremittingly in pushing through this bill so that we can get enough funds for this particular program.

I need not go into the unselfish manner by which you have obtained help for the puericulture centers. Most of those who are working for you are volunteer workers, I believe. Do you still have volunteer workers in the puericulture centers? Yes, well most of you realize that this is the highest form of cooperative action that we have in our country. These workers are a diverse lot, and they are well spread all over the nation. You have extended help not only to the health program, but also to the Community Development Program, my Presidential Arm for Community Development. And your success in reducing infant mortality alone is already a monument to your work. But then you see by helping to reduce infant mortality you have also created another problem, and this problem is population explosion.

Before I go any further, may I acknowledge the aid that has been given by the USAID to 164 puericulture centers.

We are grateful for this help given to those 164 puericulture centers, and I understand that this financial assistance has boosted significantly your in-service training and family planning program.

I have been informed that you have had some modest success as well in promoting family planning among our people. And perhaps it is now time for these 802 puericulture centers throughout the country to get involved in solving one of the most crucial human problems of our time — population explosion.

It is my plan that we shall harness not only the government offices and personnel to the program pertaining to population control, not only the health worker, but also the teachers and other personnel of the Department of Education, the Community Development, the Agricultural Productivity Commission, and all local officials, from governors down to the capitan del barrio, because our problem, this problem is also their problem.

The problem of runaway population growth is frighteningly real. We are multiplying at a rate which our pace of economic development cannot sustain.

The statistics are familiar to you. The average Filipina bears six children. I have only three so far. Two babies are born every minute. The average population growth ranges from 3.2 to 3.5 per cent or an increase of 1 million Filipinos every year. At the end of this day, some 3,200 babies shall have been born throughout the country.

Our population grows at more than 50 per cent of the world average. Our population right now is a little over 37 million. By 1980 or roughly nine years from now, it is expected to re-explode to 51.4 million, 69.8 million by 1990, and 110 million in the year 2000 or thirty years from now.

Roughly this means that we have to feed, clothe, house and provide jobs for Filipinos on a radically wider scale than we are doing now.

And we must meet our present backlog in these areas which is already tremendous. To provide for the needs of the succeeding generations requires no less than an overnight success in our efforts at economic and social development.

Of course, it is tempting to remain complacent and fold our hands and say, that is not our problem, that is the problem of the President in 1980, or the President in 1990, the President in 2000, because the terrifying consequence of population explosion will come in the future. We don't perhaps feel it too much now, but the world of the future is your world too because it is the world of your children.

It has fallen, too, upon this generation and upon this leadership now, not tomorrow but now, to act decisively on this grave issue. We are called upon to alter a course of destiny which the future generations would have no way of coping with. We are asked to secure for our children a better quality of life.

Knowing all these projects and the probabilities in the next 20,30 years, we cannot ignore this challenge without being recreant in our moral responsibility to safeguard our civilization. To do so would be an act of cowardice no less for this question is not merely a matter of comfort, it is a matter of security, of national security.

We are actually feeling now the effects of a vigorous population growth. The slum colonies, the competition for jobs, traffic jams, criminality, the increasing demand for public services — these are manifestations of the stresses created by population explosion.

Of course, we are accelerating our effort at development to confront this issue. Economic growth has increased tremendously in the past four years. Total food production is up. Our manpower and youth development program has buoyed up employment opportunities. Our industries continue to grow. There will be no stepping back in our drive towards a more affording society.

But to be realistic about it, we do not now have the capability to meet the requirements of our present rate of population growth. It is a race that can be won only over a long period of time. And we must begin now.

Another thing to consider is that even if we institute population control measures right now, this minute, we will not see the results until after about 15 to 20 years. Population control takes time. And time may be running out on us.

In our country, the consequences of the population problem afflict not the rich and the middle class but the already teeming poor.

It is the poor who bear the burdens imposed by population explosion. It is the poor who are likely to reap the Malthusian after-effects of uncontrolled population growth in the years to come. It is the poor who suffer and there are a great many of them in our country. And a suffering poor means an unstable society and an unstable society means a threat to all, even to the rich and to the middle class. And, therefore, I call upon every segment of our population every sector of our society, to support this program.

The prosecution of a family planning program in the Philippines must be taken in the context of our economic situation. The poor need not suffer because of lack of information or assistance in family planning.

Our present program calls for the dissemination of knowledge and the provision of facilities for scientific family planning.

Now, I wish to state that it is not the purpose of government, or of the government leadership, to impose birth control measures on the citizens and to make family planning a compulsory policy. No, far from it.

Such a decisive step must be left to the judgment and conscience of the individual, as the resolution of the Population Commission says or states. Our concern is to impress on the people the urgent need for controlling the population. And this is the information program, in which all of us must participate. Everyone, everyone who realizes this problem will become an active agent of population control. And if we can, we shall see to it that every citizen will receive information on the urgency of action on this problem.

There is a moral dimension to this issue of course. In the end, family planning is a matter of choice. And I have reason to believe that our people would choose to have and to raise children in an atmosphere that assures them a decent and relatively comfortable life.

Family planning, in the main, calls for a higher form of discipline. It is an assertion of the will, an exercise of our right to shape our destiny, to dictate the quality of our individual and national life.

I am pleased to acknowledge now, formally the participation of the National League of Puericulture Centers in this great endeavor. We should now increase our financial and material assistance to these centers not only to promote family planning but to help them expand all their services.

I am also pleased to acknowledge the participation of the private sector, presented here by some of our prominent leaders in business and of the of the various churches in our efforts to promote family planning. The writing on the wall is too stark for us to miss it. Briefly, the message is that rapid population growth is a bomb that must be defused. And we can defuse it. We can defuse it acting now. We must, therefore, act today. It is my hope that you will spread this message to every municipality, to every area of our country. I know the role you play in the local community. I know the role played by the puericulture alters. Most of the mothers come to you, indeed most of the members of families come to you for advice. I ask you, therefore, to get together with all the leaders of your community, the teachers, the government men, and spread the word that we must now engage in population control. We will leave to the individual the right of choice on the means he will use, but he must do something about it. I repeat, this is something which is crucial to our country and to our people. Yes, we will be engaged apparently by other urgent problems, but this problem which every right thinking man must think of today. It is a problem that can be easily staved off, it is a problem which perhaps you and I could easily keep away, from which we can stay away. It is a responsibility we need not bear on our shoulders, because we tell ourselves it is after all something which neither our children nor we ourselves feel now. But heaven forbid that our children should ever curse us in the future, 15 to 20 years from now, for, having failed to take any step whatsoever to solve this problem, when we could have solved it by initiating the steps that would defuse this bomb.

And so I urge each and everyone of you to adopt this program as your primary program in the next several years. I repeat, while I am President this will be one of the principal programs of the national government.

Address of President Marcos at the Fourth General Assembly and Third Asian Congress of Pharmaceutical Sciences, November 17, 1970

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Fourth General Assembly and Third Asian Congress of Pharmaceutical Sciences

[Delivered at the Philamlife Auditorium, November 17, 1970]

Health Problems in Asia

I AM VERY glad that I came to this assembly. Indeed there are about 6,000 pharmacists in the Philippines. I do not know how this compares with other countries but it seems to me that pharmacists outnumber even our lawyers in this country. I have always said that if there are any people to be exported we should start with the lawyers and the politicians, and I do not mean those in the political opposition either.

I am impressed by the unity of the profession demonstrated here today. I gather that this is the Fourth Assembly and the Third Asian Congress of Pharmaceutical Sciences under the auspices of the Federation of Asian Pharmaceutical Associations, which was organized in 1964.

Permit me to welcome the delegates who have come from other lands. I am glad that you came here after the typhoons and the floods, but if you come from other Asian countries, then you must realize and understand that this is a natural phenomenon over which we do not have control. Now the weather is a little better and I do hope that you will feel at home and that your brief stay here will be both pleasant and fruitful. And I am certain that with the congeniality demonstrated in the opening ceremonies, it cannot be anything else but fruitful and pleasant.

I am gratified to note that the theme of this conference is Asian Unity through Pharmacy. In a region of diverse cultures, historical backgrounds, and racial temperaments, unity in this very diversity is our goal. It is your goal in pharmacy, it is our goal in government, the goal of our ideology and statesmanship. This congress and assembly is itself a very laudable contribution to this goal, coming as it does from a highly specialized sector of the regional community, the pharmaceutical profession in Asia.

I note in your brochures that you are particularly interested in the establishment of uniform regulations on drug and food additives in Asia, fair practices in drug and food trading, and the protection and improvement of the health of all Asians. Towards those specific ends and the other objectives that you wish to achieve through regional cooperation, it is my pleasure today to come to you and say, I pledge wholeheartedly the support of the Philippine government. While I am President, you can rely on the cooperations that shall be extended by every office and agency of the national and local governments of the Republic of the Philippines. It has been said that statesmen and leaders, leaders of government and heads of state, do indeed want unity in this world. Only a fool, a hopeless fool seeks dissent and disunity or seeks to wage war. The active conference tables all over the world are proof and evidence of the efforts of state leaders, of government heads, to bring about the oneness of men and of humanity. But while man has succeeded in pushing beyond the known frontiers of natural science, political science has lagged behind. The human element has been an almost unconquerable obstacle in the search for unity among men.

It is my hope that where the statesmen and the government leaders have failed, you who are committed to science, you who are engaged in pushing forward the scientific frontiers for the well-being of man, individually and as nations, will succeed as individuals and as an association in this endeavor.

Inasmuch as you are interested in the protection and improvement of the health of Asians, and I daresay of the health of all men throughout the world, permit me to give to you an idea of the health picture in the Philippines.

Since the turn of the century the people of the Philippines have slowly but progressively improved their level of health as a result of a number of factors which include: (1) the continued interest and support of the government in the prosecution and promotion of the health of the people, (2) the more active cooperation and participation on the part of the population, (3) the application of developments in the medical and para-medical sciences, and (4) the contribution of international cooperation in the global fight to control if not eradicate human disease.

This progress in the state of health of the people may be seen in the following changes:

1. The expectation of life at birth of Filipinos increased from a little more than 25 years in 1918 to slightly more than 55 years in the 1965-69 period.
2. Reported deaths from all causes per 1000 population decreased from about 20 in 1920 to 7.0 in 1967. From 1950 to 1967 deaths from all causes per 1000 population decreased from 11.1 to 7.0 or about 37 per cent decrease.
3. Reported infant deaths from all causes per 1000 live births decreased from about 160 in 1926 to about 65 in 1967. During the period from 1950 to 1967 the infant death rate decreased from 101.6 infant deaths from all causes per 1000 live births to 65.2 or a decrease of about 36 per cent.
4. Significant decreases in mortality from specific diseases such as pneumonia, tuberculosis, and malaria have also been reported in scientific data and journals.

On the basis of all these significant developments, the population of the Philippines increased from 7.6 million in 1903 to about 37.1 million in 1967 or nearly a 5-fold increase in 66 years. Because of the improvement of health conditions, every minute in the Philippines two babies are born alive and kept alive. Every day 3200 babies are born in the Philippines. The average number of children per family, believe it or not, is six children. Every year there is an increase in our population by 1 million. Because of this explosive population growth, one of the highest in the world, the Filipino people are faced with the problem of controlling the birth rate to a level that cannot be supported by our resources. It is easy for us to be complacent, we who belong to my generation, because we shall not feel the painful impact of this population explosion today; but 15 to 20 years from now our children will.

The population of the Philippines increases by about one million new Filipinos every year, representing a growth rate of 3.5 per cent. It is beginning to be realized that the high population growth rate makes attempts to improve the living standards of the population almost impossible. Under my administration our goal has been to build 400,000 houses every year. We have not been able to accomplish this and yet with this increase in population we will have to double and treble the rate of construction of dwellings for our people.

It is perhaps also worth noting that while reported deaths with medical attention increased from 32 per cent in 1960 to 46 per cent in 1967, the fact remains that nearly 50 per cent of reported deaths did not have the benefit of medical attendance before I became President, indicating that progress in medical sciences failed to reach these individuals in their hour of need. When I first became President about six years ago, I conducted a survey and these figures came out. They are specially true in the rural areas of the Philippines. This was the reason for the reorganization of the health department of the government. Before I became President, there were only about 300 rural health units, that is, complete rural health units. Now, there are 1,400 rural health units or one rural health unit with a doctor, a nurse, a midwife and a dentist for every municipality, for the 1,400 municipalities or towns in the country. And if you think that it was an easy job to do, I hope to see you try it.

The irony here is that while the Philippines has a relatively satisfactory ratio of population to health manpower there is apparent maldistribution of doctors, dentists, pharmacists, nurses, midwives, and sanitary inspectors all over the country. Our professionals tend to practice in the urban centers leaving the countryside largely untended. This situation is complicated by the steady exodus of our health manpower to other countries, particularly the United States.

Measures are of course now being taken to regulate the outflow of Filipino professionals who are needed here. There is also a definite need to make the training in our medical and para-medical schools relevant to our needs. In this respect perhaps I should say that the training should be relevant not only to the Philippines but to other parts of Asia in this day and age of regional cooperation and exchange.

In the face of all these developments, you may be interested in what the Philippine government is doing. The improvement of health services for the people, especially for those in the rural communities, is a principal program of my administration, as I have already indicated.

We have a program providing free medicines to the indigent population, we have, as I said, established rural health units and nutrition centers. We have encouraged volunteer work from all sectors of the community. Yesterday, participated in the fund campaign of the League of Puericulture Centers, of which there are 802 throughout the country. It is a purely voluntary service, it is voluntary work undertaken by the private sector, usually initiated and established by the women's club in every municipality and community.

We are now engaged in an information campaign not just for the people in the rural areas, but for the entire populace, a campaign to promote health consciousness through education.

We are instituting a more systematic and comprehensive health planning at the municipal, provincial, regional and national levels consistent with the policy of greater autonomy for the local governments and in the context of our national development planning.

These notes on the health situation in the Philippines may be useful to you who are concerned not only with the specific requirements of the pharmaceutical profession in Asia but with the related and over-all aspects of health in this country and in your countries and in all the Asian countries.

Incidentally, I remember being berated and severely criticized for distributing free medicines, through what was called Marcos Pharmaceutical Kits, throughout the country sometime ago. It started in 1967 and went on through 1968, and when the elections in 1969 came up and the distribution went on, everybody thought that it was a campaign gimmick. Well, the elections are over and we are still distributing medicines free to the medically indigent, and the Marcos Pharmaceutical Kit is still in great demand.

Now it is hoped that government will be able to coordinate with the pharmacists in the different municipalities in making medicines available to the people. I have hoped for this since my attention was called to the fact that the sales of local pharmacists have allegedly gone down when I started distributing free medicine. I am going to order the Secretary of Health, and I am in fact ordering him now, to get together with the heads of the pharmacist associations, and find the means of preventing any adverse effects on local pharmacies arising from the activities of the government in the health field.

There is much to be done and much to be achieved when professionals and scientists in the same field but from many diverse countries come together I am impressed by your objectives. I am impressed by the resolutions on the formulation of policies regarding Pan-Asiatic Drug regulation, pharmaceutical education and research in Asia, publication of an Asian Formulary, drug information, and drug marketing in this region. I welcome your special emphasis on drug information and drug marketing, because there is a growing problem of drug addiction among the juveniles in this country and in other countries. We are now waging a campaign against drug addiction, a campaign directed not only to the students themselves but to their parents as well, and I ask you to cooperate in this campaign.

I wish you success in all your undertaking, and I trust that in the event at there should be any need for cooperation at my level or at any other level in government., you will not hesitate to come to me. I invite the President of the Asian Federation of Pharmaceutical Associations, Doctor Taningco, to come to the Palace any time on any matter which may be of importance to you and which should be taken up with the President.

It is my hope that by thus giving assistance to you, we also give assistance to your efforts to establish unity here in Asia. And, again, I say, and I mean this sincerely, it is my hope that you as scientists in this region will succeed where apparently the statesmen, the leaders of state and government have failed. And may God go with you.

Message of President Marcos during the Papal Visit in the University of Santo Tomas, November 27, 1970

Message
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
During the Papal Visit in the University of Santo Tomas

[Delivered at University of Santo Tomas, November 27, 1970]

I am happy to join the officials, faculty and students of the University of Santo Tomas in welcoming to their campus His Holiness, Pope Paul VI, on his visit to the university, an occasion which should certainly become part of the history of that institution.

Indeed, for all Filipinos the papal visit is something to remember and to be grateful for, since it is both unique and rare. The UST is indeed privileged to play host to His Holiness, and it is my hope that all those who are blessed by his presence will come away from this encounter very much enriched in faith and spirit.

Address of President Marcos at the Opening Ceremony of the 1st Asian Conference on Agricultural Credit and Cooperatives, December 1, 1970

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Opening Ceremony of the 1st Asian Conference on Agricultural Credit and Cooperatives

[Delivered at the Philamlife Auditorium, December 1, 1970]

A Cooperative Ideology for a New Asia

YOU HAVE COME at a time when our country is still reeling from the effects of three typhoons and a flood that left Manila and several provinces in state of disarray. It is possible you may experience some inconvenience and discomfort due to the disruption of normal facilities. I hope, however, that the warmth of our welcome for you and our enthusiasm over your presence in our midst will make up for whatever inadequacies there may be.

This conference, I am informed, grew out of a workshop on agriculture credit for countries in the Far East that was started in 1956 in Manila and Baguio. We are doubly honored that this First Conference on Agricultural Credit and Cooperatives for all countries in Asia is also held here. This invites our gratitude and deepens our goodwill for all the nations participating in this conference.

Fourteen years have passed since the 1956 workshop. Many things have happened during those fourteen years in Asia and in the world at large. The time and the occasion do not permit the enumeration of these events. Certain developments and situations, however, have special relevance, to the subject matter of your conference. One of them, for instance, is the green revolution.

What many now call the green revolution is one event that has contemporary and far-reaching import and implications especially to the huge population of Asia whose lives have for so long been darkened by the spectre of hunger and want. The spectacular advances in production in many areas of agricultural particularly in rice which is Asia's principal staple, have lighted up hopes and confidence in the future. It is no small source of gratification that the green revolution has rapidly spread in this region and beyond as a result of international cooperation.

Advances in the field of agricultural production however brought about new problems and exacerbated old infirmities in our traditional societies. The spectacular increase in the production of a major crop like rice has always and will always create a complex of problems. Almost overnight the existing facilities for storage and processing became obsolete or at least sorely inadequate. Credit and financing, already inadequate to sustain the momentum of production, have to be greatly expanded to support the green revolution.

A corollary problem, perhaps even more vital to the whole social economy of agricultural production, is marketing. This problem has both domestic and international implications. Within the nation, the need for a different system of marketing has arisen — one that would break away from the exploitative middleman-dominated set-up which deprives the small farmers of a large share of the value of their produce and one that will be owned and controlled by the farmers themselves. This is essential to continued production. It is also a matter of social or economic justice.

In its international aspect, marketing of agricultural surpluses of countries in Asia brings these countries into competition with one another, most of Asia being agricultural and in many cases producing identical crops.

This, however, is only one facet of the problem. It is also, I feel, the less important facet. Under the pressure of common goals and aspirations, the nations of Asia, I am sure, will find the solution to this difficulty.

The more challenging facet or phase is the competition that certain advanced countries outside our region poses. Because of superior financial and bargaining position, these countries can dump their surplus agricultural crops in the available markets anywhere in the world on terms that we cannot compete with. This has happened in the past. It is bound to happen again. It is a problem that developing nations of Asia and elsewhere must learn how to overcome.

In the domestic and international aspects or dimensions of the marketing problem that the green revolution has brought to the fore, another development may be viewed in perspective: the eruption of social protest and discontent in Asia and for that matter in practically every country in our restive world. This social convulsion is, to be sure, not new, it has been with us for so long. In cent years, however, it has acquired the quality of a universal upheaval the meaning and message of which are as deep and profound as they are candid and clear.

The meaning and message of this universal upheaval is change in the established order of things—change in the structure and premises of the traditional societies. In one fearsome word it means one thing, revolution, whether is peaceful or violent.

There is another gentler but equally expressive term for this epochal phenomenon. It is social justice—the rising clamor of the poor and the disinherited of the world who have finally realized their rights, entitlements and worth as human beings and as members of the political and social orders from which they have been alienated for so long.

This rising clamor is, I think, loudest and clearest in Asia where it is also most relevant and justified.

All Asia, with the singular exception of Japan, is agricultural and in the main feudalistic in character. Its poverty is massive and its poor are being exposed to winds of change.

The winds blow from two directions: one from the West to which most Asians have had long attachment in colonial servitude; the other from the East, close by, where brother Asians, similarly despoiled by foreign domination, claim to have conquered poverty and ended the exploitation of man by man, and wish to export political ideologies.

Exposed to these competing winds of change, the masses of Asia are aroused and agitated. They are restive and confused. They are clamoring for change, for liberation from poverty, for social justice. And, they are learning to articulate in militant and organized activism.

It is against the backdrop of this historic drama of Asian masses actively seeking and demanding change that, I feel, this conference finds or should find its significance and its perspective.

Agricultural credit and cooperatives are strategic areas in which the imperious clamor for change in Asia can find a substantial measure of satisfaction. The participants in this conference who are all equipped with experience in the problems of agricultural credit and cooperatives will, I am sure, realize that timidity and orthodox methods of grappling with the problem of old-age poverty and stagnancy will no longer suffice. Bolder, more imaginative and more socially conscious ideas, policies and techniques in both programming and implementation are required if the race must be won between poverty and prosperity, between social chaos and social stability, between violent revolution and peaceful change.

We in the Philippines are trying to mobilize all available resources, human material and spiritual, to achieve the required social change and transformation through the ways of peace. In this historic task, we know we can learn from the experience of others. We therefore lay great value on conferences like this one that we are opening today. I am sure every delegate here shares the same mind and the same motivation.

Of the two fields that this conference will address its deliberations to — agricultural credit and cooperatives — the latter impresses me as the more basically vital and potentially more dynamic. For cooperatives are institutions of human beings with a deeply humanitarian philosophy and purpose, with a firm and faithful commitment to the achievement of social justice and economic democracy on the strength of voluntary action to satisfy common economic and social needs of people. They are peculiarly suited to the economically small and weak for whom indeed they have been conceived. Propelled by the power of self-help and self-reliance, cooperatives can be effective means of nationalizing the problem of credit both with respect to generation of funds and to their efficient management. As institutions of people, they can replace or at least dance the institutions of poverty that today constitute the citadels of the status quo. They can thus bring about the revolutionary change that the temper of the times demands.

For the restless masses of Asia, cooperatives offer perhaps the only desirable and acceptable alternative to a violent revolution.

Asia is poor in material wealth but it is rich in human and natural resources. The capacity, for development must be drawn from and built upon the organization of a vast reservoir of human resources which after all constitute the real and true productive and creative power in any society. Mobilized, motivated and organized in accordance with the dynamic principles of cooperation, the great asses of Asia can transform this sprawling but depressed region into a giant power bloc that can out-pace the existing power system in the establishment of a new civilization.

In pursuing the cooperative vision, however, let us be practical and pragmatic. Cooperatives do not come out and develop out of a mere wish or whim or even a solemn declaration of intention or policy. Speeches will not organize cooperatives. In the existing environment, including the culture which shapes the attitudes and actuations of our peoples in Asia, cooperatives can only come to their own if supported and sustained by a consciously planned and consciously implemented program of education in cooperatives. Less than this will not be enough. Indeed we shall need more.

We shall need, to begin with, to elevate cooperatives or the cooperative system into an ideology. An ideology of change and development. An ideology of social reform and human reformation. A revolutionary ethic.

That is why I have taken time out from my schedule to come and give my views on this. That we may emphasize by my presence and by my words the importance of this new ideology not only to the nation, our Republic, but perhaps to all of Asia.

If we in Asia can adopt the cooperatives ideology, we shall be seeking our common development on ideological grounds where the decisive struggle in the world today is being waged.

The choice and the decision are not easy to make. Yet they must be made before it is too late.

At the proper time and occasion I hope to be able to take this up with our own national policy authorities in greater detail. In fact we have started to do this already. I may later formally propose it for the consideration of the constituted leaders of free Asia.

Meanwhile, I close with the hope that this conference will provide some fresh insight into the problems of cooperatives and how best to approach and solve them. Such insights can help in the formulation of a new ideology for a new Asia. A new ideology not for any political system nor for any country but for all of Asia, and especially for the poor of Asia. Very few people have realized the importance of this particular problem, but perhaps on this particular point lies the formation of a new society not only in Asia but throughout the world.

Address of President Marcos at the closing plenary session of the Third National Convention of Small and Medium Industries, February 12, 1971

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the closing plenary session of the Third National Convention of Small and Medium Industries

[Delivered on February 12, 1971]

Assistance for the Smalland Medium-Scale Industries

THIS NATIONAL CONVENTION of small and medium industries, those who are involved in the promotion and establishment of small and medium industries, is a welcome contribution to the dialogue that we must sustain particularly in these times of social and political upheaval.

This convention may not be noticed by most of our countrymen, but because you are gathered here to discuss the role of light industries in the development of our land, you deserve the attention of the Filipino people. This is the reason for my presence here tonight. It is my hope that I shall be able to call attention to the vital role played by small-and medium-scale industries in the Philippines.

I understand that this convention is sponsored or hosted by the National Council, which I created under Chairman Gerardo Sicat sometime ago. The council is to be commended for bringing together various sectors of the government and the business community, for the purpose of exploring, assessing and recommending measures for exploiting all the possibilities leading towards the expansion of an important segment of our economy.

Over the past year, we have been reorienting domestic policy in order, as I said in my State of the Nation Message last January 25, to redress the balance on the side of the people.” In other words where before the emphasis might have been purely economic now the welfare of the working class must be taken into account in any development scheme.

With this objective in mind — that is, greater emphasis on the welfare of the common man — I have created a multi-agency committee which is now working on the acceleration of the establishment of export oriented cottage industries all over the nation. The country now has a situation where large orders for export handicrafts and other products have to be refused because the present marketing, financing and production structure of these industries does not allow such orders to be filled within a satisfactory period of time; nor is there quality control.

An answer to this problem is being planned. Government agencies will mount a massive effort to promote the formation of new small-and medium-scale cottage industries by providing worker training, assisting in establishing production units and-financing of the production units.

To complement this effort, elements of the private sector have volunteered to assist in the formation of centers to be established in the ten regions into which the country has been divided for this very purpose. I have been meeting with the businessmen and my last meeting with them took place only yesterday. It was agreed that big business would contribute to this effort. I spoke of the ten regions of the Country. The centers in these regions will be responsible for marketing and financing the output of cottage industries in their respective regions. In this manner, it will be possible to take advantage of the strengths of central management, financing and marketing direction in the regional centers, to strengthen these industries without loss of the independence in operation now enjoyed by the different operators.

This cooperative effort of business and government will be initially funded with P240 million. I have directed the government financing institutions notably the SSS the GSIS, the DBP and the PNB, to set aside funds to be used as loans for small-scale and medium industries. The present fund represents an increase of P35 million over the initial outlay of P5 million, which I directed the SSS to allocate last year for the same purpose. I gather that the financial aid that was given to small-and medium-scale industries last year amounted to only P10 million all in. The P40 million is just the beginning. It is our hope that these small-and medium-scale industries will be capable of absorbing the amounts that we intend to make available for these industries.

I call on each one of you to join the nation in this effort which is a part of what I referred to as the democratic revolution. This alternative and this option I have offered to our people in lieu of violent revolution, and should end once and for all the injustices, the abject poverty of the great masses of our people, and over-reliance on external sources for the sustenance of our economy.

In this connection, we have adopted an industrial development policy that contemplates “horizontal integration” of industry. This policy has been expressed in the amendment to the third investment priorities plan of the Board of Investments, which I recently approved. If you have been watching the development in industries you might have read about this. It calls for incentives to be devised, so that existing industries like machine shops, foundries, and similar small-and medium-scale enterprises will be encouraged to supply components to be used in the manufacture on products listed in the investment priorities plan. The result will be to encourage the development of a manufacturing network with greater emphasis on small-and medium-scale industries.

At this juncture, perhaps it is necessary for me to recall the National Electrification Program. We intend to spend in the next three and a half years a total of six hundred million pesos for electrification. But the reason I call attention to this is because it is our hope that you in the small-and medium-scale industries will be able to fabricate the various requirements of our electrification program so that we will not be compelled to import these requirements. I have inserted this into the program, and I have insisted upon its inclusion as an alternative or option to be granted to the small-and medium-scale industries, knowing that you, if given the opportunity, will be able to meet certain requirements of the electrification program.

In this effort the government and the Filipino entrepreneurs are together and together they can achieve much in the development of import substitutes and the development of export industries particularly those suitable for our country-side and the different areas of the country. This will mean the uplifting of the Filipino peasant, the laborer and worker, from a subsistence level of livelihood.

Last year, our efforts in this area reached a new plateau. As a result, our export earnings from one area alone, cottage industry products, for the first half of 1970 totalled P53,670,000. The over-all export earnings for 1969 was P79,690,604. These figures do not include export earnings by light industries not registered with the NACIDA. And the NACIDA industries are expected to export this year about a hundred million pesos worth of products, and again this does not include light industries.

We have involved more government agencies to accelerate the emergence of medium industries. In addition to the NACIDA, the following are actively participating in our promotion program: The National Manpower and Youth Council, the National Institute of Science and Technology, the Board of Investments and the U.P. Institute of Small-Scale Industries. Of course I have created the National Council for Small-and Medium-Scale Industries to coordinate government efforts in the promotion and development of these industries.

This year, we shall tap the resources of the Department of Labor, the Department of Education, the Cooperative Administration Office and other government offices.

In your resolution, I noted that you asked for the approval of the Senate Bill No. 595 and House Bill No. 1943, otherwise known as the Small Enterprises Act, which creates a new office around the Institute of Small Industries under Director Cataña. If this be your wish, I shall certify this bill in order that it may be acted upon by Congress.

The number of registered industries last year rose to 41,493. These producers employed approximately 127,595 regular workers and 671,722 casual workers. We expect this number to go up this year. It is my hope that the small-and medium-scale industries will outdo the cottage industries in the amount and value of export products, in overall production, as well as in the number of employment opportunities generated.

In the next three years, we shall accelerate our thrust towards the fuller promotion of our small and medium industries. This promotion strategy shall become a permanent component of the national planning and developing process.

The trouble with this country is that nothing moves unless the President pushes it. I have been watching the development of small-and medium-scale industries, and I specially after I created the National Council for Small and medium Scale Industries, I closely watched it move forward. Of course, I am content with the efforts of everyone but I am not content with the reaction of our people. It is my hope that the people will now hear of all these efforts, and I shall see to it that the government and our people will pay more attention to small-and medium-scale industries in the Philippines.

With respect to cottage industries an initial amount of P10 million has been set aside for, the national program, which seeks to tie together the various independent operating groups, 41,000 of them. There are also various other efforts throughout the land.

The National Manpower and Youth Council shall coordinate the organization and implementation of the project, and the National Cottage Industries Development Authority shall constitute the bulk of administration.

But, of course, the over-all coordinator will be the Chairman of the Board of Investments, Mr. Vicente Paterno. As I said, we have initial investment, that is on the part of the government, of P10 million and we also hope that the private Rector will contribute another P10 million. It is my intention not only to utilize the National Export Trading Corporation but perhaps to organize a new corporation to attend to the export of all your products. We expect the projects to generate anywhere from 50,000 to 100,000 new jobs within this year or next year.

We are well aware that the nation is undergoing the traumas of a developing society where the dispossessed are straining to break me centuries-old shackles of tenancy and freedom and the captains of industries are to some extent over-reaching themselves.

Even so-called affluent societies are faced with internal problems that arise from the concentration of their riches in the hands of the few.

We can therefore read as ominous signs the continuing unrest among our wage earners, students, and peasants, and we should all strive to eliminate all the vestiges of oligarchic rule, feudalism and bureaucratic corruption.

This is an objective which is not merely assigned to government. It is also the objective of the private sector. This can be achieved not through violence or armed uprising but through the distribution of economic wealth at the widest range to benefit more of the populace — through land reform, small-scale manufacturing, cottage industries, community development, self-help projects.

The small-scale entrepreneurs may well be in the vanguard of this revolution. Some of them may graduate into heavy industries. But I would like them to remember that so long as they develop and sustain in themselves an acute social conscience or a genuine compassion for their workers or employees and concern for the community welfare, manifested in concrete, terms, the revolution will not likely swallow them up. We used to say that the rich of this land should, for their own survival, help the poor. We dare say that they should do so because it is right. It is not only necessary for survival, it is necessary because it is correct and just and proper. The poor do not need charity, simply the opportunity to uplift themselves. This, then, is our common task—for you who are in industry and for us in government—to provide the opportunities for the less fortunate to make a decent livelihood in order that they will be in position to participate fully in the political life of the nation.

And so, my friends, I close with this statement — that I am watching the progress of the small-and medium-scale industries. And so long as I am President you can rest assured that the Office of the President will utilize its powers and prerogatives to help you in every way it can.

Address of President Marcos at the inaugural Ministerial Meeting of the Colombo Plan, February 23, 1971

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the inaugural Ministerial Meeting of the Colombo Plan

[Delivered at the Savoy Hotel, February 23, 1971]

A Regional Social Conscience

ON BEHALF OF the Filipino people and the Republic of the Philippines, I attend a most cordial welcome to the delegates, observers and guests to the 21st Colombo Plan Ministerial Meeting.

I wish the Conference success and the attainment of its objectives.

I am personally, specially interested in the Colombo Plan since I have had the honor of representing our country in Ottawa in 1954, when we first entered the plan as a full member. This particular action of our delegation at that time attracted some interest because our entering was made without any special instructions from any government. I wonder if the delegates still engage in such independent activities.

I understand that this phase of the Consultative Committee Meeting of the Colombo Plan for Cooperative Economic Development in South and Southeast Asia represents the highest level of policy decision in this particular forum for regional and transregional cooperative action.

Your principal responsibility is not merely to review and reach a consensus in mutual counsel on the recommendation and technical studies worked out in the Officials Meeting during the week just ended. Your responsibility bears heavily on determining the future orientation, character and direction of the passive aid and assistance exchange undertaken within the Colombo Plan framework of cooperation.

We work for a common purpose. The original objective that moved the Colombo Plan countries to organize themselves two decades ago, in order to effect a workable system and reach a unified perspective in the economic operation activities among developed and developing nations, remains essentially the same and remains apparently elusive. The full achievement of this objective — which is, the economic development of the countries in this region — continues to elude our labors so that to this day we are agitated by the need to intensify and expand our cooperative efforts even more.

Nevertheless, it is indeed encouraging that as we persist in organizing and increasing our efforts — and constantly taking measures to improve their effectiveness — we see that the basis of all our cooperative endeavors is made stronger and more valid.

To the great masses of human beings inhabiting the planet, the aspiration for economic development and social progress remains a primordial struggle.

In our concern for the welfare of the peoples of the Colombo Plan countries, who constitute more than two-thirds of mankind, we must make certain that this aspiration shall deserve the utmost of our cooperative energy, determination; and wisdom.

And here our task is to ensure that our policy discussions, the technical studies by our experts, and the learned speeches of our delegates — all of which are systematically documented in conferences such as this — shall be translated in real earnest into practical programs of action that will, in time, produce tangible results and benefits reaching the humblest members of our constituent societies.

The need for organized cooperation among nations, on a scale that transcends regional and even ideological boundaries, has become an imperative which governments in the modern world may no longer ignore. Foreign aid and all forms of assistance exchange are today undertaken between the developed and developing societies for a purpose that goes beyond the mere impulse of charity, and this is well recognized, if only implicitly, by all countries engaged in assistance cooperation for development.

I am referring to the imperative need for survival, an imperative which imposes itself upon all developing countries, and just as inexorably upon all rich and developed nations.

Thus, the dominant anxiety in our times centers on the necessity to remove the source of this major peril to the future of human society.

We find this source in the existing disparity between the few but powerful states and the many weak states with their impoverished peoples, the sharp disparity in the conditions of life, economic opportunities and social status, indeed a disparity that is an anachronism and an abnormality in the modern world. There has developed from this disparity the urgent need to defuse the tension and impatience in depressed regions comprising the Third World.

To our peoples in South and Southeast Asia, this urgency is familiar enough and does not need further emphasis or dramatization. The daily fact of economic poverty and conditions of social underdevelopment, exacerbated by historic obstacles that frustrate their labors, and mock their national aspirations continue to mount, ticking nearer into social upheaval.

And unless the developing societies are given equal access to the facilities for full economic development, and their peoples afforded the means which will enable them to develop their full potentials and enjoy the simple requirements of human justice, social dignity, and their right to intellectual and cultural enrichment, the continuing threat to the survival of humanity shall remain real and inexorable.

The imperatives of cooperation have been described in blunter and less patient words by those who have grown bitter over what they consider the utility of their situation. They have become so bitter as to remark that the few among the nations of the world who are affluent must help, or God help them. Therefore, we must take heed of the voice of impatience; we must embark, in this crucial age, upon a partnership for cooperative development of all the peoples of the world, if we are to avert disaster.

We can gain satisfaction from the fact that the framework of the Colombo Plan exemplifies a valid and organized approach to the common development of the member countries. For here we see honest attempts to understand the individual requirements and peculiar problems of each member country, even as the mechanism for the operation of assistance exchange is subjected to periodic evaluation.

We must re-examine the traditional concept of aid. We must make certain that the philosophy of aid is not static and rigid. This is a mammoth task for both statesman and social scientist. This is the central problem confronting the technical expert and agitating today's thinker-activist.

And this is exactly what we must engage ourselves to do. More than the discussions of the necessary technical questions on the mechanism of aid and assistance cooperation, our ultimate concern must center on the end results of all these exercises. We must make sure that we consecrate our efforts to the central issue of development, and that development shall reach and touch the human individual, however obscure his status may be among the teeming masses of the peoples of Asia. You are most familiar and qualified to evaluate the thinking and proposed orientations outlined in the Pearson Report, and then, too, the reappraisal made by the technical experts of the whole rationale of technical assistance contained in the Capacity Study of the United Nations development System.

In the scope of the Colombo Plan, in which already more than $27 billion have been expended in the last twenty years, the need for this guideline becomes no less imperative.

It is a matter of gratification that certain issues and relevant points related to our aim to enhance the efficiency of the functions of aid have been raised at this Conference. I believe they merit our full consideration and attention. On the question of technical assistance, for instance, there has been felt the need to utilize the services of local expertise instead of importing them from the developed countries. It is said that local expertise has an insight into the values of their own native societies which they can put to effective application and that experience shows that a foreign expert does not always fully grasp the peculiar ethos of the people with whom he has to work because it is almost always strange and alien to him.

Then, too, in the shift from bilateral to multilateral arrangements of assistance exchange, the equal importance of the need for quantitative and qualitative increase in the types of forms of technical assistance should receive as much stress. Indeed, it is worthwhile and timely now to shift from the traditional arrangement of project-to-project assistance to the more realistic country program approach. I trust that this sentiment will merit the sympathetic consideration of the donor countries.

But we, who belong to the developing societies and whose responsibility is to lead our peoples and to direct their energy towards economic development and social progress, realize well enough that the ultimate responsibility for improving the economic and social status of our societies rests on the native leadership and in the innate capacity of the great masses of our own peoples.

I believe that we all recognize that whatever aid and technical assistance we have received is meant to supplement our own resources and indigenous energy, and that in the end the purpose of all aid and assistance is precisely to remove the causes for such aid and assistance.

As we occupy ourselves with the problems of assistance and cooperation, we must persist in directing our sight to the ultimate ideal of all nations. This is, to use the words of the United Nations Charter, the sharing together on the widest scale possible of the improved quality of life in larger freedom.

National self-respect and our aspiration for true independence dictate this attitude. I urge understanding on the part of the donors of development assistance to our societies. I urge a recognition of the internal tensions occurring within our societies, tensions whose roots are imbedded in the very fact of underdevelopment. Many of the societies requiring development aid are laboring under the constraints of internal tensions and mass discontent, and this adds yet another handicap to those already existing and inherited from their history of colonialism. Their very history left with them institutionalized obstacles that heavily limit their capacity for growth.

Even as recipient countries advocate effective humanization of aid, that is to say, the infusion into the aid-giving policies of donor government of certain real concessions to selflessness and justice, developing societies require that their own efforts be afforded the chance to succeed. Our feeling is that this can be assured when traditional constraints and historic obstacles are removed. This accords fully with the desirability of improving international economic relationships and of observing the principles of mutuality in the opportunities of enjoying the great resources of our world.

This is the plea of the developing nations to the developed nations, and it is spoken in a voice of urgency and made manifest in the social ferment of our times.

I believe that the following points further merit the consideration of the distinguished delegates of this conference: 1) the improvement of financial assistance in the form of referred to as, "soft term" loans; 2) elimination of trade barriers affecting exports of the primary and export products; 3) regional schemes for monetary cooperation among developing countries, or arrangements whereby countries can help one another as proposed under the Asian Payments Union; and 4) a realistic review of the present demands by donor countries for the increase in international reserves of developing countries in order to determine the minimum level of international reserve holdings for insuring the healthy growth of international trade.

The catalogue of obstacles that developing societies have to surmount on their way to economic development is decidedly heavy. But of special difficulty is the urgency of what is developing to be the crisis of "Debt Explosion."

And here the frustration is keenest in the inability of developing countries to generate the sufficient capital for investments that can release the wealth of untapped resources.

Under this particular constraint, developing societies must turn to the more affluent nations for developing loans and capital assistance, as well as to international financing institutions whose lending policies are supposed to be geared with more understanding and sympathy to the peculiar requirements of poor countries. These development loans, therefore, should be made available under conditions less stringent than those loans given out in the pure nature of business transactions and thus dominantly motivated by the prospect of sure profits for the money lenders. Certain policies and systems are needed and must be devised to enable developing countries to gain access to development loans or foreign debts with a little more liberal terms, lesser interests, and ample allowances for grace periods that should be made operative when the debtor countries struggling for development encounter certain crisis and social ferment. For the harsh fact of underdevelopment affects the internal order of developing societies.

But in the internal ordering of developing societies, which is central to the purpose of effective maximum usefulness of assistance, the absorptive capacity of developing countries for assistance very much depends on structural reforms within their own societies.

We in the Philippines have begun the national task of entering the age of re-structuring our own society, even to the extent of a full-blown democratic revolution, to enable us to free our people from the historic obstacles that impede our efforts and frustrate our national goals.

There is an equal urgency, ladies and gentlemen, to initiate and institute certain reforms in the structure of international relations, concerning specifically the spheres of economic and international trade relationship between the developed and developing countries. We shall do well to consul here in the Colombo Plan scheme the manner in which this important forum contribute to these efforts for change and adjustment.

While individual countries take full responsibility and resort primarily to their own native devices to achieve social progress and economic development the assistance and cooperation available through this transregional framework can be made to respond to the particular aspirations of its member countries and thus lead the way for the active exercise by all nations of a social conscience, and in this process, help insure a secure and stable future for the whole society of mankind. In the greater perspective this is your obligation as it is mine and thus the obligation of all leaders of all developing and developed countries.

Address of President Marcos at the Sugarcane Planters Convention, February 24, 1971

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Sugarcane Planters Convention

[Delivered in Bacolod City, February 24, 1971]

Sugar and Reform

OUR NATION IS faced with grave challenges. The adequacy of our political system is being questioned. The viability of our economy is undergoing a severe test. Authority is being asked to justify itself all over again at almost all levels of our national life. Our society is under siege on many fronts.

The quality of our response to these challenges will determine whether our nation shall survive or perish, whether freedom in our land shall endure or vanish, whether our future is one of unity and progress or disunity and perdition

As President, I have already made my choice. We shall fight, no matter what the cost, for the survival of our nation in freedom, in unity, in progress.

But your government needs the cooperation of all our people, including you, the sugarcane planters. In fact, in determining the quality of our response to the challenges facing us, you in the sugar industry are in a privileged position to contribute decisively. For you have been and still are among the privileged few in our society. You have the ability and certainly the duty to respond to the challenges of our time — challenges which are deeply felt in your particular industry.

At bottom, the problems confronting us are not new. They have been with us over the years. What is new is the demand — a deep and compelling demand — to confront and liquidate these problems in our time. What is new is the impatience of our people to act on these problems right here and now.

Therefore, we, who are under a sovereign mandate to lead our people at this time, are called upon to act. The days of procrastination are over. We cannot evade the challenges.

We have to act — now.

You in the sugar industry have no problems with the government. Under my administration, you shall continue to enjoy government support and protection. We shall maintain and even try to improve our existing market for sugar in the United States.

At the same time, guided solely by our national interest, we shall explore the possibility of opening up new markets for our sugar anywhere else it may be needed. Also, we shall continue to support industry plants to improve efficiency and raise productivity. Our policy is to accelerate the growth of the sugar industry.

Henceforth, however, growth in the sugar industry shall serve to narrow rather than widen the gap between the many who are poor and the few who are rich. Instead of enriching further the few who are rich, let us improve the quality of life of the many who are poor, the many who are ignorant and the many who are sick.

This is the new direction — the new goal. From now on, we shall measure progress in the sugar industry no longer in terms of new millionaires, but in terms of the number of people rescued from poverty, ignorance and disease.

How do we bring about this transforming redirection in the sugar industry?

The answer, as I said in my State of the Nation message, is a democratic revolution designed to integrate the working masses into the mainstream of wealth and power in the sugar industry.

The main agents of this revolution — a peaceful revolution for progress and social justice — are the trade union movement and the cooperative system.

Of course, there have been, as there still are, trade unions and cooperatives in the sugar industry. Like our age old problems, trade unions and cooperatives have been with us all these years. However, they have not been allowed to function as fully and effectively as they should. They have not been allowed to fulfill their democratizing mission. Our task today in the sugar industry is to give them a chance to operate fully in the interest of real, democratic partnership between employer and employees.

In this spirit, I ask labor management representatives in the sugar industry to work out immediately practical schemes of cooperation in the field of housing. These housing schemes should be designed to provide, as soon as possible, a decent house and lot for every worker and his family in the industry. The government is prepared to provide technical and other forms of assistance in working out these schemes. In fact, I will ask the National Housing Corporation at the proper time to consider these housing schemes for sugar workers a part of the massive low-cost housing program of the government.

The housing schemes I have in mind should take care immediately of the regular workers in sugar plantations and sugar centrals. Eventually, however, the schemes should be expanded to cover the sacadas or migrant workers who constitute an explosive element of instability in the sugar industry.

If possible, in keeping with the spirit of the democratic revolution, I suggest that the housing elements be made an integral part of collective bargaining agreements. In this way, the housing schemes will become truly an act of partnership between labor and capital.

At the same time, I ask representatives of labor and management in the sugar industry to explore other practical areas of cooperation, including the setting up of consumers, producers and marketing cooperatives. Through labor-management negotiations, arrangements may be made through which management may provide seed capital for these cooperatives. The possibility of flushing the social amelioration fund for this purpose should be explored.

In short, I want to see, as soon as possible, positive and creative acts of partnership between labor and management in the sugar industry — acts of partnership designed, as I said earlier, to integrate the masses into the system of wealth and power in the industry.

Lessons on cooperatives from Scandinavia and other countries point to only one thing: cooperatives are our only workable compromise between free enterprise and socialism because while they preserve private ownership they restrain an otherwise unbridled desire for profits. Moreover, cooperatives result not only in a fairer distribution of capital and profit, but also distribute as fairly genius, skills and technology.

It is to your credit that more than any other group of farmers you are pioneers in cooperative endeavor. The Sugar Planters Cooperative Marketing Association, for example, was organized even before the war. You can, therefore, pioneer all over again in a new age of cooperatives in our country.

These are some starting points for a democratic revolution in the sugar industry. They are modest initial steps. Let us set to work on them as soon as possible — in the interest of a just, free and progressively sugar industry.

Address of President Marcos at the opening ceremonies of the fourth meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the Association of South East Asian Nations, March 12, 1971

New Direction for ASEAN

ON BEHALF OF the Filipino people, allow me to extend to you a most cordial welcome to our country. I sincerely wish that your deliberations will be fruitful to each one and beneficial to all and that this meeting will lead to effective results and achievements.

I recall with pleasure a statement I made in the course of my state visit to Southeast Asia shortly after the inception of ASEAN in 1967. At that time, I strongly reiterated my country's firm support for the lofty ideals of ASEAN: peace and freedom through social justice, economic well-being through concerted action, all in the spirit of equality and partnership, understanding and good will.

I was inspired by the realization that these nations, known by all to have been hapless victims of some of the world powers, thought of by some as a veritable testing ground for contending ideologies, feared by a few to be the probable arena of future armed clashes, had at last reached a common awakening.

We were aware at last of the potentialities that lay before us. We were finally conscious of the need to create a harmonious stability in the region so that in our own way, we would be able to contribute towards the attainment of the dream of a better world.

Looking back through the parallel histories of our nations, we notice one common misfortune. Where in reality our peoples should have been closely bound to one another by strong ties of kinship, similarities in outlook and way of life, the resemblance of ideals, there came instead an inexorable play of invidious and divisive forces beyond our control.

The region was torn asunder, our various nations sequestered and bound by alien ties with no notice of the inherent closeness of the peoples in the region to one another. Our eyes were distinctly turned outward to sights dimly beyond us. And in the process, we were left with hardly more than a vague awareness of one another's existence.

It took time and an abrupt alteration of the world order before our disparate destinies began to take a different turn. Probably with the instinctive awareness that our several destinies must merge in time, we began to rebuild lost bridges, to restore the ancient ties, to renew forgotten hopes.

It was not an easy task, for it is always hard to build on memories where these memories have been turned to mere recollections of what we once were. Neither was it an impossible undertaking, for the hidden ties that bound us proved to be much stronger than the artificial ties that were imposed upon us.

Slowly, gradually, we moved closer to renewal until finally, our unfortunate history became no more than a past wilderness out of which there came that distinct cry: We are Asian brothers.

As I said it then, and as I reiterate it now: ASEAN shall continue to enjoy my country's firm support and the wholehearted willingness of the Filipino people to contribute towards the attainment of its goals.

Even at the time the historic ASEAN declaration was signed in 1967, I made it a firm resolve to give continuing support to ASEAN. It has been and will continue to be an important policy of my government to continue to elicit the warm support of the Filipino people for ASEAN. Regarding this, I am pleased to inform you that we have been successful and that the Filipino people stand firmly and solidly behind me in support of ASEAN.

Recognizing the congruity of our national aspirations with the broader interests of the whole ASEAN region, the Filipino nation is one in its firm resolve to help make ASEAN a truly effective medium for the attainment of economic and social progress. We offer what there is to give. We ask no more than what is good for all.

Looking back on the progress of ASEAN from the time of its inception, I am pleased to note the achievements in the pursuance of joint projects in the fields of tourism, transport and communications, mass media, science and technology, food production and supply.

Considering the broad spectrum of regional activities covered by ASEAN, these achievements are encouraging, to say the least. In all sincerity, I wish to congratulate the ASEAN Secretaries-General and various permanent committees responsible for the implementation of these projects.

A brief survey of existing regional organizations throughout the world will show that no other organization covers as wide a range of regional activities as the ASEAN.

Viewed as a reflection of the willingness of ASEAN peoples to foster oneness and harmony in the region, this distinct quality of ASEAN is a cause for admiration. It removes all doubt as to our sincerity in setting up a viable example of regional cooperation.

Thus far many of the key ASEAN projects are in the preliminary but indispensable planning stage. Distinct programs of economic cooperation indicative of direction and specific objectives beyond the general principles stated in the Bangkok Declaration are beginning to emerge. When we think that the members of the ASEAN have just begun to get acquainted with each other, and when we think further that considerable economic difficulties beset the countries in the region, I find this development a source of great encouragement.

The danger is that ASEAN will attempt too much too soon. Our eagerness to concentrate on efforts on regional economic cooperation, with particular emphasis on specific objectives that take into account the economic realities of the region, is understandable. But it is better to make haste slowly to prevent discouraging and costly setbacks.

I sound this note of caution because ASEAN is set to embark on a new stage in its career. We are about to begin more ambitious projects in economic cooperation and I am sure that our common desire is to get them off the ground without delay but with minimum risks for the future of the ASEAN.

I am aware of the criticisms directed against the ASEAN. It is said that ASEAN has not achieved anything significant or tangible. I have heard this repeatedly and this question has been thrown at me by most every commentator and observer.

At the same time, there are announcements made about the great strides being made by other regional organizations towards the expansion of intra-regional trade, the lowering of intra-regional tariff barriers, the pooling of resources, joint ventures in specific industries, the formulation of unified economic policies.

In short, other regional organizations seem to be well on the way to the establishment of viable free trade areas, common markets and other forms of economic unions.

This gives rise to uneasy apprehensions that ASEAN might be left behind as other regions of the world move on towards economic prosperity through effective regional cooperation. There is also that uneasy fear that ASEAN might be left in the outer fringes of decision-making on vital economic issues of great importance not only to the world at large but to the region. You who have worked to bring the ASEAN to its present stage of growth know better than any of your critics that these accusations do not correspond to the facts.

I refuse to believe that we are defaulting on the arduous task of achieving economic prosperity for our peoples. The fact that an ASEAN can be set up at all is an achievement in itself, and surely of great significance for the future of our peoples.

One other danger may confront the ASEAN.

We are all aware of the immense natural resources in the region. We all realize that the combined total population of ASEAN constitutes a vast market. Considering these two factors alone, we should expect a rush for economic influence, new markets and trading partners in our region.

Many will be eager to avail themselves of the many opportunities latent in the area. They are welcome provided their interests do not conflict with the collective interest of the ASEAN region. We must beware of solutions which might appear expedient today but which may constitute great obstacles in the long-term economic development of the ASEAN region.

A common endeavor towards greater prosperity in the ASEAN countries seems not only possible but necessary. It is said, for instance, that there is hardly any intra-regional trade at present. Perhaps it is time to begin to involve ourselves more vigorously in developing closer trade relations.

Perhaps it is also time that we should now concentrate on the development of a payments union. You will recall that some years ago I proposed the formation of an ASEAN Payments Union and I refer to all of Asia. I concede; that plans for such an arrangement covering all of Asia will take time to be perfected. We can perhaps begin with a limited payments union for the ASEAN region.

Patience has always been an Asian virtue. It is common to our peoples. But I should warn that only a thin line divides patience and lack of action. In the pursuit of regional economic cooperation, too much patience may be a ruinous vice, inaction is certainly a dreaded evil.

I believe that the time for action has come.

I therefore propose the adoption of new directions in regional economic cooperation. I invite the ASEAN ministers present in this gathering to join me in proclaiming the seventies as the ASEAN Development Decade. I request the earnest participation of each ASEAN member country towards the drawing up of a definite and specific program for economic cooperation which should include a set of immediate short-term goals as well as a definition of long-range objectives.

It is imperative that this program be accompanied by an appropriate timetable to ensure adequate preparation on the part of the ASEAN governments for promoting implementation. I further request that this program be made ready as soon as possible.

I believe that the goal of ASEAN economic cooperation, ultimately, should be the establishment of an ASEAN common market which would promote throughout the region a harmonious development of economic activities, a continuous and balanced expansion, an increased stability, a rapid improvement of the standards of living of our people and closer relations between member countries.

While the setting up of an ASEAN common market might seem to be a steep undertaking in the light of our previous experience, let us not forget that the experience of other regional associations will prove to be of use in our efforts.

In addition, we have the full support of the United Nations and other international organizations. The United Nations-Sponsored Study on ASEAN Economic Cooperation which is now making good progress would be of great help towards the immediate setting up of our courses of action.

And as we consider this ultimate goal of a common market, we should also consider the possibilities for immediate action toward the expansion of inter-regional trade. As we know, trade among ASEAN countries represents a small fraction of the region's total trade.

Precisely because of this, there is plenty of room for expansion. It might be worthwhile setting up at an early stage, a limited free trade on a selective commodity basis. Such an arrangement would require a minimum of political decisions and would be likely available for immediate implementation.

At the same time, it will help ASEAN governments considerably in undertaking institutional readjustments preparatory to trade expansion on a wider range of subjects.

We are faced with difficult tasks. Our economies are greatly strained by our efforts at industrialization. Poverty looms as a constant spectre in our respective countries.

The pitiful social conditions existing in our region demand immediate remedies. We need to put our houses in order so that our people may live in harmony, peace and economic well-being.

This I am now trying to accomplish for the Filipino people by concentrating the national effort towards a just and fair democratic revolution. This you are now trying to accomplish in your own distinct ways of working for the same noble end for your respective peoples.

Let us wish each other luck for we will need it. Let us sincerely hope that ASEAN will bring us nearer to our dream of a better world.

Let us devote our utmost efforts to making ASEAN an effective means for the attainment of common aspirations and thus combine determined action and noble intent.

To each and everyone of you again, welcome and my best wishes for achievements in this conference.

Address of President Marcos before the Sugar Club of the Philippines, March 18, 1971

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
Before the Sugar Club of the Philippines

[Delivered at the Intercontinental Hotel, March 18, 1971]

The Importance of Sugar

I AM ALWAYS very happy to come to conventions of the sugar clubs and sugar associations. I am always glad to be with you. We are kindred spirits, you and I, because the sugar industry is often blamed for many things which it is not responsible for, just like the President. I also like the way you conduct your affairs. I noted that you are much faster in passing legislation, unlike the Congress. And certainly this has been a very fruitful occasion. I am happy about the approval of these principles. I have just read the Declaration of Principles and witnessed the signing of these documents which initiates a fine movement in the sugar industry.

If you remember, I cried out for a democratic revolution on January 25 of this year, at the time when most of the prognosticators were insisting that there was going to be a violent revolution. One of the primary goals of the democratic revolution is the narrowing of the gap between the rich and the poor. It is to give hope to the helpless in our society. The democratic revolution is the alternative that I have offered, an alternative to violent revolution, a peaceful alternative. This actually articulates your position and the position of the responsible elements in our society, for a survey indicated that anywhere from 84 to 90 per cent of our population are against violent revolution, but there are 10 to 16 per cent of our population toying with the idea of violence as a solution to our problems. It is not that there are 10 to 16 per cent who will join a revolution; it merely means that this 10 to 16 per cent feel that if nothing is done soon they may have to meet with a violent revolution. Out of this 10 to 16 per cent, perhaps only one per cent will join an actual revolution. But that would be enough.

The social question seems to be whether the privileged few in our society will help bring about a peaceful revolution or will refuse, thus leaving the option of restructuring the social order to the underprivileged. As I have asked in my State of the Nation address, shall the affluent change this society in order that they may have a place in it or will they leave the task to the small men, the people who are deprived? If this happens, they may create a society in which you and I will have no place.

Thus it is that I welcome the pioneering spirit that is symbolized in your Declaration of Principles, for it is to me an answer to the social question that I too have answered with the democratic revolution. It is pioneering because among all our agricultural industries, you are first in the establishment of this Sugar Industry Social and Economic Foundation, replacing, if you will remember, the old Social Amelioration Fund which I suggested to be established by the sugar industry sometime ago.

This is indeed a pilot project because it is an experiment in capitalism with a conscience, capitalism with a conscience which actually is the answer to most of our problems today.

I am very happy that the ambassador of the United States to the Philippines is here because I know that he has extended to us great assistance in this current crisis which the sugar industry faces. And I am very happy that he is here to witness all the activities of the sugar association, the refineries, the processing, the sugar planting. I am glad that he witnessed me pledge of involvement of every man, woman and child in the sugar industry in this new experiment.

I am told by those who are helping us out in the United States, and by our ambassador, that without in any way prejudicing the interests of the American government and the American people, the American ambassador has gone out of his way to help us maintain our present quota in the United States. Well, let us applaud him.

I understand that when our ambassador to the United States came before some of the officials who were going to make the decisions and started explaining the situation of the Philippine sugar industry, he was told that it was all right, Ambassador Byroade had already told them about the situation. So, you see, he is not saying very much, but he is watching and listening to everything.

If the sugar industry collapses, the Philippine economy collapses. Let me demonstrate to you, to our people, and especially to those who have made it a habit to attack the sugar industry and Marcos for supporting the sugar industry, the truth of this contention.

You know in 1954-1955, you had a production record of 1,324,857 short tons and in 1968-1969, 1,761,000 short tons; and then in 1970-1971 you reached a new record. In 1969-1970 you reached a new record of 2,124,314. The crop year 1970-1971 production is expected to go higher, to 2,362,894 tons, and in 1974-1975 2,700,000 tons. The percentage of sugar export earnings in relation to the total export earnings of the Philippines was initially 20 percent. By this year, it should be and it will be 25 per cent, or 1/4 of the entire export earnings of the Philippines, all from sugar. You can imagine therefore what would happen if this one quarter of the entire export earnings of the country should suddenly be lost.

Why are export earnings so important? Because export earnings bring in more foreign exchange or more dollars, and we need dollars to bring in goods. What kind of goods? Right now, we are bringing in capital goods. What are capital goods? An example is machinery for our industrialization program. And why do we need industrialization? Because we cannot absorb our unemployed in agriculture nor can we increase the per capita income of our people except by developing a balanced agro-industrial economy. But we will not be able to do so unless we keep on earning dollars. At the same time, from the monetary point of view, if we lost 25 per cent of our export earnings, then our currency will be eroded in value, externally and perhaps internally. Meaning, it will have less value and if you think that prices are very high now the prices will go higher, and I address this to the ordinary Filipino, the common man, the housewives, the employees, the wage earners, because they keep asking "what is in sugar for us?"

We have no connection whatsoever with sugar, we have no connection whatsoever with logging, no connection with mining, so why is Marcos so interested in these big industries? He says he is against the oligarchs and yet he is helping them? Well, of course, I am against the oligarchs who use their economic and political influence to advance their economic interest. But does that mean that I am against everybody who is rich? No. I am in favor of protecting the economy, but at the same time I want it so restructured that the benefits of progressive economy will not go only to the affluent, to the rich but, will go down, seep down to the level of the common man, especially the laborer and the agricultural worker. And this is exactly what we are all aiming at.

You are pioneers in establishing the Sugar Industry Social and Economic Development Fund, which will be set up from two per cent of the gross product. It actually is a good basis, for two per cent of the gross product given as an outright share is a fair share, with 90 per cent going to supplementary salaries, bonuses and other financial payments to those who labor in the sugar industry. Well, I would like to see this followed by other industries, not only in agriculture but also in other industries in the Philippines: two per cent of the gross products to go to labor in actual payments.

Going back to my theme, sugar, or for that matter logging or mining or manufacturing, has a direct effect upon the lives of every man and woman and child. If these sources of foreign exchange and dollars, are not encouraged, are not given protection, are not attended to, then the one who will suffer ultimately will be the small man.

The Filipina housewives and the children will suffer because the prices are bound to go up. Everybody is now talking about prices, everybody is talking about the cost of living, well we should count our blessings, because if we had failed in our efforts to attain monetary stability last year, there would have been chaos and confusion in this country. Very few people realize this but last year was a very critical year. You will note that last year, I was very quiet about the economic situation. I kept my peace, I even refused to answer any attack or charge because my mind was concentrated on the monetary stability problem. If we had failed there, in the balancing of Imports with exports, dollar earnings with dollar expenditures, my friends, the revolution that we have been talking about, might have come. I am not saying that the communists have given up, but they would have had a good occasion to start a revolution if we had failed.

All of you who are in the know realize therefore that we have reason to be thankful. I appealed for reason at a breakfast prayer meeting, where I spoke about praying and got lampooned for it. Some critics say that it is all that Marcos does — pray. He does nothing else. That is not exactly true, but there are times when we need a little prayer. I tell you, I prayed a lot last year and I intend to pray a lot this year.

We are facing this temporary crisis in the United States because of our quota. They have explained this to you and there is no further need to explain except to say that we expect understanding from the United States. I do not believe that the United States government, whether it is the Congress or the executive department, will easily disregard the persuasive arguments that we have advanced in support of the continuance of the quota, or if possible its increase. I feel that the American sense of fair play will give us our due.

I also wanted to come before you to assure you of two things. First, that after having explained the importance of sugar to our people I would like to inform you that your government, your President, and all those who are helping him, are utilizing all the powers of the Presidency in order that we can surmount this obstacle, this crisis that we are facing now in the sugar industry. And we count on old friends to help us out in this predicament. Next, I would like to assure all investors whether American or of any other nationality, about fair treatment in the Philippines. You have demonstrated by your declaration of principles and by your various programs for social amelioration, particularly the fair treatment of the sacadas and the workers in the sugar industry, your new orientation, your capitalism with a conscience concept, and by the Declaration of Principles itself and the organization of the foundation.

Now, by thus taking this attitude and initiating these programs, you have answered some of the critics of the sugar industry, not only here but abroad. May I, however, say that perhaps now we should not think alone of this immediate crisis but of the other crises to come. And what are these other crises? One will be the crisis of surplus. In a year or two, you will have such a surplus in the sugar industry that quota or no quota you will have monumental problems. Therefore, it behooves us, as men with foresight, to now get organized on this propose, and I intend to immediately initiate the first step, I propose the organization of a Sugar Commission which will now look into those problems. I repeat, prognostications and projections say that by 1974 or 1975, your production will increase to 2,700,000 tons.

You and I know that your cost of production is higher than the world price even under present circumstances. This year it is 4.8 cents per pound, equal to the Caribbean rate, at the Caribbean level of 5 1/2 cents per pound, which is similar or equal to the domestic price. And your surpluses will therefore be a pressure upon not only the domestic market but also upon the world market. And it will constitute a problem which we must now start to solve. It is my hope that all elements of the sugar industry, from the sugar planters to the sugar millers and processors will join hands on this. I have faith and trust in the judgment and wisdom of your leaders. They have already, I understand, started studies on this matter. I called their attention to it many times in the past and they agreed with me that we must organize as soon as possible a Sugar Commission to look into the problems of the sugar industry, not only on a short range basis but on a long range basis.

And so, my friends, I am very glad indeed that we have met this morning. I am very happy that you have finally approved, in the most expeditious fashion, the Declaration of Principles.

I would like to say that in the Philippines today there are people who keep asking what the democratic revolution means. Well, this is one meaning of the democratic revolution: that instead of a revolution from below, a revolution at the top, among the leaders of our society, for you constitute that select group of leaders in this particular industry, has been generated. A democratic revolution at the top that is peaceful and within the confines and restrictions of the law. This is what I would like to encourage. And I call upon the other industries, agricultural or industrial, all the other economic activists, to now pursue this same line. I ask every industry leader group to sit down and look into the possibility of increasing the participation of labor not only in the profits but also in the preparation of long range policy.

Of course, you and I will have to await the Constitutional Convention, when this august body will determine the nature of our fundamental charter. But now, before the Constitutional Convention meets, it is necessary that the citizenry be appraised of the options and the alternatives that they have. It is necessary that we tell our people that there is hope and that they need not despair. It is necessary that we do this, specially in the urban centers of our country, for it is here in the midst of distressing conditions that you hear advocacies of an alien ideology. We are an open society and we encourage dissent, but I repeat, the government will not tolerate the continued use of violence, not only against the government but against society.

I hope that this step taken by the sugar association, the sugar club, will be duplicated, I repeat, by other sectors of our economy. And it is my hope that as we move forward there will be more leaders like you, leaders like those in the sugar industry, who can take it upon themselves to assume responsibility for reform and change. For indeed there is need for reform and change. We keep repeating this, we keep re-emphasizing it yet the movement is too slow. The movement in both agriculture and industry is slow because many of the leaders of our economy still seem unimpressed by the danger apparent, by the threat of violent revolution. There are some people who go to the extent of saying, "Perhaps it would be best if somebody started a violent rebellion so that the leaders of our economy would be shocked into realizing that now is the time to act, that we can no longer postpone action."

Let me congratulate you again for your initiative in pioneering in this area, and let me end with the prayer that this act of yours will be emulated in every sector of our economy.

Address of President Marcos at the Graduation Ceremony of the Philippine Military Academy, April 2, 1971

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Graduation Ceremony of the Philippine Military Academy

[Delivered in Baguio City, April 2, 1971]

The Communist Conspiracy

HERE, AT THE Philippine Military Academy, it has become a hallowed custom once a year to pay tribute not only to the group of distinguished young individuals who finish the special four-year course, and this afternoon I also wish to contribute to this hallowed custom by paying tribute to an ideal, and that is the ideal of excellence. For it is the pursuit of this ideal that has given the Philippine Military Academy its great prestige. By pursuing this ideal, the graduates of the Philippine Military Academy assure the Armed Forces and the nation as a whole a steady source of human material for responsible leadership.

It is therefore my great pride and pleasure to congratulate the Academy's graduates this year. I am sure mine is only one of countless voices throughout the nation which articulate praise and admiration for your achievement.

While taking note of this achievement, I must also ask you however to bear in mind that the future which you face will demand even more sacrifice and hard work from each of you. We live in times which require endless dedication to the principle of excellence which guided you through the past four years in this Academy.

Owing to the requirements of national development, the soldier today is called upon to perform extraordinary duties, to fulfill responsibilities quite beyond the limits of the traditional military career. I am sure you are aware that the military man in our time is no longer merely a soldier but is also a builder, a social scientist, and in many ways a teacher.

If you are to continue the success that you have already achieved in this Academy, you must be ready to meet the numerous tests of courage and determination by which you will be measured outside this training ground.

Out of the numerous responsibilities that you will be called upon to fulfill, I am mainly concerned today with your responsibility, soldiers, to provide our people with leadership in meeting the problem of subversion. For no matter how hard you and the rest of us may work, we are bound to lose the gains we make if we do not stand fast against the danger posed by those who seek to undermine our institutions, and the security of the nation.

This danger is real, and has been with us for a long time. Although it may be under cover, it may present itself through many faces, but it is there. And the main source of this danger is the Communist conspiracy, which has been a persistent threat to our democratic system for at least 40 years. Allow me, therefore, to speak of this communist conspiracy.

The organized subversion of our democratic institutions began actually on November 7, 1930, when the Partido Komunista was inaugurated at Plaza Moriones, in Tondo. In an endeavor to bring together into a single force the labor and peasant elements, the Partido Komunista established a base in Manila and then worked its way into the provinces, particularly in Central and Southern Luzon.

Three times since then it has been declared a subversive force although this is largely forgotten nowadays — first in 1933, when it was outlawed by no less than the Supreme Court of the Philippines; again in 1948, when it was outlawed by President Roxas; and once more in 1957, when Congress passed Republic Act No. 1700.

Throughout its career, the Communist organization in this country has aimed at the violent overthrow of duly constituted government, and conducted itself accordingly, by a combination of the so-called “parliamentary struggle” and violence, sabotage, and relentless propaganda.

In order to further its ends, the Communist conspiracy has endeavored at various times to coalesce with other elements, including political parties. It has put up a “united front” with one or another of these elements at various times, and set up such organizations as the Frente Popular, the League for the Defense of Democracy, the Philippine Youth Congress and other front groups. In 1938, it merged with the Socialist Party and became the Partido Komunista Ng Pilipinas otherwise known as the (PKP).

Its first formal venture into armed struggle as a means of subversion came in March 1942, when the Hukbalahap was organized in Barrio Batibat, in Concepcion, Tarlac. Since then, it has alternated between phases of pronounced parliamentary struggle and armed struggle, although at all times it maintained a military arm to terrorize the citizenry and, if possible, the government.

Since 1946, it has also taken an active part in elections, merging with political elements which were willing to boost its program of action and perhaps hasten the fulfillment of its aims.

A high point in the Communist conspiracy in this country came late in 1949 when, taking advantage of a certain amount of political instability, the Communist leadership pronounced the existence of a so-called “revolutionary situation” and accordingly sought to foster an atmosphere of strife and crisis. Hukbalahap raids and ambushes, an increase in armed clashes and casualties, and a sense of impending disaster promoted among certain elements in the nation — by means of these, the communists pressed their armed offensive! following a strategy meeting of the PKP politburo in January, 1950. Note that this coincided with the fall of the Chiang government, and the takeover by Mao Tse-tung of the mainland of China. At this strategy meeting, the Communist leadership set the date for their planned takeover of power on May 1, 1952.

The communist rebellion of 1950 was thus characterized by guerrilla action, with jabs and thrusts at various places, particularly in Central and Southern Luzon. At one time, if you will remember, some 14,000 armed dissidents bore arms and invested the communist movement with some amount of prowess. These were veterans of the Second World War, utilizing arms that had been used against the enemy that invaded our land and had not been returned to the Armed Forces of either the United States or the Philippines. But the communist conspiracy underestimated the competence, the discipline and the dedication of the Armed Forces.

What started out in the first month of 1950 as a promising guerrilla campaign began to collapse in October of that year when the Armed Forces military intelligence service destroyed the Communist politburo in Manila. Further intelligence work broke the back of a rising communist front organization, the Congress of Labor Organizations. It is perhaps necessary to note that these successes were accompanied or were made possible by the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus by President Quirino.

These intelligence successes were accompanied by unceasing military action by our Armed Forces, which succeeded shortly in putting the dissident troops to rout and scattering their shreds into the mountain sanctuaries. Without the aid of any foreign troops, indeed without in the slightest measure desiring the assistance of foreign troops, the Armed Forces of the Philippines vanquished the Communist guerrilla action. It thus established for the Philippines the record of being the only Asian country that has demolished an actual communist rebellion through the sheer courage, skill and sturdiness of its own unaided soldiery.

In 1970, after comparatively quiescent years following its rout twenty years ago, the Communist conspiracy in the Philippines once more mounted a more less massive and overt act to overthrow the government. But it was a rebellion unlike that of 1950.

The accent in the fresh outburst of Communist energy in 1970 and this year has been on propaganda and agitation. Likely elements in youth, peasant and labor groups, as well as among certain intellectuals, are enticed by all means and manner of propaganda into the Communist conspiracy. Political indoctrination is conducted in schools and elsewhere today, some openly, others covertly. Various organizations, including some quite well known nationalist groups, are wittingly or unwittingly the staging ground or breeding place of Communist indoctrination. A number of these front organizations have been active in the promotion, support or actual conduct of demonstrations and rallies set up to give a degree of verisimilitude to the Communist pretense that the entire country is seized with an overwhelming revolutionary fervor.

The propaganda, at certain times, especially in 1970, has been accompanied by violence and armed action against the forces of government. But on the whole the present communist endeavor is carried out by means of jargon. Propaganda has sought to manipulate the attitudes and behavior of various elements through themes with a peculiar fascination for a specific group. Thus the young are induced by appeals to nationalism; laborers and peasants are told about the hopelessness of their economic condition.

All these could in time produce a situation critical enough to warrant a more or less sustained use of the government's military resources. I am sure that as before, the Armed Forces will acquit themselves with great distinction. For the experience of 1950 has shown that in a time of crisis it is the Armed Forces which bear the brunt of the responsibility for protecting the nation and preserving the liberties and freedoms which are the substance of our present society. But let me not be misconstrued. It is not the military that is the principal arm of the government in the struggle against communism. The principal arm against communism is reform and the socio-economic development program.

I say this both with hope and conviction, because I know that the Communist threat is relentless and no moment must pass but that we are fully awake and prepared. The Communist Party, in its continuing effort to overthrow the government by force, has persisted for the last 40 years, in spite of serious reverses that saw many of its leaders killed or incarcerated after being declared enemies of the state and of constituted authority. The leaders of the Communist movement and the ideologues of the Communist Party say they plan not in terms of years nor in terms of decades, but in terms even of centuries. If this is so, then I speak to the officers who in their time will meet with the problem of communist conspiracy.

The local Communist Party has employed every conceivable trick or stratagem in this endeavor. It has shifted many times in its tactics, using legal and parliamentary means when conditions seem to endow this strategy with wisdom; and when this fails, resorting to skirmishes with the Armed Forces, or killing innocent citizens in ambushes.

At other times, it resorts to spreading false propaganda against the government, or against individuals and groups who would easily bend to its will. By such means, communism has portrayed itself as the guardian of freedom and democracy in this country. Does this mean that government is perfect, that our society does not need reform? No. In many instances, communism has utilized valid grievances and valid demands for reform as premises for preparing the staging ground against both government and society.

On the other hand, Communist agitators, intent on the success of their deception, have marched in student demonstrations, destroying both public and private property. Never mind if the economy of the nation suffers, never mind if the work of the government and of the private sector grinds to a stop, and never mind if innocent civilians suffer, provided they advance an inch forward in their march to power.

From the start, the Communist Party in the Philippines has sought by every means to undermine the social order. It has attempted to penetrate the government for the purpose of destroying it. It did so during the time of President Quezon, but failed. This serious setback sent the communists into a new flurry of organization, transforming Central Luzon into a hotbed of subversion. From then on, Central Luzon was the center of the dissident movement, under such leaders as Luis Taruc, Pedro Abad Santos, Crisanto Evangelista and some Chinese nationals imported from Red China.

Insurgents, determined to strengthen their hold on the peasants, organized the Barrio United Defense Corps and the Kalipunang Pambansa ng mga Magsasaka sa Pilipinas. They even formed their own "government."

For their part, the Armed Forces have dealt with the Communist conspiracy with firmness and dignity, balancing the realities of the situation with the imperatives of national security and survival.

The Armed Forces dealt a decisive blow to the dissident movement, specially the traditionalist, or Moscow-oriented Communists, when elements of the 10th BCT killed Huk Supremo Pedro Taruc last October in Angeles City, and before that, captured Commander Sumulong, their top commander. Likewise, the Armed Forces have put an end to the careers of Huk leaders, Zaragoza and Del Mundo, to mention only the more prominent ones in fairly recent days.

We still have to contend with what the more aggressive Communist Party faction or the Maoist or Peking-oriented Communists today call its military arm and which is referred to as The New People's Army, of whom so-called Commander Dante is the known leader. There was an attempt in several violent student demonstrations last year, when student activists referred to Dante as "our next President," to break into Malacañang Palace, shouting his name and that of Mao Tse-tung, and raising the red flag. They threw live bombs into the Palace grounds and burned some buildings. But the Armed Forces of the Philippines resisted the temptation of retaliating with equal force. While they rammed a truck against the Palace gates and some of the elements entered the Palace grounds, the only counter-action was to push them out; this was in accordance with the traditions of the Armed Forces.

But Dante or the students mouthing Maoist jargon will never compel lawful authority to renege on its commitment to democracy and freedom. The people themselves have seen through them, and read the plunder and deceit in their acts. Thus, when the University of the Philippines was taken over by these radical elements, especially those of the student organizations, the Armed Forces of the Philippines were not committed to repel this action. And these radical groups demonstrated that they were more rightist than the government; they were continuously criticized for being more fascist than any abusive soldier, and at the same time for being more abusive than any unthinking citizen.

The same comprehension has moved the authorities to move firmly against Nilo Tayag of the Kabataang Makabayan, who is now under army custody, as is also Leoncio Co, and is facing charges of having incited people to rise against the state.

Consider the record of the Communist conspiracy. Through various operations, it has killed no less than 298 persons from 1962 to 1968. It is responsible for 173 incidents of terrorism in 1969 alone, resulting in 196 killed, 37 kidnapped, and 103 wounded.

For the first two months of 1970 alone, there have been 42 dissident-initiated incidents resulting in 54 killed, one kidnapped and 35 wounded. Needless to say, this does not reflect the peaceable spirit which should counsel all our acts.

I have come here this afternoon to warn that the Communists will continue to try and subvert the government, whoever the President may be, and undermine the principles on which our democracy and our free institutions stand. Like Jose Lava, who said, "I entered prison as a Communist and I will go out as a Communists," they will persist in waging their kind of war.

We are all engaged in a decisive and critical struggle to achieve progress and prosperity for the present as well as for the future, in order to avert the possibility that our people will succumb to the communist counsel of despair and to prove to the world that we are a nation capable of self-determination and self-government.

The greatest challenge that confronts us today is the challenge of the communist ideology which has placed upon our shoulders the burden to prove that freedom and democracy, as principles of human society, will work for the Filipino people and secure for them better living conditions.

In the face of these difficulties, the Communist elements in our country would foster upon the masses the false belief that the ultimate solution to our basic national problems is an armed revolution. They cry to everyone, we must reform, we must change, that reform and change is possible only by armed revolution. But we are a nation that has known the meaning of our freedom and the value of our democratic institutions for so long that we hold it as an article of faith that we can overcome our problems without the use of force and violence. The elders of your country and nation, who know the meaning of war, who have seen war and participated in it, answer, and they say, yes, we need reform, we need change. But we can attain reform and change without violence, peacefully and within the context of the Constitution or the law. For the use of violence totally negates the essential value of human life regardless of the cause under which it is waged.

We set ourselves in opposition to the Communist theory of effecting social and political change through bloodshed and the use of arms because we know that the progress of democracy and a free society can very well realize these ends. No matter how ardently we may desire progress, we will not build the edifice of tomorrow upon the mangled bodies of our fellow men or splash its walls with the blood of innocent men.

We have seen in our own time, during the hard and trying years of the war and also in the period of peace, the endurance of our people and their inherent capacity for survival. We are certain that our people and their government can work out satisfactory solutions to the various problems of the nation without going through a wasteful, debilitating and disgraceful revolution of arms.

It is on the basis of our national experience and the fundamental principles of our society, therefore, that we formulate and present the concept of a democratic revolution as our answer to the Communist prophecy of doom.

As I have stated it before, and as I do so again now, the solution to our basic national problems lies in the institution and effective implementation of reforms in the various aspects of social and political life. These reforms can be achieved through peaceful means. This is the essence of the democratic revolution.

I am taking this opportunity to stress the significance of this concept again because unless vital and meaningful reforms are made in our society and our government to bring about a substantial change in the living conditions of our people, in your own time, either as young lieutenants or as senior commanders you the graduates assembled here today might suddenly wake up to the sounds of battle and find yourselves led to the battlefields to fight a war against you own brothers and to redeem with your own blood our precious legacy of freedom. Indeed, it is fearful anticipation of this possible situation of brother fighting against brother, Filipinos killing Filipinos, an event which I know will be a very costly experience for all of us, that I have insisted on a policy of peaceful reform in our government and society.

I call on this year's graduates of the Philippine Military Academy even as I have called on all the citizens of this Republic, to lend themselves to the successful prosecution of this democratic revolution. The transformation of our society is a goal we have long sought to achieve. Today we have both the opportunity and, I am sure, the ability to make that transformation possible. But we must insist that it be a peaceful transformation, a change that will endure because it satisfies the requirements of human dignity while it also responds to the values that have moved and sustained this nation and all of mankind for centuries. The change that the communist conspiracy will bring by means of division and bloodshed cannot but be ephemeral, and must be rejected.

You have the power to make that rejection firm and absolute, and to insist on the only reasonable alternative. I invite you to assert that power in the service of the Filipino people.

Again, to each and everyone of you, my congratulations.

Address of President Marcos at the 27th Session of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE),
April 20, 1971

Justice to Nations, Justice to Peoples

ONCE MORE THE Philippines is honored with the opportunity to host the 27th Session of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East. It will be recalled that the last time was in May of 1963 for its 19th Session. Even then, I followed with personal interest ECAFE's blueprint for Asian regional economic development. I shared the vision of the planners and leaders of this organization of Asia's potential for contributing to the world's economic and social progress and stability.

For the past two decades, the attention of the world has been focused on Asia and the Far East not only as a major crossroad of international politics, but also as an experiment in regional development. The world seems to be starting another complete turn, as Asia, once the primary cradle of civilization, again makes a challenge to repeat history. In the past, the East was the reference point for culture, technology, and civilization. But in recent history, the East, especially this part of Asia, has developed a different image, projecting the impression of a fragmented and divided Asian community.

It is with deep concern that we should look into the future of Asia with an even more analytical outlook than to its past. It is proper that we view the Asian situation from the context of development and stability — as a struggle, not of nations, but of peoples who seek a certain degree of identity.

A look at the last decade in Asia will show us that the problem has been the lack of social and political stability. Development goals and objectives have been set against a background of serious political developments in this region. Despite these unfavorable conditions, however, it is gratifying to note that the result of efforts in the attainment of these goals has been quite modest but impressive. Economic growth, reflected in increases in gross national product within the region and among member countries, has shown an increasing trend. There have been remarkable improvements in technology, foreign aid and trade.

ECAFE's achievements in developing and promoting the economic and social life of the peoples in the area are too well known to bear repetition. In the last two decades, the Commission has established institutions directly designed to accomplish the development objectives of the region. Among these are the Asian Development Bank, with permanent headquarters here in Manila; the Asian Institute for Iron and Steel in Singapore; the Asian Institute of Development and Planning located in Bangkok; the Asian Statistical Institute in Tokyo; and the Asian Coconut Community in Djakarta.

As the list indicates, the ECAFE's activities encompass the problems of the region. The spirit underlying these activities counts as much as the activities themselves. For what the ECAFE has done, to a greater degree than most regional organizations, is to develop awareness and ensure cooperation among Asian countries. Thus, its major projects — the Mekong River Project, the utilization of water resources, the development of industry and natural resources as well as transportation and communications in the ECAFE region — are thoroughly informed with this spirit. Indeed the projects would not have been possible without it.

The achievements of ECAFE in the region have been made possible by the sincere cooperation of all member countries. As one of these members, the Philippines will continue to remain a loyal and a helpful partner in the common task of regional economic and social development.

We appreciate the value of ECAFE's considerable efforts in improving the quality of life of the peoples of Asia. We do realize at the same time that the problems of development are multifarious, and often resistant to quick solutions. The vastness and diversity of the region militate against easy and simple answers to the complicated questions of national and regional growth. The Commission therefore cannot rest on its laurels. As effective a machinery as the ECAFE is, we have to face the fact that, in relation to the problems, our progress has been rather slow. The question is whether we can continue to ignore the mounting voices of impatience and the increasing frustration of multitudes of Asia before they spill over in manifestations of violence.

It is imperative that the ECAFE marshal its resources to promote the faster growth of the region. The concentrated effort represented by the First Development Decade has brought home to us the stern lesson that the harder we try, the farther back we seem to fall behind in the race for economic development.

Thus, it has been said that the gap between the richer and the poorer countries continues to widen, with only a remote prospect that the pernicious gap will be closed in a foreseeable future. Even as we prepare for renewed efforts to solve the problem in the Second Development Decade, a feeling of discouragement is growing, constantly fed by social instabilities which little by little are beginning to rise to the surface.

Although the growth rate of the ECAFE region as a whole rose from 4 per cent to 4.4 per cent per annum during the First Development Decade, and although the growth in the agricultural sector was most encouraging, yet the region as a whole fell short of the agreed target of 5 per cent.

The failure to reach the growth target acquires a somber cast when we recall that in the last two years of the first Development Decade, the growth rate rose to a spectacular 5.3 per cent annually. This figure suggests that, we failed to perform at anywhere near our true capacity. We are left with the guilty feeling that if the conditions had been right, we could have surpassed easily the 5 per cent growth target.

In part, the disappointing result of the First Development Decade is due to the population explosion. In nearly all of the developing regions, the rate of population growth jumped from 2.2 per cent annually to 2.5 per cent. In particular, Southeast Asia showed an increase higher than the rest of the developing regions, for the rate of population growth in the area rose by nearly one-half per cent annually during the period.

The accelerated population growth has had a drastic effect on the per capita income, reducing that income— and therefore development— by a significant amount. While there has been no slackening in development efforts, the paradoxical result is that we in the developing areas are getting less than we are putting in.

But the lag in developing has not been wholly the result of natural factors such as the extremely high population growth. In part, it is also due to the unfortunate inability of the developing countries to mobilize the full potential of their resources for development.

I suggest that this is not entirely the fault of the developing countries. They are a consequence of the failure, if that is the word for it, of the developed countries to reconcile principle with practice in extending assistance to the less fortunate countries. Today, assistance to developing countries is a staggering burden which these countries can seldom afford to assume. To put it in another way, developing countries can accept the offered assistance only at the cost of retarding the pace of their economic development.

Perhaps I speak with a touch of hyperbole. But the fact is that developing countries today are in the grip of factors which together constitute what I would refer to as the Triad of Poverty. Unless the means are devised to break the vicious triangle, unless ways are discovered to restore the original meaning of international assistance, then I fear that the developing countries face a very bleak future indeed.

The first of these factors is the hardening of the terms of international loans which, together with the widespread practice of aid-typing, sharply circumscribes development where it does not limit the very planning process itself.

The second is the continued existence of immovable trade barriers which while it affects the entire international community affects, first of all and most adversely, the developing countries.

And the third is the requirement for the increase in international reserves which inhibits the mobilization of development resources among developing countries.

In particular, the last factor requires, to my mind, an immediate review, since its harsh impact is beginning to be felt by the less fortunate regions. The requirement for an international reserve may be a sound business practice. In the context of developing countries and their considerable difficulties, it may be an unwise economic practice. For the net effect of the requirement is to curtail national growth by reducing further the already limited amount of resources available in developing countries for investment purposes. As we can see, the requirement penalizes the very countries which are least able to increase their foreign reserves. And it places them in the unfair position of building up their reserves at the cost of a stagnating economy.

Under present conditions, there are only two ways the poorer countries can increase their international reserves. The first is through loans from the developed countries and the second is by drawing from domestic resources already earmarked for development purposes. In either case, the result is the same— an undue imposition on scarce capital resources, and a direct restriction on the growth potentials of the developing countries.

I urge the ECAFE to consider seriously the problems posed by this Triad of Poverty. The developed countries have their own problems too, as we are only too well aware. But precisely because they are developed, they are capable of withstanding stresses which developing countries are not. I should perhaps emphasize that concerted international action is needed to solve the refractory problems which in the end will affect not only the poorer but also the richer countries of the world.

Excellencies, my government and people are committed to the ideals of regional economic and social cooperation and share your concern for the prompt attainment of our objectives. Asia must speed up the pace of harnessing its energies and resources to combat the forces that keep it poor and underdeveloped. We in this meeting should orient our goals and policies to ensure that the economic and social opportunities available to the region are shared fairly and equitably by all.

The last few years have brought to the foreground an indispensable component of economic development. For the developing countries especially, this new component has altered in a radical way the values which we traditionally attach to economic development.

It is clear that economic growth is not a self-sufficient end of development. The true end of economic development is social progress. A development therefore that overlooks the social aspects, that does not confer a richer, quality to everyday life, that does not have as its purpose the enhancement of the human person — such a development misses the true meaning and the real dimension of national growth. Progress is for people.

The narrow view that economic development can be pursued at the expense of social progress arose in part because of the high demands of national growth which have compelled us to concentrate on the total mobilization of material resources. We have tended to forget that in fact the key resource of any nation is its human potential.

The recent past has demonstrated beyond dispute that neglect of the human factor can give rise to social instabilities which negate economic development. It can be accepted as a universal rule that economic development is hollow at its core if it does not benefit the greatest number.

Yet the development that we have achieved is one-sided at best. We are faced not only by the disparity in the distribution of wealth among countries but by a disparity which is even more tragic, namely, our inability through their traditional processes of economic development to distribute wealth evenly among the different segments of the domestic population.

Such a situation cannot be permitted to continue. To frustrate popular expectations in the face of visible material growth is the surest way of defeating that growth. Since growth in itself encourages instability, the great challenge to all developing countries is to promote economic and social progress as indivisible components of total growth.

Spreading the benefits of growth has sometimes been called social justice. But it is a matter of nomenclature. I for one view it as the real meaning of the democratic revolution — a revolution which all developing countries must undergo if they mean growth without paying the tragic price of social disruption.

The example of recent history has not been reassuring in this respect. We may have to face the fact of increased stresses on the social fabric, paradoxical ally perhaps as the very result of growth.

But it would be a pity if we began to accept this as an inevitable development. For it need not be — if we had wise counsel and were prepared to act on it. I ask the ECAFE therefore to devote itself, as to an urgent matter, to the study of procedures by which the developing countries can harmonize development plans which call for the necessary integration of social and economic, development goals.

In this matter, the non-regional members of the ECAFE together with the developed members in the region, could play a distinct role in helping accelerate the integrated development of Asia.

As we move forward into the Second Development Decade, we should recognize the cause for the shortfalls experienced in the First. We should not allow the seventies to slip by without accomplishing the targets we have set. The Commission must exert every effort to determine the appropriate strategy and direction to ensure the maximum realization of the objectives we seek to obtain.

As a leader of one of the member-countries, I view with deep concern and anxiety the future and political stability of the Asian community. As a people, we in the region comprise more than half of the world's population. We have common problems. I sincerely hope we can find common solutions.

With these parting words, I officially welcome you all to the Philippines and I sincerely hope that your session in Manila will be both fruitful and pleasant.

Address of President Marcos at the First Tripartite Conference on Labor-Management Relations and Manpower Development, May 23, 1971

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the First Tripartite Conference on Labor-Management Relations and Manpower Development

[Delivered at Pope Pius XII, Ermita, Manila, May 23, 1971]

Industrial and Freedom

Peace

through

Justice

I AM HERE today not to talk of anything else outside your concerns, much less of the supposed candidacy of Blas Ople, which is never seriously talked about, although I may not entirely disagree with the idea, but to share with you my own thoughts on labor relations and manpower development which I know you will discuss during the next four years.

Last Labor Day, before representatives of organized labor, I pledged to uphold the right of the Filipino workers to self-organization and to free collective bargaining, but some events have intervened since then which set back action. Today, before this tripartite congress of labor, management and government representatives I am proud to reaffirm solemnly and reiterate the same pledge. All of us must unite in order to assure the Filipino workingmen the right to organization and to free collective bargaining.

I make this pledge and commit my entire administration to this, and as President of the Philippines. I make this policy commitment guided by two fundamental assumptions: First, that we have reached the stage where we must again reiterate the generally accepted assumption. This is perhaps necessary as all of us stand confused at the crossroads of our national life, that government, management and labor reassesses their respective positions and clearly state in all candor what those positions are.

I have come up with certain basic principles. One, we are committed as a people to a free and democratic society, and no matter what anybody says this is the principle to which all or at least a greater number, a great majority of our people, are committed. And that, secondly, the system of free collective bargaining which we adopted in 1953 has worked satisfactorily in the last 18 years.

That we are committed to freedom and democracy is not subject to question to my mind. But whether all our people enjoy fully the blessings of freedom and democracy is an entirely different affair. Our unorganized workers, for example, have no full access to freedom and democracy, not because our laws deny them their rights in our constitution but precisely because they are unorganized and divided.

This was the basic consideration which compelled me in 1953, during the debates on the Industrial Peace Act, to fight for the adoption of a national policy which guaranteed our workers freedom of association and free collective bargaining. And the same consideration moved me in 1964, as President of the Senate, to spearhead the fight for the inclusion in the Land Reform Code of a provision extending the right to self-organization and free collective bargaining to our agricultural workers.

I believed then, and I believe it now, that our workers must get organized if they are to integrate themselves into our free and democratic society, and that one of the most effective ways of getting organized is to form a union for collective bargaining and other lawful aims.

And what does our experience in labor relations under the Industrial Peace Act during the last 18 years say? I think that the answer vindicates my position.

First of all, the Industrial Peace Act has provided our workers a framework to reinforce and to stabilize our social order. Instead of joining the Huks or the People's Army, or the Communist Party our workers have joined or organized unions all these years. Instead of seeking their own liberation through bloody revolution, our workers have actively sought a better life through the institution of free collective bargaining. In short, the workers of this nation have been utilizing the principle of democratic revolution which I spoke of in January 25 of this year.

Today, more than 20,000 Filipino workers all over the country are embraced by some 4,600 registered unions. No matter what their shortcomings are, these unions have raised the bargaining power of their members vis-a-vis their employers and the rest of society. As evidenced by their collective bargaining agreements, these unions have in one way or another, improved the terms and conditions of employment of their members, and through political action and other legitimate organized acts, they have tried, no matter how modestly, to prod society to reexamine its aptitude towards workers and succeeded. This is the most important part. In short, our unionists have become not only effective partners of their employers, but have also become change-seekers in society.

If you listen to some of the younger members of our society, it would seem as if they had a monopoly on the idea of reform. But long before they even thought of this, labor unionists and labor unions had already espoused the idea of reform. They had long started to actualize their own version of the democratic revolution, because of this freedom of organization and bargaining which they exercised.

But free collective bargaining has proved not only as an effective agent of social justice but also as a viable system of labor relations. Since 1953, under the free collective bargaining system, industrial relations in our country have been lively but stable. Compared with nation-wide and industry-wide strikes and lockouts, in Japan, the United States and countries in Europe, our own strikes and lockouts here are routine. In fact, our industrial relations have never really gone out of hand or assumed alarming proportions, our most serious strike being the 1963 waterfront strike in the Manila South Harbor. It was a costly, protracted and bloody strike but it was not due to the failure of our free collective bargaining system. Rather, it was brought about by partisan and trade union politics.

I have received a report from the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Secretary Romulo, when he came back from abroad, and he informed me that he has to carry his own bags at the airport in Rome. There was a work stoppage in practically all of the countries that he went to. There was a postal strike in England and several strikes of hotel workers. There were strikes everywhere in the entire nation of Italy which was all but paralyzed. And he informed me that he never realized that an entire nation could be completely brought to a standstill by a strike until he saw what happened in Italy. And I told him, aren't you happy that here in the Philippines we have industrial peace, comparatively speaking, an industrial peace arising from the good relations between management and labor?

Moreover, the free collective bargaining system has absorbed and withstood for 18 years now the shocks of great economic and social readjustments. Now, let us go all the way back to the time of President Garcia, to the marginal fee; and to the time of then President Macapagal, the partial devaluation; and, again, the wage readjustment; and more recently, the floating rate as well as the new minimum wage. You think of all the things that could have happened with these possible sources of disturbance and disruption, these shifts in economic and monetary policy setting off tremendous difficulties and entailing painful readjustments in the field of labor relations. But our free collective bargaining system has proved equal to the challenge, thus amply demonstrating its resiliency and adequacy as a means of maintaining industrial peace.

During the last five years, there have been even more encouraging trends the field of labor relations. Up to 1965, according to labor department statistics the ratio between actual strikes and the number of strike notices filed every year was from 16 to 24 per cent. In other words, 16 to 24 out of every 100 strike notices exploded into actual strikes. Since 1966 the ratio has been cut down to 8 to 16 per cent. In fact, during the last three years, the number of actual strikes has never exceeded 9 per cent of pending strike notices.

However, the number of labor disputes or strike notices has more than doubled during the last 5 years — from 543 in 1965 to 1,083 in 1970. These are due mainly to (1) sheer economic expansion resulting in the rise of more establishments and more unions, and (2) increased confidence of trade unions in the conciliation service of the Labor Department, resulting in the filing of strike notices even when they were not required by law as in unfair labor practice cases.

These figures attest to the dynamism and vitality of our free collective bargaining system — a system which, by and large, has maintained peace through justice and freedom in our society during the last 18 years.

Nevertheless, our free collective bargaining system is faced by many problems, some of which threaten to defeat its purpose or bring about its breakdown. I am sure you will discuss these problems yourselves in the course of this tripartite congress and I hope you will come up in the end with effective and workable solutions. For my part, I will limit myself to the discussion of three major problems: first, union busting on the part of unscrupulous and tradition-bound employers; second, union raidings on the part of some labor groups; and third, the inadequacy of government response to these problems.

Now, let's turn to the first. Union busting is an old management practice to prevent the formation of a union or to destroy an existing one. This is done mainly through either the setting up of a company union, or the employment of legal technicalities, or dismissal, harassment, discrimination, and other unfair labor practices against union officers and members. The Court of Industrial Relations is supposed to curb and penalize these unfair labor practices, but instead of doing so, it has reportedly encouraged in a number of cases the perpetration of such practices. I understand that before a petition for certification election or an unfair labor practice charge is resolved by the court, an unscrupulous employer has already succeeded in busting the union or in preventing the formation of one, often resulting in strikes and lockouts. Sadder still to note, some labor groups and their leaders have reportedly allowed themselves to become instruments of some employers in busting rival unions or in preventing their recognition through unfair maneuvers in court or at the picket lines.

But there are inter-union and intra-union rivalries which happen independently of management. These rivalries arise mainly from the overlapping jurisdiction of our major labor groups. Since they are all general federations, conflicts of interests and clashes of forces are inevitable among them. In the heat and bitterness of their rivalries, some labor groups wittingly or unwittingly play into the hands of employers who are waiting in ambush to divide and rule the labor movement for their own selfish purposes.

Again, problems arising from inter-union and intra-union rivalries are under the jurisdiction of the Court of Industrial Relations, which alone has the power to resolve them. Almost invariably, however, the CIR fails to act on time to resolve such disputes before damaging strikes can take place. How many times have the labor leaders come to me with this complaint? Where the employers themselves are responsible for creating a multi-million situation, then those employers deserve their own sad plight. However, where the rivalries are carried out by the unions independently of management, it is I think the urgent duty of the court to provide immediate relief.

But at the bottom of the problems of union busting and union raiding is j actually lack of labor education among our workers. If our workers are aware of their rights and responsibilities as employees and unionists, they will no doubt detect and withstand the evil maneuvers of union busters and union raiders. That is why, in the end, the only real solution to union busting and union raiding is the enlightenment of all our workers.

The manpower development program that we launched a few years ago has turned out to be a successful program. Under this program, some 200,000 unemployed citizens have been prepared through vocational training for employment.

It is now time, I think, to make the manpower development program serve the actual needs of industry; to train people for immediate absorption by industry. In this way, our manpower development program can become an active instrument not only of economic progress but also of social change.

We are now reforming the educational system of the Philippines. We are engaged in a reformation which will bring out graduates that can be absorbed by industries or who will fit into industry and will relate to the development program and plans of our country. It is now time for the manpower development program to involve itself as well in this new orientation, in this new; change.

Now, taking all this into consideration, I recommend the following proposals for the consideration of this tripartite congress.

First, I propose the inclusion of employer-employee relations as a required subject in all elementary and high schools as well as in all vocational and technical institutions. I am also directing right now Secretary Ople to include labor relations as one of the subjects in all manpower training classes all over the country. For as we all know, all pupils, students or trainees will end up as employees or employers, the only exception being self-employed persons.

Second, I propose the holding of a compulsory election in every establishment within 60 days before the expiration of a three-year collective bargaining agreement for the purpose of determining the collective bargaining agent of the employees therein. I also propose the transfer, from the CIR to an administrative body like the Bureau of Labor Relations, of the power to order and conduct an election to settle inter-union or intra-union disputes.

Third, I propose to empower CIR hearing examiners, especially in the provinces, to decide and rule on all unfair labor practices and representation cases subject to review by CIR Judges in Manila upon request of the aggrieved parties. In due time, I am certifying to Congress a bill which will merge the Court of Industrial Relations and the Court of Agrarian Relations into a single labor and agrarian court, adopting the present atomic structure of the CAR and eliminating the present collegiate structure of the CIR for the purpose.

Fourth, I propose the abolition of the present union registration system which is an unnecessary and cumbersome extension of colonial policy. In place of the present system, unions shall be merely required to submit their names and addresses to the Labor Department whose duty shall consist only of compiling such names and addresses and publishing from time to time an official directory of all unions.

And fifth, I propose to make vocational training compulsory for all citizens of the country.

I ask all of you to discuss these proposals and indicate your consensus about them at the end of this congress. I will be guided by the consensus of this congress.

This, I understand, is the first major tripartite congress to be held in our country. Previous labor relations congresses were attended by representatives of labor and management only. I hope this innovation will prove fruitful and thus set a new pattern for the future. I trust all of you will do justice to this new idea, this new approach, which we owe to the innovating mind of Blas, my Secretary of Labor. He has been a good Secretary of Labor, you must admit. Paminsan-minsan nakakawala, pero magaling na Kalihim ng Paggawa.

My friends from labor, management and government this is your first major opportunity to work together towards the solution of our common problems. Let us make it a great success — for peace through justice and freedom for all.

Everywhere we hear the cry, there must be reform! This is one of the areas where we must now bring about reforms, but not through bloody revolution. Continue along the path that you have followed since the adoption of the Industrial Peace Act in 1952. You are the innovators, you are the original leaders of reform. I look forward, therefore, to the Tripartite Congress leading the way towards the peaceful reform of our society and the alteration of the attitudes of our people. This congress alone is an achievement in itself. The fact that management and government can sit down with labor and discuss their common problems is a monument to the new perspective, to the new attitudes, and to the change of heart of our people, and this, therefore, is an augury of the happy resolution of this period of confusion. And out of this congress a new body like the Bureau of Labor Relations, of the power to order and conduct an election to settle inter-union or intra-union disputes.

Third, I propose to empower CIR hearing examiners, especially in the provinces, to decide and rule on all unfair labor practices and representation cases subject to review by CIR Judges in Manila upon request of the aggrieved parties. In due time, I am certifying to Congress a bill which will merge the Court of Industrial Relations and the Court of Agrarian Relations into a single labor and agrarian court, adopting the present atomic structure of the CAR and eliminating the present collegiate structure of the CIR for the purpose.

And out of this congress a new nation perhaps will be born, as well as a new relationship between management, labor and the government. As far as I am concerned, as President of the Republic of the Philippines, I can assure you that I support the idea of management, government and labor coming together and giving to the lowliest man every opportunity to gain equality and freedom in our country.

Address of President Marcos at the Joint Graduation Exercises of the National Defense College and the Command and General Staff College, May 25, 1971

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Joint Graduation Exercises of the National Defense College and the Command and General Staff College

[Delivered at the Camp Aguinaldo Officers Club, May 25, 1971]

Leadership in a Time of Challenge

I TAKE SPECIAL pride in being here today to officiate at the Joint Graduation Exercises of the National Security Course of the National Defense College of the Philippines and the Associate Command and General Staff Course of the AFP Command and General Staff College.

I am heartened to see more and more of our civil government officials appreciate the need of sending their executives to the National Defense College for national security is the equal concern of both the civilian and the military. I am likewise heartened to note the continuing turnout of Command General Staff graduates who will eventually occupy positions of leadership in the Armed Forces.

Recently, I lifted the General Staff Corps eligibility as a requirement for promotion. It does not mean, however, that I have reduced the worth and importance of this eligibility. I do continue to recognize its necessity in the development of professionalism among the senior officers of our Armed Forces, especially officers of the line. All other factors being equal, an officer with the eligibility has a better likelihood of putting in a creditable performance than one who does not. The same is true for the course offered by the National Defense College. It is therefore my desire that both programs be pursued aggressively.

The seventies present formidable challenges to the nation and its leadership. Our nation is in a state of transition; it is entering a new phase in its political life. The transition is taking place amidst difficulties and obstacles. To many of our people, fazed perhaps by the tremendous odds, this has become a time of uncertainty. All facets of our national life are being challenged by potent social, economic and political realities.

Important decisions will have to be made, decisions that will call for wisdom, vision, a thorough awareness of the realities, the options available, and the course to make the right, even if painful, decisions.

These decisions will have to be made at a time in Asian history when upheavals have engulfed the rimland of Southeast Asia. The United Kingdom has modified its east of Suez politics, and the United States' Nixon Doctrine is about to realize itself. The ascendancy of Japan as a major power in Asia is becoming a reality. While Red China is perceptively changing its attitude towards the rest of the world, the problems of security it poses to the emerging nations in Asia remain.

This rapidly changing social and political environment is happening at a point in our national history when we are experiencing a spectacular physical growth.

To cite only a few of the accepted indicators of national progress: For successive years since 1966, the first year of my administration, we have consistently exceeded the growth rates we established as our targets. In Fiscal Year 1966-67, we planned a growth rate in the Gross National Product of 5.7%; actually, however, we achieved a growth rate of 6.2%. Again, in 1967-68, our target was a growth rate of 5.8%; our actual growth rate was 6.3%. And once again, in 1968-69, we planned a growth rate of 5.5%; our actual growth rate was 6.4%, or 1.1% more than we had planned.

The steady growth of the Gross National Product is even more graphic in its absolute figures from year to year. In 1968, GNP was P28,837 million; in 1969, it rose to P31,737 million; and in 1970, it climbed to P37,549 million.

Fiscal Year 1970 was an unusual year, because of our accumulated balance of payments situation. But even with the difficulties we had to suffer in this respect, we have, through sound fiscal management that the International Monetary Fund itself has acknowledged, been able to maintain a considerable momentum of national growth. From month to month last year, for instance, our operating cash deficits were considerably reduced or turned into surpluses, so that by the end of Calendar Year 1970, we had accumulated— in one year— a cash surplus of P168.8 million. If you compare this to the deficit of P946.81 million the previous year, which had been caused by necessary investments in the form of expenditures for roads and bridges, irrigation systems, schools, farm credit and barrio improvement, among others equally vital to progress, you have a vivid picture of our new national vigor.

Similarly, the total exports in Fiscal Year 1970 rose to $932 million, an increase of 11.1 per cent over the previous Fiscal Year. On the other hand, imports decreased by 5.5%, indicating not only the soundness and validity of our strategy in bridging our trade gap but our ability to discipline and direct ourselves.

Likewise, unemployment has been reduced from a high point of 9.5% in 1962 to 6.7% in 1969, contrary to the claims of our detractors.

The population has grown considerably. Our agricultural revolution has just been launched. Our economic growth in the final analysis has been healthy, even vigorous. Our social evolution has been dynamic. We have better communication and transportation systems than at any previous time in our history. Our maritime vessels now sail the high seas. Our aerial flag travels the routes of Europe, the Middle East and the Pacific.

There are those, however, who for reasons of their own would rather shut their eyes to these signs of undeniable growth and gain. There are incontrovertible evidences of attempts to erode our strength and stability through subversion, rumor-mongering and other maneuvers.

Today, these forces have shifted their assault to the AFP. The central issue of the day against the AFP is a simple directive of the Chief of Constabulary to his command — a reminder, no more no less, to enforce the law. Yet the concerted attack launched against it is out of proportion. Our critics want to make it appear that a “mailed fist” policy is in the offing. We are suddenly accused of stifling dissent, of attempting to impose a fascistic rule. May I ask, has anyone been arrested in this country and held under detention beyond the normal period without a formal hearing? How many have been incarcerated for having extremist views or for libeling me and my family?

Today, we find Maoist converts holding demonstrations and rallies in the streets, exalting the virtues of communism, openly glorifying the local communist leaders and inciting people to revolt. Yet they have not been arrested nor made to account for their unlawful acts.

This is my answer to the self-serving, unfounded charges that we have stifled dissent and the unfair charge of fascism.

I am pleased to know that the National Defense College and the Command and Staff College have markedly modified their respective curricula to reflect contemporary and foreseeable changes. Both colleges are responding to the demands of change.

Significant shifts are expected in the Command and General Staff College this year. There will be marked changes in its basic character, although the central purpose and objectives will remain the same.

For both colleges to maintain their effectiveness, as well as their responsiveness, innovative changes will be required from time to time.

These changes would require enlightened management, a clear-cut sense of direction and a realistic assessment of the performance of its graduates in their new responsibilities or positions.

I have been informed that by direction of the Secretary of National Defense, the programs of instruction of both the AFP Command and Central Staff College and the National Defense College have been revised to be more responsive to the needs of the Armed Forces and the country as a whole. I would like to congratulate Secretary Enrile for taking this step.

It is always a pleasure to see that more qualified people join the ranks of educated officials to fill the ever increasing needs of national security. For our major task remains the attainment of a political, economic and social climate that is conducive to the fulfillment of our people's aspirations and the preservation of our freedom.

We face challenging times. But our response to the challenge gives cause for hope. Our Gross National Product, as I have said, has increased; a favorable balance in our export-import trade now obtains; an orderly restructuring of our society is in the offing with the coming Constitutional Convention.

But to advance these gains and at the same time preserve our way of life, we as a people must change.

What we seriously need today is change within ourselves, a change in some of our traditionally personal-centered values, a redirection of our attitude outward, a change that starts from the individual and is directed towards the community, a change that asks especially of us in the government what we can give to, rather than what we can get from, the people.

This attitude begins with involvement, an involvement that comes from genuine concern for the people, a concern rooted in a positive approach regarding the exercise of authority. The Christian concept of authority is service; in a democratic country, therefore, authority connotes service to the people from whom this authority is derived. Service to be truly meaningful must be active, purposeful and altruistic.

It is with this in mind that I pose this challenge to you as graduates, to apply your newly acquired education to a positive activism that will overcome the inertia of complacency and cynicism, to an involvement that will answer those who agitate for violent change, and to a revitalized leadership that will allow maintaining our options for bringing about change in our society without first, destroying it.

I shall lead this change as I have pledged to lead a democratic revolution that is truly Filipino — proud, tolerant and free.

Address of President Marcos at the National Export Marketing Conference, May 26, 1971

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the National Export Marketing Conference

[Delivered on May 26, 1971]

Successful
A of Government and Business

Export
Joint

Marketing: Responsibility

AFTER WHAT I would call an overdose of comments voiced by quarters both well-meaning and otherwise, in criticism of government action, or in-action, it is cause for great relief and deep gratification to see a gathering of responsible citizens here this morning manfully facing their share of a chosen challenge. This challenge, in the words of your conference theme, is “successful export marketing,” a challenge that you — unlike so many of our fellow citizens who excel in less productive endeavors — have accepted as “a joint responsibility of government and business.”

I hope, however, that this conference will distinguish itself from number-less other conferences by going beyond the mere production of expert advice. I hope that this conference will lead to the generation of an actual resolve to move, to act, to do.

For the competitive position of our exports in world markets will not be enhanced by passively waiting for results after a diligent exchange of sparkling views. No share in the growth of world markets will come without our actively bidding for that share. And, admittedly, neither business nor government can undertake this effort apart from each other.

The government, as you know, has not been idle. Before exports became accepted by our leadership as the new wave of our future, there was the Investment Incentives Act which had started stimulating greater interest in this field of business. This encouragement was fashioned more concretely in the Export Incentives Act that came a little later. Priorities have likewise been offered to exports by the Central Bank and other government agencies, and export equipments and procedures have continually been simplified. The National Export Trading Corporation was organized, a foreign trade zone has been established in Bataan and an exports institute has just been set up by the Board of Investments.

The private sector, for its part, has moved with more measured pace. Rather; timidly, which is not surprising up to a point, the private sector has — to a limited extent — pioneered into new markets, developed new products, and grappled with the new sophistication required in world trade.

A look at our balance of payments, however, will show that we have yet to take maximum advantage of the array of opportunities available from our international trade.

For instance, for much longer than they should have, our exports have continued to be generally in the raw material form that is so vulnerable to wide price fluctuations. On the whole, these exports have been sold to the same traditional foreign markets. These facts are so well known that I repeat them here only for one reason. And that is, that our export methods have compounded the natural drawbacks arising from the type and limited marketing of our exports thus depriving us of the full potential returns even from the exportation of primary goods alone.

Nor have we been more imaginative or assiduous in consolidating our import requirements and securing the best terms in their procurement.

Small wonder then if, as was the case last year, we did labor like a mountain and brought forth no more than a mouse of a surplus in our balance of payments. We managed to raise our export volume by one-seventh but we had to cut our imports by nearly one-fifth. This severe drop in import volume gave rise to the dislocations that we see now in our economy. And all this for nearly naught because, while our export prices went up, the average prices of our imports rose by almost four times as much.

Clearly we are getting the short end in our terms of trade. And if we are to correct this situation and maximize the benefits possible from expanding and diversifying our foreign trade, we must get organized— not just on the government's side of it, nor the private sector's separately, but together. The private sector, as indicated by your conference theme, has accepted this joint, responsibility. The government and business then must marshall both their forces so that we may be able not only to sell but also to buy in world's markets, wherever these may turn out to be for us, at terms that can best promote our, national development.

To begin to succeed in our joint export marketing effort, business must weed out of its ranks the dishonest and the inefficient. It must avoid at all cost such malpractices as substandard shipments. It should coordinate and synchronize for greater economy, therefore more savings and higher earnings. It must be more willing and better prepared to take risks and venture into new products and markets.

Our businessmen should rethink their positions, their attitudes that prevent them from joining to their greater advantage larger units or associations, sharing technical information, and indeed ownership and management.

Even as we are alert to the competition around us, let us learn from our competitors. These multi-purpose organizations protect Japan's terms of trade, integrate domestic production, transport and distribution where these are required to maintain national competitiveness. Even as they earn healthy profits for their own operations, these trading companies — in the national interest — push their country's exports relentlessly in every market, getting them the best prices and largest market penetration possible. These same companies are responsible for securing again at the best terms obtainable, the materials, technology and capital that Japan's industries must have.

In meeting its responsibilities as helper, protector, and regulator, our government has recently actively promoted what I hope will eventually be the Philippine application of Japan's eminently successful trading company concept.

In support of this effort, I believe the government must consider certain undertakings promptly. For one thing, government financial institutions should coordinate their allocation programs for the various financial requirements for imports, exports and capital goods procurement. Special tariff benefits for the use of Philippine transport vessels should be in order, along with other forms of fiscal exports assistance. The benefits from the Export Incentives Act could be so refined that they would provide better encouragement to exports. Export credit insurance should complement this effort, as should the coordinated export promotion and market penetration work of our commercial attaches.

In addition, government must keep trying to allocate resources where they are most needed by the economy and in which they can be most efficiently utilized, withholding such resources from inefficient or useless undertakings. It should step up the development of our shipping industry, of waterways, harbors and ports. It would have to be even more selective for exports, as well as for smaller and newer industries. Finally government should consider concluding agreements that would be conducive to trading with other and more countries.

For its part, our private sector must consider giving its maximum cooperation in the organization and cooperation, particularly at its initial stage, of an international trading corporation patterned after Japan's "shoji kaisha." Assistance will be especially vital from certain industries which are in a position to lend substantial help. Considering these industries have been the beneficiaries of special support from the economy service whose profits are not confined to themselves.

Specifically, such industries could set the example for the private sector. They might course their trade as much as possible, if not exclusively, through the country's own trading company, at least for a reasonable trial period. This cooperation should enable the trading company to prove whether it can indeed perform better for both the economy and the industries that trade through it.

The cooperation from such industries would involve synchronizing their production as well as their materials handling and distribution in order to minimize idle time in loading operations. It would also entail scheduling backhaul shipments that would utilize the return voyages of vessels, which would be on time charter for greater economy.

Commercial banks could help too by enlarging their participation in the area of export financing. This help, I am glad to note, is increasingly becoming evident.

It is my sincere hope that the private sector, by itself and without wasting the nation's time, will find it both right and rewarding to identify public welfare with its own gain.

In that event, government need not try to use its persuasive abilities on business. It could then concentrate on doing its share of the joint responsibility in successful export marketing, instead of having to convince business that a good part of the cost of doing business in this country is the national interest.

Address of President Marcos at the opening ceremonies of the 18th Annual Convention of Rural Bankers Association of the Philippines, May 27, 1971

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the opening ceremonies of the 18th Annual Convention of Rural Bankers Association of the Philippines

[Delivered at Pines Hotel, Baguio City, May 27, 1971]

Rural Credit: A Pillar of Agriculture

I WISH TO congratulate the rural bankers who, jointly with the Central Bank of the Philippines, are holding their 18th Annual Convention at Baguio City on the theme: The Effective Utilization of Rural Bank Credit to Meet the Changing Pattern in our Rural Economy.

I have watched with pride the phenomenal growth of the rural banks in our country. Today, it is the most extensive rural banking system anywhere in Asia. I understand that you have grown into a network of 500 rural banks with combined resources of P650 million, as of December 1970. You have generated savings deposits with a cumulative total of P237 million. Your loan portfolio has reached a level of P1.16 billion and that some 1.9 million farmers have been extended your financial assistance. By any standard, this is a significant contribution to the economic development of the Philippines, as your loans go where they are needed most— to our small farmers and entrepreneurs.

As a Congressman from the Second District of Ilocos Norte, eighteen years ago, I had the privilege of sponsoring in the House of Representatives the bill which was subsequently enacted as Republic Act 720, otherwise known as the Rural Banks Act. Since then, and whenever it was within my power to do so, I have consistently lent support and encouragement to the expansion of our rural banking system.

You all know that our economy still relies heavily on the agricultural sector. About 36 per cent of our national income or roughly P10 billion is derived from 'agriculture. We have 9 million hectares of land planted to food crops. And yet much remains to be done. We must accelerate our food production through improved methods of cultivation, planting, cropping and marketing, to meet the ever-increasing needs of our expanding population and be able to gear our economy for greater exports.

That is why, after consultations with fiscal and monetary authorities, I have made it an overriding objective of this administration to accomplish in those five years what had not been achieved in two decades of agricultural development.

We are harnessing the resources of government and all available financing from world organizations, like the US AID and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for agriculture expansion. The Central Bank of the Philippines, through its sale of certificates of indebtedness, shall be able to draw P600 million from urban centers this year. The money will be channeled to the rural areas for production loans through the rural banking system.

For this reason, we will encourage the establishment of more rural banks. We want to double the present number to 1,000 rural banks within 5 years. This would require P3.7 billion in resources sufficient to generate a P4.8 billion loan volume a year to an estimated 4 million farmers.

The Supervised Credit Scheme which will characterize this massive financing for rural development calls for the stationing of one food production specialist in every rural bank of the country. I understand that for this coming crop season, the Central Bank has recruited and trained 150 government food production specialists for initial placement in rural banks of land reform areas. The Central Bank's target is 1,000 food specialists drawn from fresh agricultural graduates and who will go through an intensive training program at UP Los Baños.

Our more immediate concern are the 176,000 tenant-lessees in the 16 provinces declared as land reform areas. These farmers sadly lack the financing to give true meaning to their "emancipation" from the age-old bondage to the soil.

But social justice demands that these farmers be helped; hence, the Supervised Credit Scheme which the government is going to provide them, through the rural banks, on good faith alone. It is here where the expertise of the food production technician — living in the barrios with me farmers — can assure proper use of credit, increased production, and better market returns, to assure repayment of the loan as they fall due.

Criticisms have been levelled from some quarters that the government is favoring the rural banks to the prejudice of other entities also engaged in providing credit to the farmers. I say that the CB-Rural Bank scheme for supervised credit merely complements the efforts of other government or private entities.

To cite specific examples: The Development Bank of the Philippines, for all its massive resources, has been able to grant loans to an average of 15,000 farmers each year. ACA meets the requirements of just about 20 per cent of our farmers. That leaves a wide area in which millions of farmers have no available financing.

I appeal to, the rural banks to respond wholeheartedly to this program of Government to provide massive financing for tenant-lessees to enable their transition to owners of the land they till. I can see several avenues of reform within the rural banking system itself.

First, rural banks must exert greater efforts to gain deeper acceptance in their respective communities. One way is to take more stockholders, while retaining a reasonable degree of control. They could also reexamine their organizational set-up to see if it could stand improvement to meet expanded operations. And finally, I ask every rural banker to regard his profession as a splendid opportunity to serve the people and the country.

Address of President Marcos at the 18th National Convention of Manufacturers and Producers, May 28, 1971

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 18th National Convention of Manufacturers and Producers

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel, May 28, 1971]

The Challenge of Reform

LONG AFTER MY second term is ended, I shall certainly cherish it as one of the major achievements of my two administrations the fact that I have never failed to accept your invitation to address your annual convention.

This is my sixth year, and I think this is my sixth appearance before the chamber. Knowing fully well that every year you have your crises and grievances, some fanciful and some valid, I come back every year, I keep coming back to absorb more blows from the chamber because I know that they are given with sincerity and given with the hope that they will help in attaining needed reforms. For reformation in government and society is not just a sudden discovery of the year 1970 or '71, for government and society live upon change and reformation. Man himself started out with a compulsion for reformation, for if he had not reformed, like the other elements of his environment, he would have disappeared with them.

I am pleased to note the healthy and continuing pre-occupation of our private industry with social involvement in our task of nation building. Today, you reiterate in your 18th convention theme — “Philippine Industry and the Challenge of Reforms” — this responsible and sustained commitment to larger purposes than the profit motive and certainly nothing can encourage a government leader more than this. I feel that history shall long remember this timely harnessing of your entrepreneurial dynamism to candidly reappraise your role in our imperative drama of national reformation.

The challenge of reforms is not a monopoly of any segment of our society today. When we first called upon all our people to initiate the democratic revolution, it was precisely to underscore the universal application of an emerging mandate for national reforms. Leaders of government and captains of industry, the professional, the student, the housewife, and the ordinary citizen — all alike are confronted with the challenge to institute reforms in their own distinctive spheres of influence. But if we are truly to succeed in a rebirth of national purpose and achievement, it is imperative that whatever desired reforms are to be realized must be a common endeavor and not a partisan, selfish, private solution; must affect not only institutions but also the hearts of men; must not consist of words alone but of actions; must pervade all segments and levels of our society with unbiased prosecution and intent of purpose. The very soul of such a national reformation clearly dictates not only a political, but also a social as well as cultural, moral and economic renovation.

This indeed is the answer of an ordinary citizen, or of any man for that matter, to the cry we often hear from some of our desperate youths. They say, reform! And add, win reform by bloody revolution. Always, the ordinary citizen responds, reform yes; bloody revolution, no! For we can still attain reform by peaceful means. And, therefore, I am personally encouraged when I hear of the efforts of such organizations as the Philippine Chamber of Industries, to initiate reforms within its ranks, and to speak of social conscience as a part of business and, at least temporarily, superseding the profit motive.

That our political institutions need reform, there is hardly anyone who will deny. Indeed, a fundamental revision of these institutions is the very purpose of the coming Constitutional Convention. I was asked by the leaders of the House of Representatives and of the Senate, before the approval of the Constitution Act, whether it was timely to call the Constitutional Convention in view of the confusion and chaos apparently prevailing in our country. And my answer was an unmitigated and uncompromising, yes, it is timely for this is the answer to those who seek revolution, as it is the answer to our problems and the riddles of our epoch. The awakening expectations of our people express their best wishes and hopes for success in this historic endeavor to the members of the Constitutional Convention which I now reiterate and express here.

And yet, we must all realize that desired reforms in our political life need not wait for an amendment of our fundamental law. Indeed, it has been one of the priority objectives of my administration to complete the vital overhaul of our entire government structure before the end of this current fiscal year. The Reorganization Commission which I have directed to undertake this comprehensive renovation of our governmental machinery is even now finalizing its recommendation. And its recommendations, which have now leaked to the press are even now meeting with criticism from all quarters. I am sure that this recommendation will reflect a new and revitalized blueprint of governmental institutions more responsive to the socio-economic urgencies of our times, and the need for speedy dispensation of justice as well as of social welfare.

Because we firmly believe that justice delayed is justice denied, I have continuously tried my best not only to appoint men of unquestioned moral integrity, judicial competence, and human compassion to the judiciary, but also to fill every vacant bench with the least delay. And yet, we must confess that the task of instituting reforms can sometimes proceed at a pace to provoke everybody's impatience and the pessimism of some. You will, for instance, recall our recent temporary financial difficulties and our effort to institute financial reforms. The pessimists started heralding the threat of financial chaos and the ultimate collapse of our economy. We can now smile back at such dire predictions. For our adoption of an exchange reform program that featured the floating rate, complemented by the passage of the Stabilization Act, not only restored equilibrium in our balance of payments but also established monetary stability in our domestic front. And, perhaps, it is timely too at this stage to remind ourselves of why we acquired the balance of payments problems. The encouragement of manufacturing and production from 1966 to 1969 resulted in the fact that in 1969, 90 per cent or more of the dollar expenditures went to factories and raw materials, with raw materials constituting about 45 per cent. In short, in that year, 90 per cent of all the dollars that we spent abroad went to you; the manufacturers and the producers, and this resulted in the foreign exchange problem for that year.

The problem called for the adoption of the floating rate and other measures necessary to solve the said problem of balance of payments. The manufacturers and producers grudgingly agreed to the measures of self-restraint, and I say this because I heard objections from some quarters, but all in all you did agree voluntarily. The private economic sector by and large has cooperated with the Central Bank, the monetary authorities, and with the government. And so I have come tonight to congratulate you for it. I came here to say to you that we have cleared the hump. We ended the year 1970 with a comfortable surplus of $112 million in stark contrast to the deficit of $68 million in 1969. But although we can now take pride in the continuing surplus position in our balance of payments—indeed for the month of April we enjoyed a net surplus of $27 million — this is however, no time to throw fiscal and financial caution to the winds. We shall, therefore, continue the strict adoption of the following financial policies: No new foreign borrowings shall be allowed in over-crowded areas of business activity. In contrast, preferences for new external debts shall be accorded to new ventures and/or expansion in (1) export-oriented industries; and (2) BOI approved priorities. Domestic savings shall be encouraged thru more effective monetary, credit, and fiscal instruments, even as continued vigilance in maintaining relatively stable prices will be increased.

I am glad to note that your responsible and resilient entrepreneurship has consistently supported my industrial strategy of promoting the development of intermediate and capital goods industries; of accelerating the economic chain of backward and forward linkages; of encouraging export-oriented industries which utilize indigenous raw materials, and generate greater employment opportunities; and lastly, of hastening the geographical dispersal of our industrial development. There was a question asked of me sometime ago as to why we were encouraging economic investment in the far south, in Mindanao. The answer is simple. It is because of the fact that Mindanao is below the typhoon belt, and we have suffered severely from typhoons in the last year-and-a-half. The record of your response to this industrial reformation is, heartening. For you have already registered with the Board of Investments some 171 enterprises with a total capitalization of P1.4 billion in peso counterpart. It is particularly noteworthy that 48 of these registered firms have accepted their socio-economic responsibility of pioneering in such risky areas as pulp and paper, nickel smelting, communications equipment, machinery and other industrial requirements. In terms of employment generation these registered firms created a total of 29,694 direct and new employment opportunities, of which 12,853 are in Mindanao, 1,586 in the Visayas, and 15,625 in Luzon outside of the Greater Manila area. I am told that the direct labor generation of these enterprises could very well add another 30,000.

These are the major reforms in our industrial development, which I propose to continue in joint collaboration with you. For I believe that the narrow, inward-looking and superficial economic strategy of our early days in import-substitution is no longer adequate to provide sufficient employment opportunities for our people, raise the nation's standards of living, and bring about greater economic stability. I propose to continue and accelerate our national drive to awaken a sharp and intense export-consciousness among our businessmen. And to this end I propose to tear down the greenhouse atmosphere of excessive tariff protection within which many of our domestic enterprises have long continued to be infant industries; and make them competitive in the world market. However, don't be shocked by this statement; this is a long range plan. The Export Incentives Act of 1970 shall be reexamined in order to better reflect the types of benefits our exporters need. And in order to insure the equitable distribution of the benefits of our economic development, I shall continue my fight against oligarchies, and insist that the ownership of our enterprises be open to equity participation by as wide a segment as possible of our people. And small business shall not be forgotten. The entire machinery of my administration shall be harnessed to promote the socially desirable and profitable interaction between industrial complexes and small-scale suppliers.

In agriculture, we shall persevere in our campaign to promote the green revolution. We shall not rest until a land reform program truly and justly restoring the farmer to his rightful dignity as a co-producer of, and a co-sharer in the nation's prosperity will have been operational. However, there is a new strategy with respect to land reform. Land reform is not just conversion of the sharecropper into a leasehold farmer, or the distribution of land acquired by government, each farm lot chopped into small family units of 5 hectares. This is self-defeating because in the next or second generation the landholding will be so small that they would not be economical. And, therefore, we now attack the problem of land reform and tenancy reform through cooperatives. We are now busy in Magalang, Pampanga and in Llanera, Nueva Ecija, setting up this project. It is our hope that before any land is distributed, every farmer or tenant who intends to acquire his own property shall be obliged to participate in cooperatives, producers cooperatives, consumers cooperatives, irrigation cooperatives; for cooperatives have been the secret of many countries in the world. In Magalang and Llanera, we have adopted the Moshav style system of cooperatives from Israel. And I notice that the ambassador of Israel is here, and I would like to thank him on behalf of our government for the help that he has extended to us.

At the same time, we shall encourage further expenditures not only of the government but of the financial institutions of government on two premier areas. These areas are massive housing and electrification. On housing, we intend to spend or have available for expenditure in this year alone a total of P400 million. It is my hope that the private sector will come and participate by presenting proposals for private land developers in the construction of low cost housing. It is my policy to see to it that the P400 million, which shall come principally from bonds and from the GSIS and the SSS, will be utilized principally by the private sector and not by the government.

The second area of expenditures is electrification. We have a program of spending which entails P600 million in the next several years for a nationwide electrification program. This program shall include sources of funds like reparations, USAID, loans and the general fund of the government. The program is properly funded and it is proceeding very well.

Much as we desire to institute reforms, unless our citizenry and the private organizations participate in their crystallization, their formulation, their implementation, this monumental task facing our nation today will be as hollow as reeds by the riverside. This is why I find meaning and dignity in your role, as expressed in your resolution, in seeking reforms not only in your ranks but in government and in every segment of our society, reforms to be won peacefully. This is why I find meaning and dignity in the role our students and workers play as they peacefully demonstrate through the streets of our cities. For as long as they carry their placards peacefully and they cry out, their grievances within the limits set by the law, they truly form part of the vital, dynamic nation's conscience. They awaken our people to their rights and their dignity as a human person; they remind the leaders of government and the private sector of their responsibilities transcending the private confines of self-interest; they set the pace and project the time constraint in this historic movement to satisfy pent-up urgencies and socio-economic expectations born of centuries of oppression. Understandably, the impatience of youth and the bitterness of long-suffering test, to its very limits, the law as an instrument of social change. But I continue to have faith that in the law is the only dignified instrument of social change, in the law is the true dynamism of national reformation.

In meeting the challenge of reforms facing the nation, today, lies the rebirth of our purposes and our dignity as a godly people. History is witness that our resilience and Oriental discipline have been more than a resourceful match against similar challenge in the past. But let us begin with reforms in our own hearts. Let us not cry out for political reform while intent upon concerning political favors at the expense of others. Let us not cry for social and economic reforms while not paying our workers even the old minimum wage. If we reform as individual citizens, this spirit of personal rebirth will be the momentum of a positive, national reformation. For have said repeatedly in the past that the secret of success in nation-building is that each and every citizen—child, man or woman — contributes, even a most modest share, to nation-building. I repeat, no matter how modest that share of each citizen may be, if it is given freely and from the heart, it shall participate in the great victories that we shall achieve.

And the challenge to begin is now!

Address of President Marcos at the 33rd Foundation Day of the Presidential Guard Battalion, May 28, 1971

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 33rd Foundation Day of the Presidential Guard Battalion

[Delivered at the P. G. B. Parade Ground, May 28, 1971]

Restraint with Firmness

I FEEL THAT I join you here today, on this the 33rd anniversary of the Malacañang Presidential Guard, not as one more guest in your celebration but as one who comes to pay tribute to all that those years represented for our Republic and for those of us who have known your steadfast loyalty and affection in their years of service to the Presidency of our country.

In short, I come here today not only as President but as a citizen chosen to represent other Presidents in the past, and to come to offer full appreciation, indeed an accolade, for all the services not only of the men presently constituting the Presidential Guard Battalion but of all the officers and men who have served in this unit.

With every passing year, this occasion increasingly becomes for me a deep personal encounter with friends and supporters, where words often fail to express one's gratitude and admiration. Though sometimes failing to express such words of appreciation and gratitude, I console myself with the fact that between soldiers, and I consider myself still a soldier, there need not much be said. In our relationship, let it be known that whether I am here or not to express gratitude for myself and for my family and for the country, that gratitude is implicit and accords to each and everyone of you. Let me say simply that in the nearly six years that I have served in the Presidency, it has to be served by this elite corps of soldiers and I am truly beholden to all of you.

When 38 years ago, the Presidential Guard was founded, we were in the midst of a transition towards being a fully sovereign and independent nation. With its founding began this long tradition of service and dedication to the national leadership in our country which is well-known to many of us. It is as much your pride as mine that the Presidency and the government we serve are sovereign in this land.

The import of this occasion would be altogether lost if we failed to recognize the sense of tradition that animates your work and relates it to the work of your predecessors and the whole of our democratic tradition. For it seems to me that you embody the nation's hopes to keep our democratic institutions intact and strong.

In an earlier time the idea of safeguarding our way of life from subversion and aggression was readily recognized by everyone, and our response to the dangers was swift and resolute.

We live now in different times, in times of great anxiety and expectation of confusion in which the dangers posed before the nation are complex and various. For the enemy now utilizes more sophisticated weapons and more devious means to wreck our democracy and to destroy our freedom. It is less easy to see today the dangers that threaten our democracy as it was two or three decades ago. There are those among our people who, hungry for advancement and progress, find it more and more difficult to understand that to find our way to the future does not require cursing and repudiating the past and destruction and killing and bloodshed. The killing of brother by brother.

The unsettled character of our times poses dangers to our democracy, in forms we never anticipated. This present crisis will require of each of us, specially of you and me, to keep events from getting ahead of us and to keep the ship of state from sinking in the eye of the typhoon.

This is a difficult task, for our response, if it is to be truly reflective of the democracy we are sworn to uphold, must never trample on the bedrock of freedom and civil liberties, which our constitution guarantees to every citizen and president of this country.

Our response must be tempered with caution even in dealing with those who are sworn to bring down the government. And you in the Presidential Guard Battalion as well as in the Presidential Security Unit have succeeded in demonstrating to everyone here and abroad that indeed the man in uniform is a statesman capable of recognizing threats against his democratic government but at the same time so free and capable of appreciating freedom that he allows the exercise of that same freedom by the very enemies he fights.

I have watched you on guard duty, I have watched you standing firm against riots and demonstrations, from January of 1970 to the present, and I have admired your statesmanship, the diplomatic manner in which you have handled angry young children who, thinking that it is in their power to wreck not only Malacañang but also the presidency, over extend themselves; and I have seen the same young men and women throw lies at your face and you just smile; insult and your families and you just stand firm, silent and forbearing, and I have admired you for all this. And so, today, I salute each and everyone of you for your statesmanship and for your professional conduct as the guardian of the President and his family.

Let us never forget that while this may be a time of confusion and a time of chaos, this too is a time of opportunity. This is a time when each and every man is offered the opportunity to demonstrate once again his capability to utilize to the utmost the time that passes by and to demonstrate the strength and character of our nation and of our race.

Let me remind each and everyone of you that as we meet the enemy and face up to the dangers inherent in such a confrontation, we must meet this challenge with strength, with courage, and with patience — and by so demonstrating this courage, this patience, this understanding and breadth of mind, we establish for all time that the Filipino people are capable of freedom, are capable of greatness.

In a way, therefore, you in the Presidential Guard Battalion have demonstrated by your behavior what we ask of every Filipino, be he in government or in the private sector, that he should be a true, a new and enlightened Filipino, a man who understands the basis of his freedom and understands the weaknesses of the enemy. A man who, realizing all of this still stands firm on his principles and on his beliefs, while at the same time granting to everyone the same rights that he values.

So, my friends, members and officers of the Presidential Guard Battalion, I, as Commander-in-Chief, again commend you, and I express to you the personal thanks of the President and his family, as well as, I am certain, the thanks of the entire Filipino people.

Address of President Marcos at the Fourth Seminar Workshop on Rural Electrification for Provincial Electric Cooperatives Team, May 29, 1971

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Fourth Seminar Workshop on Rural Electrification for Provincial Electric Cooperatives Team

[Delivered in Malacañang, May 29, 1971]

To Light Up the Rural Areas

I COME TO congratulate the graduates of which there are, I understand, 64. This is not the first time that I have spoken before a group of graduates such as you; I think this is the fourth time. However, this event, the graduation of this class, is a most important event because we are moving inexorably towards the organization of the machinery that will implement one of the most important programs of government today. There are several areas in which the government, the private sector and the citizenry are joined in common effort. One of these important areas is the cooperative effort in land reform and tenancy reform. Thus we have the Moshav type of farming in Magalang, Pampanga and in Llanera, Nueva Ecija. We are also joined in promoting community development in general, thus we have the self-help projects handled by the Presidential Arm for Community Development and its counterparts in the barrios.

The national housing effort is also a program where both the government and the private sector are teamed in partnership. We intend to spend this year P400 million for housing. From studies we have made, we found that we need to build every year 470,000 dwellings, most of which, of course, will be in the urban areas, which means about 370,000 units in the urban areas and 100,000 in the rural areas. Incidentally, this is not an overall target, it is an annual target, a yearly objective. But all of these are, in my point of view, minor compared to that of lighting up the rural areas.

Let me call to your attention some of the data on electricity. We have a total of 1,389 municipalities throughout the Philippines, but only 706 of this enjoy electrical power, which means that 683 municipalities are, from the modern and all points of view, in darkness. Out of 34 million Filipinos, and this figure is based on the survey conducted sometime ago, before we reached the total of about 37.8 million, only 7.3 million or less than 20 per cent of the population had electrical power available. This means that only 20 per cent of our people are serviced by electricity. And yet power is a fundamental requisite in the modernizing process.

The teams that have gone into ten days of intensive teaching are composed of representatives of the PACD, the representatives of the Cooperatives Office, the representatives of local governments, the representatives of the civic groups and the representatives of the teachers. A team of five. This team is properly called the Provincial Electric Cooperative Team, the PECT. These are the teams that will go to the barrios and municipalities and provinces, to attain several objectives. One of them, as has been explained by the Chairman of the Board of the NEA, is to gather data on which feasibility studies will be based. And the next, to organize cooperatives and to set the atmosphere for the reception of this more sophisticated organizational approach towards electricity. This team, therefore, will be the modern Prometheus, who shall bring light to the dark, progress where there is stagnation, knowledge where there is ignorance, and abundance where there is scarcity, health where there is disease. You can, therefore, see the importance of these teams.

So, I congratulate those who have participated in the seminar. Those who have organized it, initiated it, those who are in the teaching staff, in the administration, and those who have participated as students, and are now graduating from this seminar. I need not go into the uses of electric power. I need not cite to you the deleterious effect of lack of power in most of the areas of the Philippines. But I merely cite to you the role of government. Government must be the initiating power, but government alone will not suffice.

Let me point out to you the percentages of ownership of privately-owned electrical corporations and those which are government-owned. As of now, the present figures show that of all power plants operating today 68 per cent are privately-owned and 32 per cent are government-owned. In most instances, electricity is considered a luxury commodity. The cost of electric power is much too high even for our middle class.

There you see the problem that we all face. The problem that government and the private sector and the entire nation face. The purpose is not only to establish electric power, the sources of electric power, but distribute it at cost well within the reach of our common people. It is necessary, therefore, for government to set the tone and provide the momentum. We must now, at this early stage, start. In fact, my feeling is that we should have initiated this a long, long time, ago, say, several decades ago, because this is a 20-year program, and this should have been initiated immediately after the war. But be that as it may, the purpose here is to create an organization and set the atmosphere so that our people will not only welcome cooperatives for electricity, but demand it.

And I think we shall succeed.

At the same tune, the organization of this program must be moved and so oriented that it will acquire such a direction and momentum that no matter who may be President, or no matter who may be running the country, nothing short of a complete upheaval of the country and the nation would be able to block its attainment.

The program is well funded. We have envisioned an expenditure of P600 million over, a period of several years, coming from the general funds of government, the reparations, USAID, from loans abroad, and donations. This program has been well studied. It is one of the most thoroughly studied programs of the government. It is headed by dynamic organizers and executives, and now we have the basic structure in the provinces, the foundation as it were. The foundational structure is composed of the PECT, or the Provincial Electric Cooperatives Team.

That is why I have taken time out to come and meet with you, and to extend my congratulations to you. I know that I have congratulated you in the past for many achievements, but this is something new, this is something noble. Just as we are initiating cooperatives in farming, in tenancy, cooperatives in the consuming areas, cooperatives in the small industries area, we are now proceeding into cooperatives in electricity. This is going to be a key, opening various areas of activity. It is my feeling that if the electrification program fails, many of the programs of the government and of the private sector will fail as well. Even the small industries program, which must depend on the capability of the participants to absorb all the talents and all the money that we are now making available. All these will not be absorbed by the common people nor by the small producers unless we electrify the areas in which they live and in which they trade. I point out to you merely a few of the instances which indicate the importance this particular area of activity.

And so, may friends allow me therefore as President, along with Mrs. Marcos, to congratulate all of you. I would like to thank all those who have helped in this particular endeavor, and in this particular instance I would like to point to one special benefactor, and that is the United States government. We have included in the program the contribution of the USAID, and we have with us the local Executive Director, no other than Mr. Tom Niblock, whom I would like to thank personally.

I remember that when the First Lady went to Washington she was invited by President Nixon to visit one of their cooperatives in one of the farming areas, in Virginia. And she used the personal helicopter of the President, accompanied by no other than the First lady of the United States, to visit Virginia and to see the cooperatives at work in that area.

I recall this incident to indicate to you the deep interest of the United States government in the success of this particular program. And I reciprocate the generosity of the US government, and I assure them that all the resources of our government and the capability, the strength of our people, shall be utilized to bring about the success of this program.

Address of President Marcos at the Opening of the Constitutional Convention, June 1, 1971

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Opening of the Constitutional Convention

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel, June 1, 1971]

Drafting the New Constitution

I HAVE COME at your behest to express in person the fervent hope that I share with our people—that you may succeed in your noble task to meet the great expectations of our people in the framing of a new Philippine Constitution.

The great streams of our national history starting with the development of the ancient villages to the landing of the barangays in Panay, to the great migrations to the North, the revolution of 1896, Bataan and Corregidor, all these streams of the national history of our country have inexorably led to this high point of our history — this watershed. This was the great desire of our forbears, their vision, their one dream, this dream of freedom.

And today, at last, we come to its true fulfillment. For there is no greater act of freedom than the writing of a Constitution. As against this ultimate act in our history—all others are inert or at best a leisurely movement.

But the writing of a Constitution is the coming all at once together of the past, the present and the future in one great single movement, in one upheaval and in one cry.

For as our forbears in the past sought to establish the first republic in Asia, today you start to test a democratic principle, to test whether democracy is self-regenerating, self-recuperating, self-healing. Even if an unjust social and economic order imposes itself upon a democratic community and corrupts it, the people can, if they so will, rectify such an error. Society can be revolutionized by constitutional means, not by destroying democratic institutions but by strengthening them.

Today, you start to perform this task for the previous Constitution, the old Constitution, was cast in a mold largely initiated and conceived by an alien power which ultimately approved it. But this Constitution you write beginning today must be, and I hope will be, a Philippine Constitution. The dreams that it must fulfill must be Philippine dreams. The Constitution that you write is envisioned by our people as an embodiment of their own ideals, of the Filipino hope for a Philippine democratic society, for Philippine progress built upon Filipino energies, opportunities and resources.

And as you the distinguished delegates begin to perform this noble mission I feel that I too am called to an equal task. This task is the creation of an atmosphere, the moral climate of support and coordination, of cooperation, without which this great opportunity for human growth in this part of the world must certainly lapse unfulfilled. I have come today to offer this needed support and cooperation to the Constitutional Convention.

For the price of a successful Constitution, new or old, is national unity. The Constitution alone or the blueprint of ideals and principles by themselves cannot assure us that we will attain the abundant, the peaceful, the meaningful life which is the object of all our ardent desires. Freedom is an act of the will.

And so, today, my friends, as you begin your monumental task, go into this historic mission with the confidence of the entire Filipino people in your ability and willingness to discard narrow interests so that neither political ends, personal benefit, nor fatalism or fanaticism, shall stand in the way of a Charter, a Constitution, that shall accurately express the true and lofty aspirations not of any one exclusive segment of our people but of the entire Filipino people.

We shall pray, we shall hope, that a peaceful spirit shall descend upon the proceedings, and upon the delegates, so that harmony shall illumine the course of this convention, so that conflicting points of view may yield to common and harmonious comprehension, and so that ill-will or hostility shall not undermine the work of this convention.

The new tribalism which is engendered by organized anarchy must be discarded in favor of national unity. It is necessary once again that we demonstrate not only to our people, but to ourselves and to the world that the Filipino people indeed desire a democratic community which shall seek the lofty aspirations not only of the present generation but of all generations to come of Filipinos.

It is true indeed that no Constitution whether old or revised can by itself solve the intricate problems of any nation nor can it offer any magic or easy cures; but a Constitution is a testament to reason and, therefore, it can constitute rational basis for confronting national problems. Everyone in our nation knows that we embark upon a crucial national endeavor which is entitled to the fullest recognition, respect, and attention by everyone. For you write a Constitution which shall be the fountainhead of wisdom and if in the days to come our country should ever meet any new dangers, there shall be this Constitution that you write, guiding our people in acting with courage. And if in the long and tortuous years of this young, this small, this aspiring Republic, our people should ever be tempted into erratic and unwise acts, there shall be this Constitution that you write to lead our people back to sanity, back to wisdom, back to sobriety and to patience.

For the Constitution that you write shall be the bedrock of our Republic, and you start to write it today.

And so may God grant you the wisdom, the courage, and the nobility to make of this new enterprise a noble task.

Address of President Marcos at the presentation of awards by the Cultural Heritage Awards Committee, June 12, 1971

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the presentation of awards by the Cultural Heritage Awards Committee

[Delivered at the National Library Building, June 12, 1971]

A Revolution of the Essence

IKINAGAGALAK KONG LUMAHOK sa seremonyang paggawad ng gantimpala sa mga katangi-tanging ambag ng iba't-ibang larangan at ang mga minana nating Kalinangan.

I greet each and every one of the awardees. I am indeed very happy to be here with you.

My mission here, as I see it, today is primarily the pleasurable one of handling out the awards to those among our creative people who have by their work distinguished themselves and, I would like to think, enriched much more the contemporary cultural scene. Whatever message I have to impart, by virtue of this speech I have been called upon to deliver, is secondary. But only because I have taken it for granted that my audience tonight is composed in the main by artists, the creative people from whom we expect to get the message rather than the other way around.

Being a person who has long ago been touched by the creative urge, and who has long presumed to have a kinship with artists and who, moreover, has always had a high respect for the creative life, I have nurtured a few ideas relative to your position in society which I want to share with you.

In recent years, the world has been witness to a growing upheaval in the human community. Old values and old shibboleths are being questioned, if not being shattered. One feels that the world today is on the verge of a total transformation, perhaps a change far more dramatic and over-reaching than the French, the American and the Russian revolutions which each in its own way changed the patterns of the social order.

If this is true, if we are on the eve of a total transformation of all that we have known and believed in, then perhaps we should now give deeper thought to what lies ahead, and what we as individuals and as national communities can do to help shape and control this transformation. In the past, from Robespierre to Jefferson to Lenin, the revolutions which took place were primarily political, with much of the force these upheavals generated focusing on the shift of power and wealth, from one sector of society to another. But the essence of the human condition remained more or less the same.

Today, there is a far more exciting sense of meaningful change, all the more compelling because unlike past revolutions, the change we feel is readily perceptible and may move very much faster. This view is plausible measured by the present day technology, which has shrunk the world, sent reverberations from one part of the globe to the other, and in the truest sense, gathered the world into one human family.

If this were not true, we in the Philippines would not feel the impact of change going on in America, in Europe, and even in the African heartland. We would still be merely engrossed with the development of only those sinews as would provide us with no more than our most immediate and essential needs like food and shelter. But we are already looking beyond food and shelter, we are looking to a change in spirit and values as well.

This change, once it gains momentum, will cause severe dislocations. Even development and growth occasion a certain measure of disorder. To those who have led complacent lives, these ripples of disorder cause anxieties, if not fear. Even worse, they cause despair. How many among us were ready to flee land when our problems mounted, and were compounded by the emerged protest movements? How many of you in Forbes Park left your homes to refuge in hotels when the demonstrations came? But progress has ever been thus, and each watershed in history produced aberrations. The world survived because of human resiliency and because of the presence of strong leaders.

The coming change in our world would again require leadership of a high order, a leadership which will have to contend with moral choices as well.

Against the backdrop of a quarter century of rapid change, the change-over from the industrial to the technotronic age — that is, the age of technology electronics—it would seem that the years ahead, even the next decade, will even more precipitate in altering our world. There are understandable apprehensions from highly respectable quarters, including those in the cultural artistic community. We have such debates as those between the scientist and artist going on now, each questioning the other's place in the world of tomorrow, each fearful of the other's ideas and actions.

We are aware, of course, of the oft-repeated responsibility of the scientist for his inventions, some of which have created the specter of a doomed world mainly because of atomic fission, and others creating the present dilemma environmental pollution as against greater technological advance.

Even in our small country, struggling to attain industrial capability when the more developed world is already striding towards new and strange frontiers, we are already confronted by the same problems and paradoxes. We, too, we the Filipinos, must make choices and not tomorrow but now.

In all of this, therefore, the crucial element remains the human being, each and every individual in a country.

If the scientist, the politician, the plain citizen has a responsibility to fulfill, what of the artist? What is his responsibility to change and the future? How about those engaged in research? How about the historians, the writers, the painters, the sculptors, the musicians? Working mainly in the realm of imagination and sensibility, or even let us say, mere intuition, is the artist compelled to come to grips with the problems of the machine representing technology, the problems of reshaping society, of reordering the political process to conform more closely to the envisioned change in human affairs, or should he pursue as I before, in solitude and aloofness, his compulsive obsessions?

I think that the artist, like the scientist and the builder, is a key figure in deciding the wealth or poverty of his society in the world of tomorrow, and I do mean by wealth or poverty the measure of a people's material bounty, the level of their moral and spiritual standing, and the extent of their freedom and dignity as individuals.

The artist's responsibility, by virtue of his special gifts, is to act perhaps as guide or prime mover in making certain that the revolution which will transform the world or his national milieu will be more than just a surface revolution, not just another shift in the distribution of power and property, from one group of people to another group of people; rather it is his responsibility to make certain that the revolution will go deeply to the fundamentals of the human condition. More than any other productive member of a society, the artist and others to whom these awards belong can best point the way to a revolution of the essence, the essence of life as lived everyday by people.

Much as we may depend on the technical and managerial intelligentsia, these specialists can at best serve only within a limited area; we need more support to supplement their efforts and cause whatever change we choose to have, seep down through the various levels of society; and this additional power that we need could conceivably come from the force and influence of those who provide the new increments to our culture and in a real way shape the ideas and spirit which move people forward.

I believe that you, the awardees, and those like you, the creative people of our society, are in a strong position to enter wholeheartedly the development process as well as play leading roles in the movement forward, toward fruitful change

Marcos, F. E. (1978). Presidential speeches (Vol. 3). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Speech of President Marcos, One Mind in One House, January 22, 1972

One Mind in One House

AT THIS SECOND holding of the Presidential Prayer-Breakfast, I am reminded of that line in one of our many books of worship which reads: "God maketh men to be one of mind in one house."

To see men of different faiths and persuasions gathered thus under the same house, and to know that they are brought together by hopes and concerns they share in common, is to realize the extent to which we truly are of one mind in one house, regardless of the diversity and differences of our individual creeds.

It has often seemed to me that no matter what our religion, we are all of us men at the bottom of a valley seeking to climb the same mountain. All our eyes are fixed on the same summit, but we differ in the roads we take. Some go by one route; others by another, and still others another way — each group believing that theirs is the best road to the summit. Yet, in the end, we wind up on the same mountain-top, and once up there, it really does not matter very much which road one has taken.

It was no less than a distinguished Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. William Temple, who dared to write: "It is a mistake to suppose that God is only, or even chiefly, concerned with religion."

There is a common ground of belief among mankind's great religions that makes their differences a matter of form rather than substance. They all accept the reality of an invisible order of being that accounts for order in the universe; they all recognize the presence of what Christians call "the soul" in the human individual; and they all teach a code of conduct for the living of a happy life, and this code includes the need for good will toward one's fellow men and for detachment from the pressures of desire and greed.

The greatest preachers of each of these religions have always taught that the important thing is for man to develop what is within him, to better himself, and to measure himself by an ideal of the good life. At root, every one of our religion is animated by an active pursuit of the good of man.

It requires no special wisdom to realize that this common ground of the faiths, rather than the doctrinal differences, will have a greater influence in the making of a peaceful and a better world.

In the degree that the different faiths have become more conscious of the aims and the truths they share in common, to that degree also have we seen them seeking and working together for the end of human suffering and alienation.

Such has been the paramount reality in our time of doubt and trial — as evidenced in the vigor and zeal with which ecumenism and social progress are pursued by the various faiths; such is the grace that illuminates this occasion and our prayers today.

Today, we live in a world wracked by doubt and conflict; and increasingly we are confronted with the terrible realization that serenity and happiness seem to recede farther away as our science and technology bring us closer to our material wants. Peoples and nations agree less and less as there is more for them to share with one another.

And in our own country, the aching for change and advancement has unleashed anxieties and antagonisms that threaten to dissolve our human community. And it pains the best of us because we recognize that the needs are just, and our efforts must meet with adversity and difficulty.

Perhaps, it is at times like this, when we have most need of prayer. Dostoevsky once wrote: "Every time you pray, if your prayer is sincere, there will be new feeling and new meaning in it, which will give you fresh courage and you will understand that prayer is an education."

Prayer is an education in fortitude as well as in hope, for it is in faith that we derive much of our energy and inspiration in the successful pursuit of our highest and greatest endeavors.

I shall end by asking you to share in this prayer from the Book of Common Prayer:

“Grant us grace fearlessly to contend against evil, and to make no peace with oppression; and, that we may reverently use our freedom, help us to employ it in the maintenance of justice among men and nations.”

Speech of President Marcos, Training for Counter Insurgency, January 17, 1972

Training for Counter Insurgency

FIRST OF ALL, I wish to congratulate the graduates of the present course j conducted for Constabulary and Metrocom personnel, a course in counter-insurgency and anti-guerrilla tactics. I am assured that the men who have taken j this course are all picked troops, and well they may be for they are pioneers in a comparatively new field of service, occasioned by a new enemy of our country and people.

Developments in the past decade, not only in our country, but in almost all regions of the world, have shaped a new foe which all freedom-loving peoples should beware of, and which those who cherish an orderly and democratic society must contend with, surely with the aim of eliminating that foe completely from the life of their countries.

I am certain that in the course of your training you have been amply tutored on the stakes at issue when you go into action. Insurgency in our world, in a free country, even in a well-established and adjudged stable nation, such as the United States, is not at all improbable. This is because new forces are at work in the world, partly generated by ideological movements, partly by a changing consciousness among the people, especially the youth, partly because of the inexorable overall change sweeping human society.

We must be prepared therefore to meet any insurgency which threatens to rob us of our freedom and to undermine lawful authority, and ultimately to bring about the downfall of the duly constituted government. In this connection, insurgency, or revolution at the extreme, might be initiated through guerrilla action. Let me warn that guerrilla warfare may now be waged underground and even in urban areas. In our experience during the last world war, guerrilla fighting was confined to the hills, the mountains, the traditional battlefields. Today, guerrilla fighting takes many forms, some overt as in the case of sabotage and pitched battles, some covert, as in the case of propaganda and front organizations engaged in terrorism or disruption of orderly life. In both cases, the government must be ready to preserve order, secure life and property, and maintain normal processes and activities. This is where you of the PC and the Metrocom come in.

The stakes, let me repeat, consist of no less than our liberty and the preservation of our government.

The training you have undergone in this new era of responsibility is in the nature of the positive action indicated in the light of the threat to our country and government. I would like to emphasize that in this hidden war positive action must at all times be taken, for it is better to prevent a situation from deteriorating and finally becoming unmanageable than to procrastinate, trusting in circumstances to ease tensions or dissipate crises, in fear that action might be misconstrued by those who oppose us politically or those who are timid and irresolute. It is up to those in authority, those who are intimate with the existing dangers, to lead the way to take the necessary measures for ensuring public safety and national security.

Under that compulsion, and in response to my responsibility in this office, I proclaimed the suspension of the writ of the privilege of habeas corpus, fully aware that my critics and political enemies would find in it a facile issue for denigrating my administration and my own person. But I would be less than faithful to our democratic tradition and to our people and country if I had acted in behalf of my public image or of my peace of mind.

The timely action I took not only reduced the tensions in our land, broke the momentum of the threat of insurgency and widespread violence, but also forced the communist forces behind this threat to go deeply underground. I have since lifted the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, but let me emphasize that the state of rebellion continues for as long as the subversive elements in the communist conspiracy in our land exist, and we cannot put down our guard.

I have found it wise to restore the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus because the government has the situation well in hand. We are now in a position to respond through the normal means to any threat of public disorder and terroristic acts. Our people have been forewarned. The Supreme Court no less has underscored the threat we identified and the existence of a state of rebellion, and I am confident that our people have heeded this warning both coming from me and from the highest court of the land.

Now, we can face the task before us with a strengthened assurance of mass support from the people. And with that support our government can be equal to the task at hand. Of this, too, I am confident, particularly because we are continually upgrading our capabilities. This course that you have taken is part of the program for enhancing your skills, for sharpening the fitness of the men who must take to the frontlines in every confrontation with the enemies of our democracy.

Let me say that I continue to rely on the PC and the Metrocom in keeping the peace. I know that you have been villified simply for doing your duty, and perhaps we can forgive somewhat the polemics, even the inimical acts against the government, and against you who are in the forefront of the battles for peace and order, because of the nature of the enemy, many of them no more than youngsters lured into the communist movement by guile and misguided idealism.

There have been cases of misjudgment and precipitate action among you in clashes with activists in the past, for which you have been validly criticized and disciplined, but all in all, in my estimate, you have performed well in the discharge of your duties. And I expect that after finishing this course you and others like you in the PC and Metrocom will be better able to carry out your missions with coolness, judgment and effectiveness. If you do, then you shall truly be equal to the task that has been given to you.

Again, my warmest congratulations. May you use well your knowledge and skills, and always with the aim of serving well your flag and your countrymen.

Address of President Marcos at the annual induction of officers of the Naga Press and Radio Club, February 26, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the annual induction of officers of the Naga Press and Radio Club

[Delivered on February 26, 1972]

The Press and Its Tasks Today

I MUST BEGIN by denying a rumor, which threatens to develop into a popular belief, that the Manila press is superior to its provincial counterpart.

I do not seek to flatter when I say that the Manila press may enjoy some; built-in advantages, it may have more of everything, but it is by no means: superior to the provincial press in the strict sense of the word.

The Manila press does not rank higher than the provincial press in dedication to a very demanding and nationally vital calling. In a general way, both may have their own failings, but both are not without their respective achievements. On a good number of occasions, both have confronted those in government with some anxiety and concern; still, both have my personal goodwill and my fondest hopes that they will intensify the role that they now play in the common effort to improve the national life.

There are some in the media body today who accuse me of being allegedly partial to the provincial press. If this is so, it is perhaps because I know that the provincial press is pitted against terrible odds, and in many instances the provincial newspaperman does not have much of a chance.

The difficulties of provincial journalism are well known. In your countless seminars, conferences and conventions you have discussed these problems exhaustively. The provincial press cannot foster the professional growth of its personnel, nor improve its facilities and equipment until it gains the effective support of the advertising industry. On the other hand, this support can only be justified and induced through your growth as an effective advertising medium.

That you have not solved your problems merits our understanding, but that you are functioning as you are today and reaching out to your audiences as best as you can, merits admiration.

It is no easy thing to say what the press should do at this time, and how it should go about it, for this always invites grumbling and criticism, if not resentment. But there are few ideas which we may share along this line.

The press, let us understand, is indeed a major catalyst for meaningful change. As such, the press should be the most erudite of the radical sectors who advocate revolutionary change. In spite of passing appearances, however, it is not yet that.

We do not mean to deprecate the role that the press plays today in the social education of our people. There is no denying that it has sought to check the abusive, that it has championed noble causes; and that, to a certain degree, it has managed to broaden our people's awareness of the changing circumstances and orientations of our national life.

And yet that is not enough. The broadening of the people's awareness to national events, for instance, may be dimmed by the failure of the instruments of media to render that awareness more profound.

For the day is past when all that is required of the would-be journalist is the capability to write in the inverted pyramid. The profession has acquired more than a sense of craftsmanship, more than a community of interest. It has acquired a revered place in the integral self of the nation. Great then are the expectations of our people from the men and women who compose the journalistic corps. To betray these expectations is to betray the profession, perhaps, even the essential humanity of the practitioner.

Judge Charles Wyzanski, Jr. once said that “no society will ever be made by a mere collection of professionals. He who is only an editor and not a citizen . . . cannot by being merely added to the heap of other men similarly narrow in their professionalism give the foundation from which will grow a cohesive and meaningful structure.”

Consider with me then, the following tasks which I think lie upon the shoulders of newspapermen as citizens of our country today:

I believe that journalism in the Philippines could assume the initiative of taking a steadfast position on such fundamental issues as the manner in which the right to private property is to be recognized in the good society we are trying to evolve. This, for instance, would be one way by which the press can strike at the roots of the present social system.

I also believe that the Philippine press can and should lead a concerted attack against conservatism. Here, I would like to refer to two kinds of conservatism that have, in my view, obstructed the progress of a truly democratic revolution in this country. The first is the conservatism of the destitute who are so awed by the centuries-old grip of feudalism that they feel resigned to the helplessness of their circumstances. The other is the conservatism of the oligarchy who feel that they have little future in a reformed Philippine society.

This means that the press should both arouse and censure — arouse the conservative destitute by showing them the just possibilities of the times and censure the conservative rich in every instance that they stand in the way of democratization of our national life.

This, of course, is easier said than done. We can understand that the press has very little audience with the conservative destitute. We also know that much of the press is under the control of the conservative rich, that a good portion of the press is formed in the first place as a primary line of defense against any possible onslaught on the privileges that they currently enjoy and jealously guard.

I believe, too, that insofar as the press wields a real influence on public opinion in this country, it can substantially assist in the proper and efficient functioning of the machinery of government.

For it is commonly perceived that public opinion today feeds much upon rumors which, in turn, are fostered by either our desires, our fears, or — on occasion — by an unbridled sense of mischief. We can only lament that often times the press has, wittingly or unwittingly, abetted such rumors in the name of the right to print what it wishes to print.

As to public interest, the press bears the grave responsibility of interpreting to, and distinguishing for its readers, a special interest that has been varnished with platitudes from the genuine public interest. This is a tedious task, for the fact is that public interest is virtually amorphous. It includes the interest of infants yet in their cradles, whose view of the world when they face it, we do not know. It includes the interest of our children yet to be born, and our own interest we hold today. No opinion survey, therefore, can serve as the touchstone of the concept of public interest. In the press, there is only the newspaperman's conscience, and his God-given lights to guide him in this lonely task.

By the same token, the press can exert a regulatory influence on the pressure of public opinion upon the government. I submit that the working press can help render the pressure of public opinion on the government in the latter's task selecting policies and making decisions, more selective, more reasoned and therefore, more effective.

The paradox of democracy is that the sources of its strength are also the sources of its weaknesses. One of them is this: that since the elected authorities are accountable to the people, manipulators of public opinion use every stratagem and device to create upon government the impression that the opinion of a few is indeed the opinion of the entire populace. This is what the student of the science of politics perceives when he sees policies being dictated by the minority for their own ends—a minority who control certain editorial directions in the press.

It would be most convenient if there was a way of effectively excluding the term “people” the spokesmen of vested interests. But because they are favorably situated, they can present their demands more forcefully than the rest of us. They can even obstruct or paralyze government, particularly in areas where the political personnel are weak.

It is in such an eventuality that the press should bring to the arena of candid debate the real thinking and attitude of what represents the predominant number, and therefore, the predominant interest. Again, this is easier said than done, for it is only too facile to mistake one’s attitudes for the prevalent public opinion. It is only too convenient to mistake the directions of one’s prejudice for the public interest.

And yet the press must try and attempt the difficult. It must defy the dangers strewn in its way. For if the press fails to speak and take an audacious stand, it becomes, in effect, a reactionary force in a society that seeks revolutionary change so painfully. Failing to speak for a democratic and peaceful revolution, the press could well help deliver our people into the clutches of that monster that speaks the language of the gunpowder.

I trust that no one among you will be merely simplistic and say: “My only interest is to have the truth and once I have it, that is all.”

“Truth” is a word often abused by various elements of our society. No journalist, no public personality, and no man can rightly claim to have tucked the jewel of truth in some private pocket of his soul. The most that we can do is to catch some of its glimmer and hope that it will lead us to wisdom.

As the seventeenth-century Malebranch put it, “if God held in one hand truth, and in the other the pursuit of truth, I would say ‘Lord, the truth is for You alone, give me the pursuit.’”

Address of President Marcos at the 11th inaugural ceremonies of the Federation of Provincial Press Clubs, February 28, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 11th inaugural ceremonies of the Federation of Provincial Press Clubs

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel, February 28, 1972]

The Press and Development

I AM INDEED delighted to be able to come here. There was a little conflict of appointments as your President, Mr. Roman, will tell you. I am supposed to be with the Fiscal and Financial Policy committee this evening because tomorrow is the beginning of the hearings on the budget and the Commissions of the Budget, the Secretary of Finance, as well as the other members of this committee are still waiting for me.

However, I thought that perhaps they can wait but I don't believe the provincial press clubs federation should wait and so I came here first. And this is not only because I agree with you in the reelection of your President. I believe in reelection, as you probably know.

The President of this organization, Sid Roman, has not been exactly uncritical of my administration, that is why I was taken aback when he said that he was charged with being a "tuta" of the President in the last election. I guess, they had nothing to say against Sid and so it is standard in our society now when you have nothing to say against anybody and you want to criticize him, to just call him a "tuta" of the President. That does it.

However, I note too that the Federation of Provincial Press Clubs has indeed come of age. I note the respect and admiration which you now can feel in the atmosphere. I have been looking around, watching, and in the past the provincial press clubs, as well as the federation itself, have been looked down upon. No matter what you say, this was true. This was true a few years back, so much so that I remember provincial reporters were treated as poor relatives whenever they came over to Manila. This is the reason for my concern, for this concern that I have shown for the provincial press clubs, the members thereof and for the federation.

The provincial press has direct and immediate contact with our people. I have watched the growth of our provincial press and I am deeply impressed by the straight scribes. We can now rightfully say that the provincial press has matured and it will go beyond this point with its increasing involvement in national affairs, as your President has announced, and perhaps leave behind what was once its narrowly parochial and local point of view.

And I would like to say that this is all to the good. The provincial press has been an able and concerned partner of the government in the struggle to transform our countryside. Incidentally, before I go any further, I suggest to President Isidro Roman that we change the format of this program. I am supposed to deliver some kind of a speech. Well, I'll make an opening statement but I have suggested that we then open the table to an open forum, and anybody can ask any question. I would suggest that this be monitored by the President of the federation himself and that the questions be submitted in writing, and if you have any questions now I suggest that you put them down in writing. I thought that somebody would make an announcement of this before I stood up but since nobody did I might just as well do my own presentation.

If I can engage in a dialogue with business and political leaders I don't see why I should not engage in a dialogue with the leaders of the provincial press. And so, please prepare your questions because I am not going to speak long.

Now, I know the services rendered by the provincial press. I was concerned sometime ago about the fact that some of our radio and television stations in Manila did not fully give what was required in their franchise of public service, especially to the small people in the barrios.

The rural broadcasters of whom there are many among you have been instrumental in tutoring our farmers in the new and more effective methods of producing crops, scientific approaches to farming and raising livestock, poultry, fish and the like, in their backyards. In many cases, provincial newspapers have provided similar instruction in behalf of the government as well as in behalf of the private sector and with the laudable purpose of continuing the education of farmers.

May I now extend to you the gratitude of the public sector. I am certain that I express the sentiments of all our people in expressing the congratulations and thanks of the entire Filipino people to the rural broadcasters of whom there are many among you, and the provincial press for establishing this channel for the dissemination of information in the farms through the radio and through the printed word.

The provincial press also has been a dynamic force in fostering public opinion and that is why tonight I would like to emphasize again this new program of government in relation to cooperatives, of multi-purpose cooperatives, that we are trying to establish all over the country. I gather from some comments that the opposition party seems to have taken a stand against the establishment of cooperatives, or what I have referred to as the bayanihan sa nayon or bayanihang pambansa. You know, we keep talking about cooperatives, and we have been talking about the Moshav. Actually, the Philippine has had a cooperative tradition long, long before we even heard of the Moshav or before we even heard of the present-day cooperatives. The bayanihan concept in the barrio among the farmers is a concept that was in force, a habit, a custom and a tradition, not only in Northern Luzon, in Central Luzon or Bicolandia, but all over the Philippines, long ago, before the Spaniards or my namesake, Fernando de Magallanes, discovered the Philippines. And thus, it has been said that we are just reverting back to what came naturally to us.

Now, what is this multi-purpose cooperative that now seems to be the subject of controversy? We have included in the appropriation act, in the budget, about a hundred and fifty million pesos for the establishment of the rural cooperatives. The model was initiated not only in Magalang. Magalang is a costly model. It is supported by the Filipinas Foundation, which is the foundation of Ayala y Compania and of the Zobels, but we have a cheaper version in General Ricarte, Llanera, Nueva Ecija. I just came from there. I was there last Thursday, and this project is going very well, is going apace.

Exactly, what is this cooperative? Everybody knows what a cooperative is. But you go to a barrio and every family is moving along on its own. It establishes its own production organization, meaning, the family members farm the land and raise hogs and chicken. Then, they market these products on their own without the help of anyone. They bring the products all the way to town and if not to the town, all the way to the city, and sell without the help either of government or of the private sector unless the middleman intervenes. If the middleman does, then he becomes the marketing aid.

Now, the problem is, first of all, the poor farmer or the man in the barrio doesn't know exactly what product is in demand, say, in Manila. What product is in demand in Cebu. What product is in demand in Baguio. And the reason for this is there is no organization. He doesn't know what the costs are, and the reason for this is nobody is helping him. We will not go into the various reasons.

Now, let me give you the concept as a whole and the cost and expenses of this program of the Bayanihan sa Nayon. This Bayanihan sa Nayon would organize the farmers within a barrio or even within a town. There are 1,400 municipalities all over the country. There are 33,000 barrios and estimate that the cost per barrio would be about P5,000 as seed capital for cooperative. What would this cooperative, this bayanihan, this buklod of farmers do? You have noted that we are now encouraging the farmers to construct their own irrigation system. We have models all over the Philippines now, and I am certain that the provincial newspapermen know, for instance, the models that we set up in Zamboanga del Norte, in Cotabato del Sur and to the north, in Cagayan and elsewhere.

Now, the average cost for an irrigation system of the gravity type where you put up the dam and you construct the canals for the water to flow down is P1,000 per hectare. If you irrigate 10,000 hectares you must spend P10 million. This is the average cost. In many instances, it will be much more and in order therefore to finance an irrigation system in a municipality with about 10,000 hectares of farm land you need P10 million. If you add to it such infrastructure as roads and perhaps a pier in the river or on the beach, then you have something fantastic, beyond the reach of our government as well as of the local government or the barrio people.

However, our experience indicates that if you organize a group within the barrio and this group agrees to utilize the materials from the PACD or from the Irrigation Administration, you can cut down the expenses a hundred-fold.

Let me give you an example. There were 6,000 hectares which we were supposed to irrigate in Zamboanga del Norte. And they told me I needed to release P6 million. We went into this area. I visited the area with the First Lady and I suggested that we start working on the irrigation system. We brought in the cement. We brought in all kinds of materials. The people of course were very doubtful about the viability of such a project. But when nobody wanted to start the project we got a few young men together and we started working on this project. I, myself, helped in going into the area and believe it or not, with P50,000 we put up an irrigation system that now irrigates 6,000 hectares. Fifty thousand pesos plus free labor. You see, 90 to 95 per cent of the cost really is labor.

Now, this is one example. Then, we have the problem of farmers in the North, farmers engaged in truck gardening. The middlemen have come in. You who are from the North, you know the problem there. The aliens came in, they advanced money to the farmers and before you knew it the middlemen were dictating the prices — the purchasing price and the selling price — of vegetables not only in Baguio but also in Manila. And so in some instances we organized cooperatives and these cooperatives sent their products to the Greater Manila Terminal Food Market. They were able to get good prices and enough information to tell the growers exactly what was in demand in the market. We can have cooperatives for irrigation, for marketing, even for electricity. We can also organize cooperatives for intensive farming.

The land reform program is a program which envisions the distribution of land to the tenants. Do we have enough land for all the tenants all over the Philippines in the next several generations? The answer is no. If we were to subdivide all the lands in Luzon, for instance, for all the farm tenants the lands would prove adequate only for this one single generation. But the next generation will face the same problem. Example: We have for instance 1,000 hectares in one hacienda. The government buys this after the farmers are transformed into leaseholders and after they have been taught how to plant. Then the government is supposed to subdivide this land. And every family, every tenant family, is supposed to receive five hectares, which is known as the family size farm. Five hectares given to this one family, and this family tills this land. This is good for this generation. How about the next generation? The average number of children would be five. Five children would then subdivide the five hectares in the next generation. How about the third generation? The fourth generation? Of course, I believe in the land reform program. But the problem here is fragmentation. What is the answer to this?

The answer is to start now with cooperatives, with the Bayanihan sa Nayon. The answer now is intensive farming. It's not extensive farming meaning bigger farms; it's not enlarging your farm from five hectares, but utilizing what you have in such a manner that you will produce per hectare.

Some people refer to Moshav or the Israeli-type of farming. Actually, we have adopted some aspects of Moshav but we were surprised, and pleasantly so, to find out that these practices and these traditions, these customs were already known to our farmers. In the North, for instance, when you build an irrigation system, a communal irrigation system, let's say in the town of Bacarra, Ilocos Norte, every farmer within the area is duty bound traditionally to put in several days of work every week until the irrigation system is finished. And you know what the bayanihan concept is. Whenever there is a house to be moved, everybody in the barrio comes to help the house owner. This is actually in part the concept of Moshav.

But, of course, now we need to put in seed capital for the cooperatives. For every organization, we will keep this money available but we will not put this money into the cooperative, this amount of P5,000, until the cooperative is organized and actually working. Cottage industry will also be brought into the barrios. Cottage industry, fisheries, handicraft, manpower training. Now, you go into any barrio. You ask some of the young men, what would you like to do? Especially the out-of-school youth. We have conducted a survey, a formal survey and you know the answers are almost unanimous.

Oh, we would like to work but we don't know how, they said. We don't know what to do and we don't know exactly what to produce. And yet we cannot fill up the orders of the big houses, the big mail order houses and the big department stores in the United States for such simple things as abaca bags, abaca slippers and the like. Because, as you know, those department stores are used to ordering by the gross and they ask, can you deliver a hundred thousand slippers every week? And of course the answer is no, we cannot. Why not?

Because we don't have the production capability. Now, if we organized production under the Cottage Industry Development Authority, and under small-scale industries associations or organizations, we would be supporting the work of the cooperatives.

I spoke of manpower training. Everybody wants to go to the manpower training schools which are being financed by the national government now. And everybody, every Provincial Governor or Municipal Mayor demands that manpower training facilities be made available in his province or municipality. Why can we not have manpower training run by the barrio or the municipality itself? This is going to be one of the purposes of this cooperative movement. It must be self-sustaining. Instructors and trainers must also come from such cooperatives.

We must tie all these up. The producers will organize producers cooperatives, then have tie ups with the consumers cooperatives — the employees of government here in Manila through perhaps the Greater Manila Terminal Food Market, and thus, cut out the middlemen who always manage to bring up prices. This is one of the answers to the perennial and nagging problem of prices.

I believe that the cooperative movement can be one of your projects. I hope it is something which will interest the provincial press. The press clubs can be one of the most effective instruments in bringing to the people the need for reviving the old concept of bayanihan sa nayon.

Now, we are moving into this area in a low profile manner. We have not talked too much about this. We would like to actually start before we talk about it. But we are compelled to speak out now because of the criticisms. Actually, we have started in several provinces, in Mindanao, the Bicol region and in the Visayas.

But rest assured that wherever you come from the bayanihan sa nayon concept will reach your place, and I would like the provincial press clubs to cooperate with us in spreading the gospel of the bayanihan sa nayon.

Talking about cooperatives, perhaps the provincial press could adopt this system of cooperation in establishing their own printing presses. I understand that one of the dangers to the independence of the provincial press is the high cost of printing. I was just talking to some of our friends here. I understand that the cost now for printing four pages of the tabloid size of provincial paper is about P240, and if you have an eight-page newspaper that will mean about P500 every week, and I know the difficulty of raising funds. I would suggest that, first, we encourage the cooperatives system because if we generate affluence among your readership in no time at all they will be your sources of financing and advertising and you can establish the independence of the provincial press within a year or two.

At the same time, I believe that you will also be able to increase your circulation. Right now, unfortunately, in the barrios according to our surveys, priority is still given to printed materials coming from Manila. Thus, the national magazines are still widespread throughout the barrio. In the North, for instance, Bannawag is still bought, Liwayway is going up. I understand the national magazines under the Liwayway publications have reached a circulation of about 550,000 a week. This indicates, I repeat, the truth of the result of the survey that priority is still given to printed material coming from Manila. I think that it's about time that it should be reversed. It's about time that the provincial press print material of equal quality but of direct relevance to the problems of the people in the barrio.

Now, I would like to close by saying your government and your President are interested in an independent provincial press. The reason for this is that the provincial press is very sensitive to the opinions of those who are in the barrios. I can understand the prejudice against any attempt to control the provincial press. I have always maintained that even criticism which is not constructive has its own value. The employees of the national government who are distant from the regional office, from the national office, often fall into the inertia of provincial life; very often that fervor and that fire that you may find in the center of government is lacking in the provincial sector, or the employees on provincial assignments. The provincial press is the means by which the critics and those who have grievances against government can propel such inactive units or elements in government into more efficient service. For instance, the national government has been shocked to learn of the inefficiency if not corruption of some of those who are in such crucial offices as the Bureau of Forestry the Bureau of Lands and the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and in many instances, these cases of inefficiency and corruption have been brought to our attention by the provincial press clubs.

And, therefore, as President, I would like to publicly acknowledge the indebtedness of the national government to the crusading work of the provincial press clubs, the reporters, the publishers and editors, and it is my hope you will continue to perform this task. It is my hope that some kind of a subsidy should be given not by government directly, but from a fund for the provincial press. A form of a subsidy that would come, perhaps, from the National Press Club or from a similar organization. Don't you agree with me?

Well, I do not know exactly what the finances of the National Press Club are. Doroy Valencia here has not told me yet but I suppose there may be need for an advance for their building, but I was wondering if we could not raise funds that would go to support patriotic, sincere and dedicated provincial newspapers. And to keep this out of the hands of politicians it should be held in the hands of a national press organization, perhaps, the Manila Overseas Press Club, or the National Press Club. But it is about time, I repeat, that some kind of support comes not from the government because it would immediately be suspect, but from the private sector.

I plant this idea amongst you. I think that you could pursue it and if there is any way by which we can be of help to you in raising such funds for the provincial press I assure that you have my complete support both as President and as citizen. But please keep it out of the hands of the politicians, whether Nacionalista or Liberal.

Now, my friends, I close with congratulations to the President, the reelected President, and the members of the Board of Directors. I notice that they are a little bit older than last year. I did not make this observation alone. I gathered this from some other people. I suppose that this means that the positions have become more important. But, any way, let me repeat. I do hope that the provincial press will continue to flourish and I do hope that your organization will succeed in its objective of participating in national development through change.

And to each and everyone of you, again congratulations.

Address of President Marcos at the Philippine Army Day, March 22, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Philippine Army Day

[Delivered at Fort Bonifacio, March 22, 1972]

Towards Self-Reliance

I AM HAPPY to see here the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the body that initiates the approval of the appropriation act. I presume that this demonstrates the interest and the inclination of the leadership of the House of Representatives. It is my hope that the appropriation for the Armed Forces of the Philippines will come out of Congress without any cut whatsoever.

I am indeed very proud to be able to come here this morning. I come to congratulate the officers and men, and the civilian personnel, of the Philippine Army, on this occasion.

Today, I was touched as I pinned the Gold Cross medal on Mrs. Apolinar whose husband died in one of those small and often unreported incidents that the Armed Forces of the Philippines, including the Philippine Army, participate in almost every day.

It is most appropriate that we celebrate the anniversary of this organization and we recall with pride your many achievements, most of all your unswerving loyalty to our flag and our government, which is to say, to our people.

It is my hope that through all changes and vicissitudes in the nation's life, the Philippine Army will continue to pay allegiance to the ideals which have shaped our people and our society, the ideals embodied in our Constitution and in our free way of life.

Soldiering is a hazardous profession in more ways than one. Literally a soldier lays his life on the line the moment he enlists and takes his oath of duty. But the hazards that a soldier contends with extend well beyond the battlefields and well beyond those unforeseen engagements that safeguard the peace and order of our beloved land; they are manifest too in tranquil times, in periods of sustained calm and peace.

One of the most wounding experiences a soldier must undergo is the lack of recognition in a time of relative peace and the thought of a people unappreciative of a soldier's sacrifice. Paradoxically the soldier is at such times often regarded with indifference and sometimes hostility, and is looked upon as somebody to be wary of, and sometimes even to malign. I note that these inclinations are true not only in our society; it is true of other free and democratic societies of the world.

There is a tendency to treat the soldier as an alien in a free society, and in a way that is good, for our society should not be given to idolizing soldiers and soldiering. This signifies that we as a people are peaceful loving, that we shall not brook any attempt to rule society with the authoritarianism of the military.

But history also teaches us that when a people have no will and no heart to fight for their individual freedom as well as for their country's dignity, then that society is on the wane.

The short shift given to the professional soldier is a measure of the rejection of the men and women who in times of danger to the nation are the first to offer their lives in its defense. Perhaps, in a free and peace-loving society, we have to mark out a common ground, where the civilian and soldier may meet in understanding, in mutual appreciation, and harmony.

And thus it is that I welcome the re-establishment of the concept of the citizen army, the citizen army which fought in the battles of Bataan and Corregidor, in the Visayas, in Mindanao and in the underground, the citizen army which my generation of soldiers belonged.

I understand that Speaker Villareal has been articulate in proposing the activation of army training camps all over the Philippines, and is now advocating new concept of such a citizen army. I am very happy about this.

This concept of soldiery becomes all the more significant because it is a concept arising from the imperatives of a democratic order. This concept of the citizen soldier is in direct opposition to the military tradition of earlier eras, when the soldier was trained to be an automaton, and officers were martinets one step removed from tyrants. Today's citizen soldier is, underneath the uniform an unreconstructed civilian, a soldier only because he has been taught to use weapons well and to function smoothly as part of a team in the event of active hostilities against aggressors or against internal enemies of the state.

A citizen army will not be quite as expensive as a standing army of professional soldiers. It will be an army on call, the larger part of which will mobilize and go into action only in time of peril, when the nation faces immediate danger. That is the essential idea of the so-called citizen army, and I have supported this concept because it is to me the most economical system of defense, while also embodying the principle basic to a democratic government the principle of self-government, which may be translated in the case of the military as an army consisting of the people themselves, not an elite organization separate from and above the people.

We are now in the process of producing this new soldier, the soldier of, for and by the people, but apparently we cannot go as far as we hope to at this time because of scarce resources. In the new budget proposal, we have included this funds which would start this project in the right direction, and, therefore, it is our hope that such a budget will be passed.

In consonance with the concept of the citizen army, we are also intent on transforming our present military organization, which is oriented to multiple alliances with friendly nations for the defense of our land, to one capable of giving the nation a self-reliant posture. It is admittedly an ambitious project, but one which I regard as not beyond our capabilities. Furthermore, this move is dictated by international events, notably the shifts in foreign policies which have made the traditional arrangements untenable. We cannot wait for the shifting events to settle. As in war, we must initiate strategy and tactics to anticipate the critical shape of events.

Some quarters believe that before we can approach the problem of self-reliant defense, or unilateral defense, we must first look after our economic development. This has been said as though we have not in fact strived in every way to accelerate economic development. We have. The truth is, in the years past, just short of a decade, we have given utmost priority to economic development, sometimes to the prejudice of military capability, to all the component projects of such development, including production, infrastructure, and industrialization. In fact, military strategy itself must take into consideration the economic capabilities of the nation, and this too we have not overlooked. But we are compelled to now consider a self-reliant defense posture not so much as a choice or an option, but as a dire necessity.

All this is not to say that the professional soldier will have a diminished role in society. On the contrary, men like you will have an even firmer role as the core of the nation's military defense. The citizen soldier will look to you for examples of dedication and discipline, and it is your competence in the arts of war that he will emulate in times of crisis and grave peril to the stability of the nation.

We must therefore continue to determine how our military can be strengthened, for it is the only way our country can survive in a changing world.

Whatever lies in the future, I ask the men and women of the Philippine Army to stand fast, to carry on the tradition of duty and loyalty, a tradition which has made countless heroes of the soldiers of the Philippine Army, a heroism which must again be summoned from you when and if the need arises. And for that time, we must remain alert and ready to give our best to our country.

Address of President Marcos at the Bataan Day Celebration, April 9, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Bataan Day Celebration

[Delivered on April 9, 1972]

From Bataan: The Lesson of Survival

THE MEMORY OF an epic struggle in the life of the Filipino people has drawn us, once again, to these hallowed grounds. Many of you who are here remember the terror and the agony of Bataan thirty years ago: Doubtless you hear once more the thunder of war across these mountains and hills, and feel, as though they were real again, the ache and weariness of many battles. But sharper than all these recollections of foreboding and pain is the sense of triumph: from a desolate night threatened by doom Bataan moved into daylight, found its pulsebeat and rose to the rhythms of life again.

In this beleaguered peninsula, 3,973 Filipino officers, 67,934 Filipino enlisted men, 8,270 Philippine Scouts' officers and men and 11,790 American officers and men fought from January to April 1942.

Out of this total of about 91,000, 24,000 were actually counted in the hospitals immobilized because of disease and injuries. Of the remaining 67,000 one-half were in the rear and one-half were along the Pilar-Bagac line which ran north of Mount Samat.

Against what Gen. MacArthur estimated to be 100,000 of the Army, about 30,000 were deployed along this 25-kilometer Pilar-Bagac line. Almost all of them were starving and sick. About 10,000 effectives were actually capable of firing a gun. In the last battle I counted only about 200 men in the line defending the top of Mount Samat.

Because of wounds and disease, many units no longer maintained reserves. On my last patrol at the start of the shelling on April 2nd, the men at the outpost line of resistance of the 21st Division could hardly move out of their foxholes, due to starvation and injuries.

The enemy was in complete control of the air. Our artillery had been silenced. Ammunition was limited to sixty (60) rounds per man.

Armor-piercing ammunition and anti-tank guns were non-existent. My patrol counted about 150 high-powered artillery pieces of the enemy which started to blast every inch of Mount Samat, turning it into an area of fire and explosions.

This prevented further resupply of food and ammunition to the men at the OPLR and main line of resistance. On the second day of bombardment, almost all communication lines were cut, thus further disorganizing the defenders on Mount Samat. When the bombardment continued and reports arrived of the two strong enemy columns spearheaded by armor moving towards the junction of the 21st Division and the 41st Division at the western slope of Mt. Samat and towards the main trail moving south at the eastern slope of Mount Samat, the younger officers and men of the 21st Division swore to die rather than surrender, on the top of this mountain. Thus it is that Mount Samat has been honored as the site of the Dambana ng Kagitingan.

But now, 30 years later, with the advantage of hindsight and the experience of our own struggle to establish our young Republic on the world scene, let us ask ourselves the question, "Why Bataan?"

Indeed, “why Bataan at all?” Did it have to happen? Have we, the present generations of Filipinos, kept faith with those who sacrificed life and blood in Bataan and Corregidor?

My friends, these are questions to which we must now seek pertinent answers.

The Philippines today is faced with problems of varying complexities. With communist-inspired insurgency in the cities and countryside, the onset of urban guerilla warfare in many centers of population, and recurrent social, economic and political problems crying out for solution, the nation’s resources and the temper of our people have been strained to the limit. Considered jointly with other factors, both internal and external, these conditions and problems constitute serious threats to national stability and security.

Now in 1972, we find ourselves again at the crossroads of decision. The situation differs noticeably from that in 1941 and 1942. Now, we no longer find ourselves under the exclusive, all-powerful protective umbrella of the United States. As a sovereign nation, the defense of the Philippines has become our sole responsibility, and ours alone. True, we have a mutual defense treaty with the United States and have entered into regional defense agreement with seven other member-nations of the SEATO, but we must not depend entirely on our allies for our own security. Bataan is our object lesson on this.

The internal situation today leaves much to be desired. In spite of the massive efforts of the present administration, there still exists an active insurgency in our midst, fomented by misguided elements of our population that are only waiting for the right moment to again attempt the seizure of power.

The national morale and economic potential are being sapped by subversion, organized anarchy, smuggling, by lawlessness and outlawry, by criminal syndicates that are eating up vast quantities of our time, effort and resources which could otherwise be directed towards constructive purposes. Too many of our officials are more concerned with their personal comfort, self-glorification and selfish ambition than the welfare of the people they have pledged to serve.

As we look at our world today, we come to some fundamental thoughts that are as old as history itself. While the age of confrontation is phasing out into an age of flexibility, we see the Middle East in turmoil as the conflict between Israel and the Arab nations remains unresolved; the Vietnam conflict has escalated into a mass invasion by the North of the South; the violent rivalry between Pakistan and India has resulted in a bloody confrontation and the division of Pakistan, and reordered the old alignments of power; Cambodia and Laos are still convulsed by fratricidal war within their borders; Burma is threatened with danger from inside and outside; Malaysia, in an effort to neutralize the threats to its security, has turned into a neutral state and proposes the neutralization of all of Southeast Asia; Thailand and South Korea, under the pressure of incipient rebellions within their borders, have established totalitarian regimes; Singapore, while actively engaged in its development as an entrepot, is preoccupied with its security; Indonesia, the biggest nation and country in Southeast Asia, has just received a donation of Sabre jet fighters from Australia, and in our joint communique during the state visit of its chief of state, it has allowed the announcement of certain joint military training and operations that can only mean an open avowal of the strengthening of its defenses against its prospective enemies from outside and inside its territory. And Japan, the most industrialized state of Asia, will probably be compelled to re-arm within the next five years.

Thus, experience and prudence dictate the validity of the conclusion that war and hostility is the normal state between nations and that in this day and age it is illusory to expect man to eradicate war within our lifetime.

Within this context, I am certain the dead of Bataan cannot understand why some loud voices are being raised against the Administration’s objective of attaining a self-reliant defense posture within the next five years. The consensus of our people to achieve a broader base for our international relations and widen our economic opportunities abroad must be accompanied by the unilateral development of our national defense system, based on the concept of citizen armed forces. To seek and attract new contacts outside of our traditional economic, cultural and diplomatic contacts without preparing ourselves to cope with concomitant security problems could be dangerous and would lead to national disaster.

Every nation in our region of Southeast Asia — and other developing nations elsewhere in the world for that matter — is investing extra time, effort and resources in the development of such a self-reliant posture. While the Philippines spends approximately $3.40 in terms of defense for each Filipino, the comparable defense expenditure per capita for Thailand is $7.44; South Korea, $12.57; Japan, $17.86, to cite a few examples. The proposed 5-year defense development plan to make our country more self-reliant would entail an added per capita expenditure of about $1.16 (or a total of $4.56) per Filipino — an expense that would still be well below that of some of our neighbors. This proposed formula does not, by any means, commit us to an arms race with the other countries of Southeast Asia; rather, it provides the starting position from which we can interact more freely as a sovereign nation with other sovereign nations, while at the same time maintaining a stronger capability to insure the proper domestic climate for our socio-economic programs to prosper.

As we come to report to our dead, on this altar and at this cross, we hear the lesson that is learned from Bataan, which is, never again should our country depend on others for its security. We have faith and trust in our allies and friends. We can depend on them. But we can best trust ourselves and depend on our own capabilities.

Bataan also cries out one hard lesson, and that is, that the time for preparation against danger is not when danger is perceived and threatens us but when danger is still a long, long way from our shores and from our time.

It is an unwise and imprudent leader who expects that time will eliminate the threats that he sees may be a building within or outside our boundaries. Whatever be the form of our government, the ultimate idealism is freedom, and its objective remains unchanged — the dignity of the human individual although the means to attain this noble objective may differ and change.

And thus it is that from the unyielding lines and specific fronts of Bataan, the Filipino people remember how their soldiers turned to the unconventional war of the underground which knew no static lines and no organized fronts.

In fighting a rebellion, we should never allow any foreign troops to fight on our soil. The complications arising out of their participation are more grave than the rebellion we may seek to overcome.

For some time to come the common problem of all developing nations will be exported war in the form of a communist rebellion.

In meeting any external threats, it is my decision that while there is still time we must prepare to meet it with our own strength; alone, if necessary.

There is no reason to fear any immediate threat of external aggression. We as a nation have renounced war as an instrument of national policy. We will join in the universal effort to eradicate war from our planet. But tins may not soon be attained. Considering that war and hostility seems to be the normal state between nations of our time and age, it is logical to conclude that when the nations around us acquire the capability for such aggression, our people will be called upon to meet such aggression. Now is the time to prepare for it. Slowly, if necessary. But prepare for it we must. This is the greatest deterrent to the recurrence of another Bataan.

The national interests of our allies, no matter how close and friendly they may be, may not always coincide with our own national interest.

So Bataan teaches us never again to depend completely on others for the security of our people.

It teaches us that we as a nation must depend on ourselves to fight internal subversion and external aggression no matter how small we are and how limited our resources.

Bataan is not a tale of death but an affirmation of life — not an end but a beginning. Here today, among the ghosts of the fallen, we sense not death but heroism; the image of renewal fills our minds. The sense of doom is long gone.

Today we celebrate a truth that Bataan revealed to us, that we can summon vast powers in us if we wish and use them wisely, with courage and resolution, to convert defeat to victory and win the big battles of life.

Marcos, F. E. (1978). Presidential speeches (Vol. 4). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Messages of President Marcos, The IRRI: A Force for Modernization, April 21, 1972

The IRRI: A Force for Modernization

IT IS AN example of the strange paradox of our times that we are here gathered to celebrate an event which symbolizes international cooperation and the sincere efforts of man to unite to meet his common enemies — ignorance, disease, hunger — while man is equally engaged in liquidating and eliminating his species in other parts of the world. I say symbolic of this paradox of our times because while indeed war, destruction and death now monopolize the headlines, perhaps in some later day of a more enlightened generation, greater media space will be allocated to the work of men like those who are with IRRI, the men of the type of Dr. Chandler and the researchers, the experts who have brought about a new kind of war and a new kind of revolution the impact of which is felt and will be felt for many years to come throughout the world.

We are here to underscore the role of the International Rice Research Institute not only in the Asian community but throughout the world, a community which is composed of — and I refer to the Asian community — of two billion rice eaters who today join us in thankful commemoration of the founding one decade ago of this world-famous institution.

The story of the development by IRRI of the so-called IR8, now known the world over as the “miracle rice”, is too well known to bear retelling here. It is enough to say that with its discovery, the food-population equation in this part of the world was radically altered and it gave new hope to the billions of hungry and malnourished people in Asia and elsewhere. This is particularly significant in the context of the predictions made by demographers and economists sometime ago, and even up to now, that unless food production would be increased tremendously there would be a famine in the world. Some demographers even predicted 1975, others 1980 and the decades to come. The IRRI through science and technology assured the world food not only for today but also for tomorrow.

I am proud to say that no nation in the world has embraced the high yielding varieties developed by IRRI more enthusiastically than the Philippines. Fully sixty per cent of our rice paddies are now planted to high yielding varieties. When you travel back from Los Baños this afternoon to Manila, examine the fields you pass. As far as you can see, there is nothing but short, stiff-strawed, and non-lodging varieties.

Rice is the Philippines’ most important crop. We have 3 million hectares of rice. While much of this area is not irrigated and is dependent on rainfall for water, nevertheless, since 1966, when IR8 was developed, the national average, yield of rice in the Philippines increased by 30 per cent. By 1968, this country had attained self-sufficiency in rice and except for the last 2 years when our rice fields were decimated by typhoons and tungro, we have maintained a respectable level of rice production.

This increase underlines the scientific revolution that is taking place in agriculture. What we fondly call “miracle rice” is, as we all know, not so much a miracle as a promise. It is a promise that comes true when farmers begin to use modern agricultural methods and inputs — fertilizer, weed and insect control, straight row planting, and so forth. The high-yielding variety is the key element, however. It provides a rich pay-off for the farmer who is willing to try new methods.

Because the “miracle rice” requires new techniques, our farmers were forced to change their ways. They have had to use new materials and techniques. Their surplus production introduced them to the complexities of a market economy. And this is where government had to participate actively. The farmers were thus drawn into the mainstream of modern economic life; their awareness of things around them was completely altered. Having acquired surplus incomes, their eyes were suddenly opened to a new world, a new world of opportunity, a new world for personal fulfillment. On the other hand, the industrialized sectors discovered in the countryside a new market for their products.

However, the miracle seeds have by no means ended the fight against higher prices and periodic shortages. The “rice revolution”, as we have sadly discovered in our country, is a continuing struggle both of production and marketing. The Philippine experience may be instructive to all Asian countries, who face the same problems and the same challenges. After achieving self-sufficiency in 1968, we became complacent about production problems; we focused our attention largely on problems of marketing, transport, storage and processing. We now realize that while we have to reckon with these later problems, we must devote equal attention to food production.

While bringing hope to Asia's hungry people, the rice revolution of course also poses new problems in terms of the relationship between the rich countries and the poor countries. As pointed out by Lester Brown in his book Seed of Change, the new high-yielding varieties of rice promise to alter eventually the global pattern of agriculture because they tend to re-direct production advantage in favor of the tropical-subtropical region. Thus, the recent production increases in the tropical region have resulted in deep cutbacks in United States agricultural production, especially of wheat. A crisis in the world grain market is imminent because the food production breakthrough is occurring just as Europe and Japan are pursuing highly protectionist agricultural policies. The stage is now set for a major confrontation between the rich and poor countries over how to rationalize world agricultural trade.

These will be very difficult issues to settle. But I think, however, that approached in the proper spirit, we can meet these challenges. The IRRI example sets the tone. It is an international undertaking, where people from many countries have gathered to meet a common problem. It is this spirit of cooperation that will in the end bring comfort as well as solutions to the grave problems of this "global village" — the world.

It is fortunate for the rice farmer and the world that the Rockefeller Foundation and the Ford Foundation had the vision and the initiative to establish the International Rice Research Institute. The men of these institutions, such as Drs. George Harrar and Forrest Hill, who steered these institutions into these paths deserve special mention for their foresight. They should be honored for their vision.

It is also gratifying to hear of the widening base of financial support for IRRI. The governments of the United States, Great Britain, and Australia have made or are about to make major contributions to the Institute. The newly established Consultative Group for International Agricultural Research, of which the Philippines is a member, I understand, is about to underwrite the coming financial needs of IRRI.

The continued and increased support of IRRI by these organizations and governments is well-justified. In spite of the dramatic gains that have been made in the 10 years since IRRI began its work, hunger is not uncommon and famine is still an ever-present threat for millions of Asians.

The populations of the nations of Asia are growing rapidly. The population of the Philippines will double in the next 25 years. To feed the millions yet unborn, much work remains to be done. I look forward to the next decade of the International Rice Research Institute. I am confident that it will be as exciting, as fulfilling, as rewarding, and as successful, as IRRI's first ten years.

I would like to pay special tribute in closing to the men who guided IRRI since its founding. The reputation of the Institute and its scientists today is a tribute to the imagination, the foresight, and the unflagging energy of Dr. George Harrar, Dr. Forrest Hill and Dr. Robert Chandler. Drs. Harrar and Chandler will retire this year as President of the Rockefeller Foundation and of the IRRI, respectively. The Philippines — indeed the whole world — will miss them.

I come on this occasion on my own behalf and on behalf of the Filipino people to extend to them gratitude for their sacrifice in coming here to Asia, for their deserved success in the experiments and researches in IRRI.

I cannot express and articulate this gratitude of the Filipino people except with what we, the Filipinos, say to all friends: Mabuhay sa inyong dalawa.

For all this, allow me then to salute the IRRI for setting the example in technological and scientific excellence, humanitarianism and international cooperation.

And I close with the hope that where the politicians, statesmen and the world leaders have failed, you the scientists, researchers and friends will succeed in binding men together into one single family.

Address of President Marcos at the opening ceremonies of Labor-Management Congress, April 21, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the opening ceremonies of Labor-Management Congress

[Delivered at the Ramon Magsaysay Hall, Social Security System (SSS) Building, Quezon City, April 21, 1972]

Our Industrial Peace with Freedom

Goal:

MY FRIENDS, TODAY should be another historic confrontation between labor and management in our country but not as sworn class enemies, but as friends and partners together with the government in securing our nation's progress. I congratulate the Labor-Management Advisory Council which has initiated this conference, the first to be held since 1958 in accordance with the Industrial Peace Act of 1953 or the Magna Carta of Labor. I am one of those who honestly believe that the battle for industrial peace is already half won once we succeed in bringing labor and management to the negotiating table.

The Labor-Management Congress is not necessarily a table for negotiation, with two panels primed for attritional warfare. You are rather called upon hereto meet not in the role of economic combatants but as statesmen of labor and management impelled by common goodwill to find solutions to problems, to achieve a broad area of agreement or consensus on some baffling and stubborn issues of our times.

Under the Magna Carta of Labor, otherwise known as Republic Act 875, the President of the Philippines is authorized to recommend to the Secretary of Labor the calling of a national conference of representatives of employers and labor organizations to consider and adopt a voluntary code of principles for labor-management relations, designed to prevent or minimize industrial disputes, particularly those affecting the general welfare.

In 1968 a Labor-Management Congress was held but since then none has been held until now. Considering the present economic condition of the country, particularly as regards the development of our industry and agriculture, it is but proper and fitting that this Labor-Management Congress be held.

If you will remember, Mr. David Morse, former Director General of the International Labor Organization, in the concluding part of his report to the 43rd session of the International Labor Conference, made the following comment and I quote verbatim:

“In the first place, the worker as an individual must be fully respected, both his dignity and personality, and be allowed to develop his sense of responsibility, for a man is not truly a man who is bereft of responsibility. A satisfactory labor relations system is one which furthers respect for fundamental human rights — the freedom of labor, the freedom of assembly and association, the opportunity to work, non-discrimination, free choice of work, and fair and satisfying conditions of work.

“As far as collective relations are concerned, the aim should be not only to provide an orderly means of resolving conflicts between workers and employers but also of harmonizing their interest in the broader community of which they are members. For these purposes, labor must be given its proper place in contemporary society and workers' organizations should be associated in the solution of problems concerning all workers. The requirements of economic progress must be recognized and some method must be found for workers to cooperate with employers in improving production methods, raising productivity and distributing its benefits equitably.”

It is for this purpose that the state, in its primary responsibility to give protection to labor in industry and tenants in agriculture, encourage the holding of another conference like the one you are now holding in order to review the gains that have been made by labor and the laws, particularly in social and labor legislation, that have been passed by our Congress, and in order to update them.

Under present social and economic conditions, what is the role of the state? The role of the state in industrial relations has changed considerably in recent years. Many years ago, the rights of the master were considered sacrosanct and any effort of the employees to challenge these rights was looked upon as a revolt. Such revolts were promptly and ruthlessly crushed by the state. It was not social enlightenment only that brought about recognition of the rights of workers. The recognition was secured by the workers themselves through a long and bitter struggle spread over many decades and involving great hardships and even bloodshed. The struggle was rendered the more inequitable, difficult and bitter because till relatively recent times the right of the workers to get together for the purpose of dealing with their employers was itself denied and suppressed. Indeed, even today, this right is by no means universally recognized and even where it is recognized in principle it is sometimes denied in actual practice.

The interest of the state in industrial relations arises because, firstly, government considers it to be its duty to protect the rights of one party against another party's encroachment. The community on the other hand has a prior interest because industrial disputes affect economic activity, the production of goods and operations of services, and sometimes law and order in society. With the rise of the concept of welfare — of the welfare state — the positive obligations of the state beyond the field of law and order to assure the well being of the citizens gradually assumed prominence. It is, as part of these obligations, the objective of the state to secure the well-being of the worker, and this role has assumed significance.

However, justice has come to be understood not only in its legal aspects but also in its social aspects. It has been recognized that industrial relations involve considerations of social justice.

The importance which industrial relations have assumed in the eyes of public authority during the past half century is indicated by the fact that after the first World War, the governments of a large number of countries in the world came together and set up what is now known as the International Labor Organization. The ILO, the International Labor Organization, is an inter-governmental agency dedicated to the promotion of social justice through publication and dissemination of information on labor, social conditions, the formulation of international standards and the supervision of their national application, the undertaking of specialized studies, and the provision of technical assistance. And today, 108 countries are members of the ILO, a large part of whose activities are in the field of industrial relations.

One of the more immediate objectives of industrial relations policies is, of course, industrial peace. The wide range of issues on which the claims or expectations of employers and workers are opposed to each other are potential causes for active conflict between the two parties. The conflict may take various forms. The workers may resort to a slow-down or they may refuse to work and call a strike. The employers may refuse to negotiate with the organization formed by their workers, fire the workers, or declare a lockout. They may try, when faced with the strike, to carry on their operation by recruiting other workers the strikers would describe as blacklegs, strike breakers or scabs. To prevent blacklegs from breaking the strike, the strikers may post pickets at the factory gates. In such a situation, hostility and tension may go on mounting and violence may, and often do, occur. Industrial conflict, whether peaceful or otherwise, involves much loss, trouble and hardship all around, not excluding the party which may ultimately emerge victorious. It also affects production which the whole community needs.

Hence, it is generally considered desirable to avoid industrial conflict. This can be done and sometimes is done by simply prohibiting conflict by law. But such a prevention of conflict does not really remove the cause of it. It will leave either or both parties nursing a sense of injustice which will do serious harm to the smooth operations of the undertaking. Worse still, it may drive the conflict into less desirable channels like sabotage, personal violence or open defiance of the law.

I have referred to the fact that industrial conflict affects everyone adversely, including the society in which it may be created.

In the study of the economies of various countries we have come across the fact that industrial conflict in the present world has become so costly that in some countries it has caused a serious imbalance of international trade. In countries like Great Britain and even the United States and other countries in Europe, a serious factor that has contributed to their unfavorable problem of balance of trade is the lack of industrial peace. It has increased the cost of production, decreased the volume of production and rendered countries unable to meet international competition.

What then is the constructive approach to conflict? The constructive approach to avoiding conflict is to try and resolve the issues in dispute before they lead to actual conflict. The establishment and operation of such constructive processes for settling differences between employers and workers is an important role of the state in industrial relations. Prevention of industrial conflict is, however, a negative objective, nor is it to be assumed that it is an overriding objective. There are often situations involving great hardship or injustice to one party, more often than not the workers. All amicable ways of changing this situation and removing the hardships and injustice may prove abortive. In such a case, conflict may become unavoidable and even desirable for removing the injustice may be more important than mere maintenance of peace in the undertaking.

In the field of industrial relations, there is a point at which the employers' and workers' interests do not coincide and where actual and potential conflict has to be resolved. But there is also a point where the interests of employers and workers coincide, serving as a foundation for cooperation in a spirit of mutual respect. To build on this foundation the edifice of cooperation, to devise and set up institutions and processes for such cooperation, is a positive aspect of industrial relations. A relationship of mutual trust and cooperation is helpful in achieving such desirable objectives as the utilization of all productive resources, higher productivity, safety and health, and a sense of dignity and fulfillment for workers. Further, such relationships also have a healthy effect in matters over which the interest of the employers and workers do not coincide. For in an atmosphere of mutual cooperation it is easier to find constructive solutions to such issues as those involving divergent interests. For instance, if a demand for higher wages is to be met, economy and higher cost of production may perhaps be jointly explored.

What is the ideology of conflict? This view of the objectives of industrial relations may run into headlong opposition from certain ideological and political attitudes. There are schools of thought which hold that an industrial strike is a manifestation of inevitable clash of interests in a capitalist society. The relationship of employers and workers in itself is looked upon as a relationship of exploitation by the former of the latter. Thus, conflict is a weapon of a social revolution which expects that this exploitation will cease only through such means. This view demands that class conflict, including industrial conflict, should be sharpened and accentuated. Further, different ideological and political views and forces are themselves in conflict with one another and to the extent that the workers are affected by these forces, the general trend of development of industrial relations may be also affected.

Whatever may be the validity of these ideological considerations, we are not here to pass upon them. So far as the study of industrial relations is concerned there must be, if a new production process is to be introduced, a satisfactory procedure for spreading it over a reasonable period of time, which is needed for the retraining and deployment of displaced workers, and this should be worked out jointly so as to avoid retrenchment and consequent hardship. It is important to realize that this relationship of mutual consideration is not the automatic result of the mere elimination of industrial conflict. Even where conflict is absent, where disputes as a rule result without active conflict the relationship of mutual cooperation can be and often is totally absent. Conscious and well thought-out efforts of both sides are called for in achieving such a relationship. The employers have to be prepared to give up some of their traditional prerogatives and admit workers to areas which have been for so long the closed preserve of management. The workers on their part have to be prepared to undertake new responsibilities which heretofore were not considered to be theirs. The concept of control by authority has to yield increasingly to that of control by integration.

The vital factor in all questions concerning industrial relations is the status and role of the trade union. Workers or individuals must in most industry situations function collectively. They need for this purpose an agency which can represent them, speak and act for them. To be genuinely representative, the agency must be their own, of their own choice, fully mindful of and sensitive to their interests and aspirations. It must enjoy their full confidence and be fully subject to their control. The right to organize, the right to form their trade union has been earned by workers through long and bitter struggle, great hardship and suffering. And even today, they have to remain vigilant and sometimes must fight to maintain and retain that right. This is why the ILO adopted convention recognizing the right of workers to organize unions and to bargain collectively through organizations of their own choice.

In many countries there are special laws granting special facilities and privileges to trade unions. We have a good number of labor and social legislations today but we may have to introduce new ones to cope with the rapid growth of our social and economic order. This is one subject of your Congress today. The grant of the legal right to organize does not always mean that the right will be enjoyed in practice. All of us are aware of this. The employer may resort to various practices in order to thwart the efforts of the workers to organize themselves. Active union organizers may be victimized or even physically threatened or attacked. In some cases, they may be bought or won over through some allurements. The employer may sponsor a company union which will remain under his thumb. He may offer better wages and other conditions better than those prevailing elsewhere in order to keep a union out of his plant. The history of the labor movement all over the world shows that as a rule employers do their best to prevent the organization of unions, and agree to negotiate with unions only when compelled to do so by the strength of the union. In some countries, legislation has speeded up the progress of unionism but has not by itself brought about the growth of trade unions.

We are all aware now that a strong trade union is essential for sound industrial relations. The union gives coherent and practical expression to the expectations and aspirations of the workers and makes discussion and negotiation between the two parties possible. The existence of a strong union is itself a source of confidence to the workers, assuring them that their legitimate interest will not be encroached upon. And this confidence is helpful in building satisfactory industrial relations.

However, I repeat. A strong union also means greater responsibility on the part of the workers, a responsibility which means also to protect that same management which sometimes may be an antagonist, in order that the two elements of production may join hands in enhancing the progress of all.

The success of an enterprise and the benefits that might accrue to the workers depend on many factors. For instance, joint consultation, joint participation of workers and management, and lastly, tripartite consultations. In the first place, it is the employer's function primarily to manage his business. But workers are interested in how it is managed. If they are consulted on at least some aspects of management, they feel a greater sense of satisfaction. Joint consultation, however, is quite distinct from collective bargaining. It is important that the two are kept separate, otherwise confusion may result.

Joint consultation between management and labor does not concern itself with such questions as revision of wages or of other conditions of service. That is the field of collective bargaining. The participation of workers in management gives the laborers a sense of security and responsibility, and this is very important. Thus, the need for joint consultation. However, the final decision on policy and other management concerns should be made by the management alone, which may accept or reject the workers' views. This, again, is another sensitive point which may lead to disagreement.

A tripartite consultation takes place when representatives of the employers and workers and the government get together. The government's participation however should only be confined to formulating growth policies for a whole industry or for the whole country. And consultation must involve wholly the three parties, on a tripartite system. For instance, there may be a proposal for social or workers' legislation, for wages and employment, policies and their implementation, social security, housing and welfare problems and such other subjects, and this proposal becomes an appropriate subject for tripartite consultation.

You will note that under my administration I have tried to encourage tripartite consultations on a broad range of policies that affect labor and management. And these are important subjects to be taken up in this convention.

May I wish you all the best of luck so that after this convention there may be better relations between labor and management. I repeat. The task you face is to work out realistic proposals and guidelines for industrial peace. I have faith and confidence that through its appropriate organs, the government may act, on them in the furtherance of industrial peace based on justice.

We have a Constitutional Convention going on. Congress is in session. If you will remember, in two months' time we shall once more mark the anniversary of the Industrial Peace Act, which, incidentally, I also had the privilege of participating in while it was being written, when I was a member of Congress in 1953. But it is not too soon, really, for the leaders of labor and management, not to mention the government, in this Congress to address themselves to this fundamental question: How has the era of collective bargaining and free trade unionism worked in the Philippines during nearly two decades of its operation? There must be a reassessment. What should be done to realize the fullest potential of this system for industrial peace based on social justice? What defects have been revealed by experience and what corrective steps should be taken to update the law?

And with the Constitutional Convention going on, should not this Congress also face up to the property question and in general the social and economic relationship that should prevail in a reconstructed society?

The truth is that I believe your Congress could be more useful and effective if you took more time to consider concrete questions of industrial peace.

For instance, while I have said that employers tend to discourage the organization of unions, the unions are not entirely blameless in some instances and we must now be strong enough to face the reality that inter-union dispute caused more than 47 per cent of all strikes at least in 1910 — and the implicitly of unions in a given enterprise is definitely not conducive to industrial peace. A third factor which impedes the task of promoting industrial peace is the inadequacy of government's own facilities not only for conciliation, but perhaps more important, for preventive mediation.

The first and second of these issues are sensitive enough to cause instant sparks in a meeting of labor and management. I know.

I am certain that in discussing or in re-assessing the situation of free trade unionism in the Philippines in the past two decades, and in determining how to realize the true potential of this system for industrial peace based on social justice, as well as the defects that experience may have revealed, there will be instant conflict between labor and management. I have been rather closely exposed to some of your problems during the past six years, when the President, at the request of the Secretary of Labor, had to perform the role of conciliator himself. I know that management is not above busting free unions, in spite of pious utterances and I know that labor may sometimes invoke high ideals in the not-so-noble pursuit of liquidating a rival union — sometimes wantonly disregarding the public interest for the sake of a vendetta.

We all know of this. All of us do, but sometimes we do not face up to this reality. And I know that you will allow me this opportunity of being candid and frank about the problems of both labor and management. Sometimes, labor and capital, in the case of provincial disputes, have to finance a Labor Department conciliator's transportation to the site of the dispute, for this is a Department tragically short of funds with which to carry out its valuable work.

And that is not a commercial for the Department of Labor's budget pending in Congress. Talagang nangangailangan naman ng pera ang Department of Labor, at kung nakikinig ang ating mga mambabatas ay kung maaari lang sana ay dagdagan ang appropriation ng Department of Labor.

I have cited three factors besides the paucity of government funds and the inadequacy of government facilities to meet the demands of industrial conflict. I believe that here we have three large but concrete problems on which to focus tripartite attention and action in this Congress.

I am happy to note that labor leaders have called attention to the fact that whereas countries other than the Philippines and countries around us, have shown a tendency to repress labor unions, in the Philippines government tends to encourage labor unionism.

For although we strongly desire and unremittingly pursue the goal of economic growth, I know that even management itself or the capitalist, is not willing to relegate to a secondary priority the freedom of association for workers as well as for employers. The thrust of our social effort is not merely towards bread but towards bread with justice and freedom.

I ask that labor and management in this Congress join forces with us in the government to defend and preserve freedom of association as a major postulate of our commitment to industrial democracy.

Great challenges face all of us in the '70's and these are trying times for all of us. There is always the grave risk that labor might consider itself alienated from government; foreign ideologies fan class enmity for their own ends. That is why government and management must take extra care that their decisions, whenever workers are affected, are enlightened, defensible, and reasonable, lest the myth of exploitation become a reality in our democratic system.

We do not know exactly what form our political and economic community may take when the delegates to the Constitutional Convention shall have done their work. But I leave it to the joint Labor-Management Congress to come to terms with the social and economic realities of our times, so that together labor and management may voice their hopes and demands for the kind of society that is more responsive to their interests and welfare.

I have no doubt that the sense of this new society, if indeed it is now in the making, as I think it is, is fundamentally, nay uncompromisingly democratic. But it is my hope, as it must be yours, that this democratic society shall mean the extension and not the curtailment or limitation, of freedom, that it shall guarantee individual self-fulfillment, not only politically but also, and more importantly, economically and socially as well. I have complete faith and trust that you shall lead the way towards a better and more progressive society.

God guide you in your undertaking in this Congress.

Address of President Marcos at the opening ceremonies of the Annual Convention of the Philippine Medical Association, April 26, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the opening ceremonies of the Annual Convention of the Philippine Medical Association

[Delivered at the De La Salle College, Bacolod City, April 26, 1972]

Medical Care for All

THERE IS NO profession more socially involved and more exalted in popular esteem, or a force more vital to national progress and welfare, than that of medicine. This is the reason a good part of the nation must focus its attention today on this gathering in Bacolod City—the 65th annual convention of the Philippine Medical Association. This is an occasion not only for the warmest congratulations but also for a direct, courageous confrontation of the role that the medical profession must accept in the life of our nation, now being convulsed by change.

In the past few years, the PMA under new and aggressive youthful leadership has been engaged in this kind of confrontation with itself. This speaks well of the new leaders who have emerged from the ranks of the profession in response to the challenging times. Certainly, the outgoing set of officers this year, headed by President Caparas, deserves our warmest commendations for having shared the initiative and the leadership of the movement for a medicare program. And the incoming leadership will be chosen, I feel sure, with a full awareness of the need for first-rate leadership in the association at a time when the profession as a whole must respond to the challenge of implementing Medicare, the success of which must now fully depend upon your initiative and support.

For the first time in our history, every worker involved in this program, through the SSS or the GSIS, has ready access to the life-saving power of modern medicine. This is the real principle of Medicare. It is a radical step to bring the benefits of modern medicine to the masses. And it does provide the long-missing linkage by means of which the medical profession can effectively reach the bulk of the working people.

I used to say that in some parts of Mindanao, as many as 60 per cent of the people died without seeing a doctor. This is hardly an exaggeration. As a result, in the minds of many of our people, modern medicine is thought of as a luxury that only the rich and the influential can afford, a boon that is beyond the reach of the ordinary wage-earner and his family. It is not seldom that thoughts of social discrimination in medicine, with its power to save lives, rumble in the breasts of the poor and even the not-so-poor.

With Medicare, specially at its beginning stage, we cannot hope to reach every one yet, but at least the workers in the wage-systems, who are already covered by the SSS and the GSIS, can immediately take advantage of it. But the extent to which this already can be done—the proof that the medical profession can be made available to the masses of workers and their families—must await the complete response and support of all doctors everywhere in our country.

As you will recall, it was on our joint initiative that Medicare came into existence. I supported the passage and eventual enactment of a law, R. A. 1611, that established the Philippine Medical Care Plan and created the Medical Care Commission prescribing its duties, powers, and functions and recommending the appropriation of funds therefor. This has now become the Philippine Medical Care Act that embodies the government's policy to gradually provide total medical service for our people by adopting and implementing a comprehensive and coordinated medical care program based on accepted concepts of health care. This law was enacted in 1969. I have been criticized by some sectors for my hesitancy in the immediate implementation of this law. If I hesitated, it was not because I doubted its benefits and value. We needed time to prepare the machinery of government to insure the effective implementation of the plan. Even then I was not alone in my caution that a precipitate and hasty action would endanger the successful implementation of the plan.

A few offered the opinion that it should first be tried on selected pilot areas to test the methods of operation and learn the mechanics of reaching the people. This view unquestionably had its merits. On the other hand, there was the urgent demand that every one needed to avail of the benefits of this plan. The critics of the administration have always harped on the alleged deprivation of the poor of the benefits of modern medical care — that the progress in science and medicine is only for the rich who can afford to pay for medical care service. Other detractors even pronounced the whole plan as a failure even before it was tried or implemented.

In my desire to insure successful implementation of this plan, I asked the cooperation of the Philippine Medical Association to work out with the Department of Health an interim program to gradually introduce the medicare system into operation. For this purpose, I promulgated Executive Order 337 on May 12, 1971, which authorized the organization of the Medical Assistance Program (MAP) Task Force consisting of nine members (four from the PMA, three from the Department of Health, one from the Philippine Hospital Association, and one from the Presidential Economic Staff). The Task Force is to conceptualize, materialize, and implement the medical assistance program. This joint undertaking of your association with the government health service is conceived for the purpose of improving and increasing the health care of the people by:

1. Coordinating the efforts and resources of the Department of Health, private practitioners, and the community;
2. Assessing and improving existing medical facilities;
3. Providing station field hospitals in remote and isolated towns to take care of serious and emergency cases before transport to regular hospitals; and
4. Developing an insurance scheme whereby medical expenses of the community will be borne through community mutual health funds.

You will note that the objectives of the MAP coincide with those of the Medicare Program. It could be therefore the analogue of the suggestion that the total program of medical care be first tried on a pilot setting. The MAP has, however, the feature that from this transitory status, it will eventually develop and fit into the total mechanism of the medicare program.

On August 10, 1971, I officially constituted the Philippine Medical Care Commission. Despite the official organization of the Commission, the MAP continues to operate to lay the general ground work for the full implementation of the Medicare Plan. The Medicare started to collect premiums as of January, 1971. Three months later, this April, the members are already availing of their benefits from the plan.

There is a multitude of problems to be faced before we can ensure the smooth operation of the program. There are still many unclear aspects in the scheme. Both the government and the private sector have yet to consolidate the participation of each. The Department of Health must review its policy to enable it to integrate its functions and activities into the program.

The Philippine Medical Association, being one of the pioneers and aggressive sponsors of this plan, has an inherent responsibility to espouse it to a successful implementation. This is our own medical care program designed and organized in accordance with our needs as a people. No one will argue that the medical care of the common man is of inestimable value not only to himself as an individual, but also to his family, to the community where he lives and to the nation as a whole.

It is not for nothing that the national hero of the Filipinos is not a warrior, but a healer, of whose profession it was once said by Jeremy Taylor: "To preserve a man alive in the midst of so many chances and hostilities, is as great a miracle as to create him."

Truly, Philippine medicine today faces its greatest opportunity yet to serve the people and therefore, humanity. The medium by which this unparalleled, noble service will be rendered by you is Medicare, and in this annual convention you will, I am sure, bring to bear the highest the statesmanship of which you are capable to make sure that program will be a complete success.

Then this convention would be a milestone, indeed, not only for Philippine medicine, but also for the Filipino nation.

May I end on the same note with which I began: my warmest congratulations and best wishes for your success.

Address of President Marcos at the necrological services for Don Fernando Amorsolo, April 28, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the necrological services for Don Fernando Amorsolo

[Delivered on April 28, 1972]

Amorsolo: First National Artist

THE WHOLE NATION mourns Fernando Amorsolo. As President of the Republic of the Philippines, as admirer, friend, and as ordinary citizen of this Republic, I have come to express the sorrow of the entire race.

When we honor a man, we honor not him alone but some ideal he represents in us, some piece of him that is cognate with ourselves, with mankind, and with the universal spirit. Therefore, to honor a great artist is to exalt the artist in every man. There is a moral correlative of the artist in the humblest soul. Collectively, this is the spirit of the nation that strives towards excellence, beauty, goodness.

Today, we honor Fernando Amorsolo, it is true, but in honoring him we also honor the artist as a Filipino. In him we honor every Filipino artist living or dead or yet unborn. For art is also the potential for beauty and excellence that waits to be found, to be encouraged, and to be developed in the whole race. And this is so, not only because Fernando Amorsolo is unquestionably the foremost Filipino painter since Juan Luna. Luna and Hidalgo who preceded him were without doubt great painters. But they bore a special imprint of the Filipino identity on their canvasses of classical beauty. Going a step further than the classicists of the European school, Amorsolo looked for that one indigenous quality which he presented in a painting, stamping it with an indubitable Filipino presence. That element was the sunlight of the Philippine countryside.

I doubt if in the entire history of art anyone captured the gentle quality of sunlight as well as Amorsolo did. In his art, the Filipinos emerged as veritable children of the sun. But at the same time, it is said, this was a sun of social and political innocence, as though the Amorsolo landscape had known no evil. No matter, Amorsolo did not pretend to be profound. Social criticism, in an age of revolution and upheaval, will have enough adherents, practitioners and perverters, anyway. He looked for what was true, what was beautiful, what was good.

In a society that idolizes iconoclasts, and, perhaps, muckrakers, such a quest would seem exotic and even futile. But the true Amorsolo age was not yet the clamorous, rebellious milieu that we take for granted today. The simple joys of the poor were still legitimate and respectable. His quest was fulfilled when he earned the secret of capturing light so that he could make this the very symbol of his art and his own kind of message to his people.

Amorsolo was an honest man and the integrity of his art consists of its very simplicity, lucidity and lack of cant. It will be said, when everything is written of Amorsolo, that he gave nobility to the prosaic and to the common, that was Filipino.

My friends, because Amorsolo was a great artist and a great man, we must utilize the occasion of his death to inaugurate the new practice of the Republic of the Philippines in honoring great artists.

We, therefore, raise to his memory not a monument of stone or bronze but the creation of a new category of awards and decorations for honorees of the state. This category is that of the National Artist.

Today, I have signed by proclamation an order which establishes this category and I have indicated there that Amorsolo becomes the first Filipino to be declared National Artist of the Republic of the Philippines, entitled to all the honors and privileges befitting a hero of our country and people. By this precedent, we hope in the future to honor similarly other eminent men who have elevated us all by the quality of their art, whether in the fields of fine arts, literature, history, the dance, culture and architecture, and others. A great artist not only elevates but also unites a people. National art becomes part of the heritage that solders a nation and makes it one and indivisible. For the present, the initiative for recommending the designation of such an honoree known as National Artist of the Republic of the Philippines rests on the Board of Trustees of the Cultural Center of the Philippines.

But it is my hope, it is the hope of everyone, that in the near future a Philippine Academy of the Arts can be established to exercise among others this function of recommending to the President of the Philippines the recognition of outstanding individuals as National Artists.

The Constitution mandates the State to promote the arts. It is in that spirit that the government supported initiatives to establish this Cultural Center. But promoting the arts is merely another term for honoring our own artists.

Today, in conducting this funeral for our first National Artist so declared by our government, we are asserting this responsibility to our artists and by implication, to the best and the finest in our natures.

My friends and countrymen, I repeat, on behalf of our people, I bid farewell to this great man who in death has become immortal, as immortal as the sunlight that is the true signature of his art and the hallmark of his vision.

Address of President Marcos at the annual conference of the Philippine Association of School Superintendents, May 8, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the annual conference of the Philippine Association of School Superintendents

[Delivered at Teacher's Camp, Baguio City, May 8, 1972]

New Directions in Philippine Education

ALLOW ME TO extend to you my greetings on the occasion of this year's conference of school superintendents and to express die sincere wish that the conference will come out with innovative solutions to many of die nation's educational problems.

I am very happy to note that you have adopted as the theme of this conference, "Newer Directions in Philippine Education." This is the thrust of the recommendations of the Presidential Commission to Survey Philippine Education which I created under Executive Order No. 202. We have now the report of the Survey Commission and I have asked the Secretary of Education to implement the recommendations beginning this coming June.

I am naturally elated by the report that our educational system has achieved almost universal education in the elementary level. This is a very important achievement inasmuch as the strength of a democracy depends to a large extent upon the general level of education of its citizens. However, I am aware of the fact that the school system still suffers from a high drop out rate. Out of every hundred pupils who enroll in Grade I only 55 are able to reach Grade VI. I appeal to the superintendents here assembled to look for solutions to this problem of school drop-outs. During this decade our goals should be to make it possible for our citizens to attain at least second year of high school.

The secondary level of our school system has often been described as the weakest link. I have been informed that the 2-2 plan, which is the curriculum setup in me secondary level, is not being fully implemented. I enjoin the superintendents to look into this problem to the end that more of our secondary students will opt for the vocational courses that will help in preparing them for gainful employment either in agriculture or industry. In this connection, I wish to stress the fact that our country, being essentially agricultural, the vocational stream of the secondary curriculum should stress agricultural pursuits, which incidentally do not require expensive equipment.

My attention has been brought to the Barrio Development School located in Masaya Bay, Laguna. This Barrio Development School is a joint project of the Board of National Education and the U.P. College of Agriculture in Los Baños. I am very happy to learn that the students in this development school are engaged in such supervised farming activities as raising poultry, swine and rabbits. I wish to urge school superintendents to study seriously the innovations being introduced in the Masaya Barrio Development School to the end that this setup be adopted wherever it is possible in existing barrio high schools all over the country.

We have a serious unemployment problem in the country today and any program be it in the elementary, secondary or tertiary levels that will increase opportunities for employment or self-employment deserves our utmost encouragement.

The Presidential Commission to Survey Philippine Education has made some vital recommendations to remedy certain imbalances in higher education and to raise the quality of the educational product. Mention has been made of the fact that close to 80 per cent of the enrollment in higher education are concentrated in three courses, namely: teacher training, commerce and business administration, and liberal arts. I understand that many of the graduates of these courses find difficulty in securing employment after graduation. In other words, they join the ranks of the so-called educated unemployed. This is a waste of very valuable human resources and I therefore urge that this be corrected as soon as possible. On the other hand, courses that are needed in national development like engineering, science and technology and agriculture, have very limited enrolments. I enjoin the Department of Education to take the necessary steps to correct these imbalances in education in the tertiary level. I urge that steps be taken to screen students enrolling in higher education to the end that only those capable of carrying the work be admitted.

I have certified to Congress the urgency of a bill entitled "The Educational Act of 1972." This bill has been introduced by the Committee on Education in the house headed by Congress-woman Tabiana and in the Senate by the Chairman of the Committee on Education, Senator Helena Z. Benitez. The Bill seeks to raise a total of P500 million within a period of ten years which will be used in undertaking projects in line with the recommendations of the Presidential Survey Commission. This amount will be supplemented by a loan that we seek to get from the World Bank and in the amount of a hundred million dollars. Negotiations have been going on between the Philippine Government on the one hand and the World Bank on the other towards the approval of this loan. With Congress approving the Educational Development Act of 1972 and the World Bank approving our loan there will be provided the needed logistics for educational projects designed to accelerate national development.

I close by wishing you a very successful and fruitful conference.

Address of President Marcos on Memorial Day, May 29, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
On Memorial Day

[Delivered at the Manila American Cemetery and Memorial, Fort Bonifacio, May 29, 1972]

Memorial Day 1972

IT IS INDEED a pleasure and an honor for me to be able once again to attend these ceremonies on Memorial Day at the American Cemetery in the Philippines.

Memorial Day is, uniquely and proudly, an American holiday. But in designating this day to honor their heroic dead, the American people also affirm the sanctity of all those who gave up their lives for their country regardless of race and creed.

This seems to me an irrefutable conclusion when we consider the genesis of Memorial Day, for it was first observed in the Northern States in honor of those who died in the US Civil War. It subsequently became a day consecrated to all those who died in the service of their country.

The remains of American War dead are collected in cemeteries like those in Europe, America and Asia. But this cemetery in Fort Bonifacio, containing the graves of 17,000 dead, and the inscriptions of 39,000 missing, is appropriately the largest in area of such cemeteries built by the American Battle Monuments Commission.

The battles and campaigns in which these dead fought are set forth in the 25 maps that are inscribed on the facade of the East Hemicycle of this cemetery. Some of these battles and the dates given are as follows: Defense of Luzon—8 December 1941-6 May 1942; Defense of Southeast Asia—December 1941—May 1942; Battle for Leyte Gulf—23-26 October 1944; Return to the Philippines—October 1944; Luzon Campaign—15 December 1944-15 August 1945; Reoccupation of Manila; Liberation of the Philippines—20 October 1944-15 August 1945; Battle of the Coral Sea—4-8 May 1942; China-Burma-India Theater—1942-1945; American Air Ferry Routes—Supply to the USSR—1941-1945; United States Submarine Operations in the Pacific; The Marianas—15 June—10 August 1944; Battle of Midway—3-7 June 1942; Battle of the Philippine Sea—15-20 June 1944; Guadalcanal—7 August 1942—9 February 1943; Fast Carrier Strikes in the Pacific—1942-1945; Air Assault on Japan—1942-1945; Okinawa—26 March—22 June 1945; Iwo Jima—16 February—16 March 1945; The War Against Germany—1941-1945; Supply Routes Across the Pacific Ocean—1941-1945; New Guinea—21 July 1942-11 May 1945; Northern Solomons—6 March 1943—3-7 March 1944; Invasion of the Palau Islands.

This cemetery at Fort Bonifacio is appropriately the largest of its kind in the world, as I have said, because it is symbolic of the American—and the world's—pre-occupation with Asia since the Second World War. Asia holds more than half the population of mankind, the bulk of whom are poor and rebellious against poverty. Korea and Vietnam merely focused the agitations and convulsions caused by the emergence of Asia from the ruins of the Second World War.

But in another sense, this is appropriate because this cemetery will always recall the great partnership between the Philippines and the United States in the Second World War.

You will recall that after the defeat of Bataan and Corregidor, and the surrender of the regular armies of the United States and the Philippines, the Filipino people transformed themselves into a great army of resistance. Nowhere in Asia, and perhaps in other parts of the world, did a nation rise up so spontaneously and so bravely — sustained not only by love of country but also by its faith in a friend and ally, the United States of America.

This might have seemed strange to Americans as well as to Filipinos of an earlier generation, say, those who fought during the Filipino-American War of 1898, otherwise known in American textbooks as the “The Philippine Insurrection.” For in 1898, General Aguinaldo’s ragtag guerrilla army under General Luna, in which army many of the present Filipino generation’s grand fathers belonged, fought the first national guerrilla war in Asia — against the United States, in what today seems to many historians and observers a prevision of Vietnam half a century earlier.

From the ferocious turn-of-the-century enemy, the Filipinos became; America’s most loyal and steadfast allies in the Second World War. I belong to that generation which unquestioningly obeyed the generous impulse that those who fought in the Second World War under the American flag shared toward one another.

But in another sense, this generation seems to offer a cut-off point, if only because our own deepest feelings have found insufficient reciprocation on the part of a similar generation in the United States. Increasingly we find that we cannot be possessive with regard to other nations and that the priorities nations must follow their own evaluation of their vital and lasting nation’s interest.

In the Philippines, this rising feeling of maturity is taking the form of a reexamination of our relations with the whole world, which pivot on our relations with the United States.

We know that we must find the way to rely on ourselves, just as all developing countries must learn to rely on themselves. For it is in such self-reliance that we shall guarantee not only our own preparedness, but also our usefulness to those who make common cause with us in the service of human freedom. Then we can be better friends with those who want to be friends with us.

The battles fought together, and the memory of those who died, will help keep ever green the friendship between Filipinos and Americans.

The Filipino people join their American friends today therefore, in paying tribute to the American dead of the Second World War, particularly those who fell in the defense and liberation of the Philippines.

May I conclude by quoting an inscription from the Chapel: “Comrades in arms whose earthly resting place is known only to God, let us here highly resolve that the cause for which they died shall live.”

Address of President Marcos at the Fourth Regular Course of the AFP Command and General Staff College, June 1, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Fourth Regular Course of the AFP Command and General Staff College

[Delivered at Fort Bonifacio, June 1, 1972]

A Core of Leadership

IT IS, OF course, a great pleasure for me to be able to attend this graduation. As you are well aware, I have given special importance to this course of the AFP Command and General Staff College, at one time requiring it as a prerequisite to promotions to higher rank.

I am happy to be here with the officers who have proven themselves many times over before and today as we now add to their impressive credentials this graduation from this exclusive college.

I congratulate the administration and the academic staff of this college under the Commandant, Col. Gidaya.

In the immediate future, I look forward to the augmentation of the leadership in our Armed Forces, not to mention other areas of government and activity, through such advanced training courses as this which you have successfully hurdled, because in the tumultuous years of this decade and the next, our country will have great need of competent, inspired and imaginative leadership.

I am also happy to note the presence in these graduation ceremonies of three foreign students: one from the Republic of Korea, another from the Republic of China, and another from Thailand. To them, I extend special congratulations. They are here in accordance with the program of cooperation between their countries and our country in preparing not only for the defense of our respective countries but for the development of this region to which we belong.

The world is taking definite new directions today, directions away from old, the usual and the certain, away from the conventional and the tested, and onward to still undiscovered areas of living, of social and economic experimentation, and perhaps of fundamental political and ideological reforms. A tremendous change in our world is already indicated by events. And this change will raise a new and increasing challenge to nations and their leaders.

Already, we can appreciate the vast changes which have occurred in our lives. On the political front, fresh policies are evolving toward more restraint on the use of power, as for example in the desire of the United States to withdraw from wide involvement in power bloc alliances; in the emergence of the People's Republic of China from its long isolation to mend its international relationships; and in the problem of the existence of the small nations, including that of the Republic of China; the efforts of Soviet Russia to project a new image even as a peace seeker. On the economic front, nations are already exploring new ways to carry on international trade on a novel basis, that is, no longer the basis of the dollar but by means of a more flexible system, which would obviate the wrenching fluctuations of foreign exchange rates when speculation in gold gets out of hand. On the social scene, we are witness to new cultures and subcultures; we are concerned with problems of ecology and the environment, things we had not even given a thought to only ten years ago.

Thus, if we must cope with the emerging world of tomorrow, in many ways a strange and alien world, we must evolve a new breed of leaders.

Today, even as we sit here in comparative equanimity, our country is faced with an inescapable problem—the problem of self-reliance. Events and the promise of greater change summon us to face up to this problem. No longer must we depend on the old certainty of powerful friends coming to our aid in a time of peril. It is not that we do not trust these friends, it is just that the world is changing in a way that they may not be able to come to our aid. No longer can we trust our destiny to the magnanimity of allies, nor to the concerted action of a family of nations aligned on one side. There may never be a gathering of allies anymore for that matter, as when the free world rallied to save an occupied France, or an embattled England; nor would the United Nations rise up in arms again, as when South Korea was invaded. Anyone who has studied the indications of current history will come to the same conclusion. With the war in Vietnam indelibly inscribed on the conscience of the world, there may never again be a spontaneous response to a country in distress by its friends. In every crisis in the future, a country must stand or fall alone. This seems to be the stark reality of our day and age.

That is why self-reliance is central and current to our problems today, and in confronting this problem, again we come to the imperative of leadership.

It is not enough that we find the material means to build a shield of indigenous forces. It is not enough that we somehow must amass an arsenal for defense. Contemporary experience shows other requirements, and for that matter history itself dictates the need for such requirements. Chief among these requirements is that we must have the leadership to use our resources well, whether these are economic goods, or formidable weaponry, or a strong army of citizens, or a viable industrial community. We must have men to show the way to the attainment of these goals. Whether it is in the military, or in the civilian sector, whether it is in politics or in business, the cry is for a new kind of leadership, a leadership not only adept, but dedicated, a leadership well trained. I repeat, even in politics there is a crying need for a new breed of leaders. The old class of political leaders that my generation still knows will no longer be able to bring about the kind of world that we want.

Today, those among us who wield leadership, or who have the makings of a leader, have a particular and special task to perform. This is the task of rallying our people, so that they will come together in essential unity to grapple with the most urgent of our problems.

I am convinced that our gravest problems would be easier to solve if we could generate enough unity among our people to consider together the directions and the means we should choose in overcoming the various problems that beset us. I am convinced that we have not achieved this unity, not since we all went underground together in the years of the Occupation, out of a deep and moving realization that the only way to survive, to defeat a superior enemy, was to fight together. Since then, we have reverted as a people to the old ways, or rather we have gone our separate ways, each, it would seem, looking out only for himself. The secret of strength in a nation, that of oneness of a brotherhood, has been lost somewhere along the way.

We therefore need leaders to awaken our people to the new aggressors that assail us; we need leaders to enlighten our people on the danger from the enemy within our country and within ourselves. We need leaders to forge a unity arising from a sense of common destiny. We need leaders to bring about the kind of living conditions which would inspire our people to stand together in defense of that way of life.

This is the special task reserved for the leaders that we must train and field all over the nation, whether in the military or in the civil sector.

I like to think that you, and others like you who have gone through this, course, are the leaders who shall form the hard core of this national leadership that I speak of. I like to think that in the difficult days to come, when we shall be charting new ways to meet old and new problems, when we shall be actively and deeply engaged by predictable and unpredictable crises, there will be this hard core of leaders to stand fast, to work quietly and coolly, to remain unruffled and steadfast above the storm, to make the right and binding decisions.

If indeed we succeed in creating this body of leadership, then we can be certain that we shall attain our most urgent goal, that of self-reliance in a nation, whether it is in putting up a defense against external aggressors, or it is in perfecting a stance of economic independence, or it is in elevating the social and cultural standards of our people.

I regard all of you who are graduating today as early components, the core, of the leadership we need. May you prove true to your trust, and may you continually post achievements in service to your country, now and in the years to come.

God be with you.

Address of President Marcos on the 74th anniversary of the proclamation of Philippine independence, June 12, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
On the 74th anniversary of the proclamation of Philippine independence

[Delivered at the Rizal Park, June 12, 1972]

A Constant Creed

FOR A PEOPLE, the best of times is that which recalls a shining sense of glory.

This is the one such moment, the celebration of Philippine Independence Day.

I know that not all Filipinos share this feeling. There are those who have publicly called this milestone in our history a sham.

In their dogmatic way, having embraced a dogmatic ideology, they have labelled our freedom and our nationhood a sham as well.

You and I know better. We know that the democratic impulse has always run strong in our people, that it is the force which has driven our people through history in search of freedom and dignity.

We know that 74 years ago today, that search had seemed ended. At that time, we became at last a people together, a nation born. And no one can dispute the shining sense of glory which then united and exalted our people, that other day long ago, on the 12th of June.

That day was real. And the independence we won was real, as real as the blood that Filipino soldiers shed to arrive at that instance in our history, as real as the vision of our heroes of a people coming into its own as one race and as one national community, the vision that animated Rizal and Bonifacio and Mabini, and the man who led the battles against the tyrants, the first President of the First Republic, General Emilio Aguinaldo.

But it was a fleeting moment of self-realization. Nearly half a century would pass before we could call ourselves a nation again, a nation reborn.

It is proper, however, that we should celebrate that first birth of a nation as our true Independence Day. Culminated on that day were the centuries of longing, subjugation, sacrifice and struggle. It was the day that ended a precipitate clash of arms, the day that proclaimed Filipino freedom and sovereignty by dint of blood and courage. Although in later years we had again to fight another war before our nation could be reborn, it was that first struggle for independence which was purest in content and substance, a struggle which embodied the passionate outcry of a people long held in bondage, a cry for selfhood and dignity as human beings.

We never again lost that sense of purpose although the intervening years were peaceful and benign. The freedom that we had for a brief, bright moment informed our passage through the burgeoning new century, and within the democratic means that we learned to use and value, we carried on the struggle for self-government. In a way they were good years. At the same time, it was a period of self-discovery, unformed, inchoate, prayerful. It was also a time of testing. A time of trial carried on from the first days of the struggle against the Spanish dispensation.

From that time on our people have undergone a constant testing. Under a new master, we were tested anew as to purpose and community of spirit, tested for maturity, tested for capacity to hold together as a people, tested for endurance, tested for consanguinity in a changing world—can we survive in it as a free people? A sovereign nation?

The ultimate test at that time was the second great war. Our country was engulfed like much of the rest of the world, our people taken prisoners by the enemy, like much of the rest of the world, but unlike many other such captive peoples we fought back, thus passing that ultimate test.

With the rebirth of the Republic, the testing of our powers, purpose and profundity as a people took a new turn, a new measure. This time we were adrift in a world changing once again. As old empires broke up and new nations emerged, a profound change began to shape up in the world. We had an inkling of it, but little understanding of its depth and scope. Not until the last decade when the great underground torrent of change burst to the surface did we know that our democracy and nationhood must again undergo a test.

We are still in the throes of this new probing of our strength and our spirit amid a radical transformation of the old safe world we knew, where relationships long held valid and secure are being transformed into new shapes and tensions.

The time has come however to be realistic and hard-headed about our independence and to see everything not in the lambent light of historical idealism but in the white glare of contemporary realism.

The most visible symbols of American presence in the country are the U.S. bases. The effect of the treaty on our sovereignty was one of the main topics of the technical panel discussions between representatives of the United States and the Philippines, the first phase of the negotiations which must now be elevated to the policy level.

Increasingly, however, it is beginning to be felt that the discussion of the bases issue has passed the point in which correcting the inequality of the bases agreement is the main issue. The issue is whether the retention of the United States bases on Philippine territory serves the purposes of alliance which gave birth to the agreement.

The original purposes for which these bases were established may not exist anymore. In the contemporary context, the questions that arise are: do these bases exist solely for the mutual defense of our two countries or do they perpetuate American participation in Philippine affairs and support American experiments in Asia? These are the questions that the extremists as well as the communist thinkers and believers in freedom are asking.

I have therefore called for a deep and speedy review of the bases and other military agreements as well as the Laurel-Langley Agreement between the United States and the Philippines.

This is the necessary first step to give real meaning to our independence. From this will follow the other steps that will enrich our economic and cultural life.

We believe that our independence will be meaningless unless we have successfully declared ourselves fully liberated from foreign influence and control.

This has been the main thrust of my thinking and policies since the beginning of my Administration. The more impatient among us did not like the subtle shifts in thinking and policies that we have had to make over the years in order to prepare the ground for this new direction. But the caution and the care were necessary in the light of both the domestic and the international situations.

But now we can take the initiatives. The situation both here and abroad permits this bold, forward step.

I am convinced that only a positive response from all of our people can see us through this most rigid of all the tests we have had to undergo. Our time in history in this challenging era is the most crucial, for we have more at stake today than at any time in the past. We have our nationhood itself at stake. We live or die as a free people, depending on how we respond to the mandate of change and to the mortal dangers that necessarily accompany the upheaval that comes with so fundamental a transformation as the world now experiences.

And my first feeling in the face of this tumult is that in order to summon strength we must be a united nation, a people fused together as one great force.

This unity is all the more essential in the face of the gathering forces of ideological dissent, an organized dissent directed from without by experienced masters in conspiracy, a powerful wedge whose thrust was precisely toward the fragmentation not only of our government but of our people. Unity therefore is no more than an elementary response to this strategy.

But I see unity as more than just a solid front against ideological dissension. We need to marshal our forces anyhow against the problems that face us in the socio-economic field and the problems of government which have long plagued our leaders and administrators, problems arising from bureaucratic lethargy and indifference, not to mention the unwieldy organization which has become a monster.

Unity can overcome these problems to a certain important extent, and I consider this of the utmost urgency for we must put out of the way as soon as possible these comparatively easier matters before we can tackle and overcome the more sensitive problems of discontent, poverty, underdevelopment, and national security. If we can reorganize the government now to make it a more effective instrument for dealing with day to day routine as well as with high priority programs of development to make it into a sophisticated machinery which can quickly adjust to new and complex requirements, then we shall be better equipped for the emergencies, the crises of change and external relations for the perceivable shifts in worldwide alignments even now taking shape, even now presaging the passing of an age.

More and more, in the face of these challenges to our country, we must become one family. It is indeed toward this condition that I hope to lead our people, for more and more we are going to be a family embattled. We can no longer afford the luxury of eccentricity, however interesting it might be, for we are involved with survival. If we must prevail, we must prevail as a family for it is the only way to endure. Even more powerful nations than ours are pulling back from extended positions outward, to consolidate, to shape up for the needed transformation of their own lands and societies. We can do no less perhaps because of the very nature of our present stage of development we need to do more.

For instance, we need to stand alone now. For the time may come when we may no longer depend upon mutual or bilateral defense. In the future, when the chips are down, our country can depend on no one but itself. Thus, before it is too late we must consider a new security posture based realistically on our own resources and capabilities. Events in this century are moving swiftly, often too swiftly for proper analysis and projection, thus entailing quick reflexes. We cannot abide procrastination if we must remain prepared for any exigency. We must be self-reliant in the defense of our interests now, not in some indeterminate future. Those who scoff at our efforts to build a self-reliant citizen army who question our ability to do so, and bleed at the cost of such a program, are not conversant with present realities. It may be said that they are bent on marching forward to the past.

But if we are to attain our goals, we must march forward, not to the past but to the future. And we must do this as one family, a nation united. The gaps between our ranks are perhaps wide, but not too wide that we cannot close ranks. Even the generation gap can be closed, the gap between the old still in search of lost innocence and the young in search of a never-never land. There must be some realistic, acceptable middle ground for the two generations to meet and fuse, and then get on with the task at hand—that of preserving our freedom, of enlarging our field of progress, that of strengthening our options for a good life.

These goals are not beyond us. And that is what we celebrate today—the opportunity given to us by those who fought for our freedom to make of our land and of ourselves whatever we want them to be. To preserve that opportunity should be our constant creed.

New Vistas in Filipino-American Relations

I TAKE SPECIAL pleasure in extending to all of you my warmest congratulations on the completion of your university education. You belong to one of the most unusual groups of college graduates anywhere in the world: Americans for the most part, working and studying in a United States air base, under Filipino professors, in a special branch of the University of the Philippines. This arrangement would be difficult to duplicate anywhere and, indeed, the academic program of U.P. at Clark Air Base may well be without parallel elsewhere in the world.

As an alumnus of the University of the Philippines, I view this academic operation of my Alma Mater in this United States air base with a great deal of satisfaction. It demonstrates, first of all, the wide-ranging capabilities and resources of the State University, an academic institution supported by the taxes of our people and serving as the apex of our system of education. Beyond their knowledge and skill as teachers, however, Dean Favilla and his colleagues from Diliman deserve your special thanks for their loyal dedication to their success of this program.

Even more noteworthy is the fact that this academic program illustrates the best and most generous type of collaboration between Filipinos and Americans. America's most precious gift to the Philippines has been the gift of public education. Following the end of the Philippine-American war at the turn of the century, hundreds of American soldiers took off their uniforms to become the first teachers in our newly organized public school system. They were joined by thousands of American teachers who sailed across the Pacific and volunteered for service in every province of the archipelago. The posts of Secretary Public Instruction and Director of Education were held by Americans until the thirties. The University of the Philippines, founded in 1908, had Americans as its first and third presidents.

There is a kind of poetic justice in the fact that the children and grandchildren of the Filipinos who had studied under American teachers should now, in turn, be teaching the latter's children and grandchildren, and in their own tongue. One other fact worth noting, of course, is that most of the professors who come to teach at Clark took their advanced degrees in the United States, many of them with the help of American foundations.

This, then, is one of the most extraordinary and heart-warming examples of collaboration between two peoples differing in race, language and culture, and separated from each other by ten thousand miles of ocean. It is all the more extraordinary because it involves an activity that is totally distinct from, if not alien, to the primary purpose of a military installation like this. It is as if Filipinos and Americans, standing firmly together in this time of confusion and violence, are telling the world: "We assert the primacy of the human spirit, we shall keep the lamp of knowledge burning, we insist on the basic human right to education." What a great thing it is that Filipinos and Americans should be making this affirmation under conditions that have completely obliterated all accidents of race, and in particular, any and all false notions of racial inferiority or superiority. For here, at Clark, there are now two races of men trying to discover what makes them different; mere is only one, single group of human beings engaged in one and the same task of pursuing knowledge and acquiring an education—the only activity that separates man from beast.

I am informed that U. P. at Clark Air Base was to have been phased out and closed two or three years ago, mainly because of serious difficulties that had developed in the course of its operation. Those difficulties were, of course, inevitable: education, by its nature, is open and free, while a military base, by its nature, is anything but open and free. It was not easy for the University of the Philippines to adjust to the conditions and requirements of a military base, and neither was it easy for a military base to adjust to the spirit of the university. Only by a mutual recognition of the inherent difficulty of the relationship could this educational collaboration be continued. I am gratified by the information that the University has agreed to maintain this unit at Clark on the strength of assurances given by the authorities of the base that the professors of the University will enjoy at all times the right to enter the base in order to perform their legitimate functions, without demeaning requirements of any kind, and to be treated at all times in a manner compatible with their rank and dignity as professors. Whenever the authorities of the base should determine that this kind of treatment cannot, for security or other reasons, be accorded the professors of the University, then the only recourse would be to terminate the operation of U.P. at Clark Air Base. This would be a clear-cut decision based on the recognition of incompatible necessities. We should not tolerate one more source of irritation in an area that is plagued all too frequently by needless misunderstanding between Americans and Filipinos.

We are gathered here on an extremely sensitive enclave on Philippine territory. This base, one of the most important bases of the world's first super power, as well as others like it, will soon be the subject of negotiations between the Philippines and the United States. The problem, in effect, is to determine what role the United States bases in the Philippines is to play in the coming years, having regard to the re-alignment of forces and the new configuration of power relationships that are taking shape in our part of the world.

These bases were established twenty-five years ago at the inception of the "cold war", at a time when the division of the world into two bitterly opposed ideological camps seemed total. It was relatively easy for nations, acting in their national interest, to choose sides, lending their support to that which they thought would better ensure their security and happiness. In the black-and-white political world of the '40's and '50's, most nations did take sides; they joined ideological blocs, economic unions, or military alliances and some agreed to the establishment of foreign military bases on their soil such as Clark Air base.

The world of the '70's is an entirely different world. With the Nixon doctrine and as a result of President Nixon's historic visits to Peking and Moscow this year, the polarized world of the '40's is no more. The black-and-white chess board of power politics is being replaced by a new board of indistinct gray. Or perhaps, it is the game that is being changed; it is no longer a chess game but a game of poker with five or six players participating.

Chess is a two-handed game, a confrontation of champions representing two camps; but poker is basically a game of four or more players each committed only to winning for himself. The world appears to be moving in the direction of a colossal political poker game in which the traditional concepts of blocks and alliances are doomed to become obsolete.

It is in the context of this changing pattern of world politics that the future relations between the Philippines and the United States, and therefore the future of American bases in the Philippines, must be re-examined.

This is not the occasion to indicate what the nature of those relations and what the future of these bases will be. Only one thing is certain: these will have to be modified in line with our respective conceptions of national interest.

Our hope is that, after careful reflection, we shall discover a sufficient degree of common interest to justify the establishment of relations between our countries on a basis of a reciprocal benefit and mutual respect. Further, the Americans and Filipinos will bring to these negotiations a spirit of much regard and accommodation, which perforce animates conferences between equals like Washington and Moscow, but which is extraordinarily difficult to generate in discussions between equals, like Washington and Manila.

For our part, we shall bring to the conference table the profound faith we have in the libertarian principles and democratic institutions which we share with the American people. We shall have full regard for the responsibilities of the United States in today's world, and the uses to which American power may be put in the context of those responsibilities. But we shall also be animated by our awareness of our proper place and destiny in the world of Asia, and by our responsibility to make a contribution commensurate with our capabilities to the peace, freedom and happiness of the Asian peoples.

Radio-TV Address of President Marcos, September 23, 1972

Radio-TV Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines

[Delivered in Malacañang, September 23, 1972]

First Address to the Nation
under Martial Law

MY COUNTRYMEN, AS of the 21st of this month, I signed Proclamation No. 1081 placing the entire Philippines under martial law. This proclamation was to be implemented upon my clearance and clearance was granted 9 o'clock in the evening of the 22nd, last night.

I have proclaimed martial law in accordance with the powers vested in the President by the Constitution of the Philippines. The proclamation of martial law is not a military takeover. I, as your duly elected President of the Republic use this power which may be implemented by the military authorities but still is a power embodied in the Constitution to protect the Republic of the Philippines and our democracy. A republican, a democratic form of government is not helpless government. When it is imperilled by the danger of violent overthrow, an insurrection or a rebellion, it has inherent and built-in powers wisely provided for under the Constitution.

Such a danger confronts the Republic of the Philippines. Article 7, Section 10, paragraph 2 of the Constitution provides and I quote:

“The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of all Armed Forces of Philippines and whenever it becomes necessary he may call out such armed forces to prevent or suppress lawless violence, invasion, insurrection or rebellion. In case of invasion, insurrection or rebellion or imminent danger thereof, when the public safety requires it, he may suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus or place the Philippines or any part thereof under law.”

I repeat: This is not a military takeover of civilian government functions. The government of the Republic of the Philippines, which was established by our people in 1946, continues. The officials and employees of our national and local governments continue in office and must discharge their duties as before within the limits of the situation. This will be clarified by the subsequent orders which shall be given wide publicity.

Thus, I also issued General Order No. 3 wherein I directed that in view of the proclamation of martial law, which proclamation and other orders incidentally will be read after this broadcast by the Press Secretary, in view of such a proclamation and in order to make more effective the implementation of such a proclamation without unduly affecting the operations of the government and in order to end the present national emergency within the shortest possible time, I have ordered that all executive departments, bureaus, offices, agencies and instrumentalities of the national government, government-owned or controlled corporations, as well as all governments of all the provinces, the cities, the municipalities and barrios throughout the land shall continue to function under the present officers and employees and in accordance with existing laws until otherwise ordered by me or by my duly designated representative.

I further read and I quote:

“I do hereby further order that the judiciary shall continue to function in accordance with its present organization and personnel and shall try and decide in accordance with existing laws all criminal and civil cases except the following cases:

“1. Those involving the validity, legality or constitutionality of any decree, order or act issued, promulgated or performed by my duly designated representative pursuant to Proclamation No. 1081, dated September 21, 1972.

“2. Those involving the validity, legality or constitutionality of any rule, order or act issued, promulgated or performed by public servants pursuant to decrees, orders, rules and regulations issued and promulgated by me or by my duly designated representative pursuant to Proclamation No. 1081, dated September 21, 1972.

“3. Those involving crimes against national security and the law of nations.

“4. Those involving crimes against the fundamental laws of the state.

“5. Those involving crimes against public order.

“6. Those crimes involving usurpation of authority, rank, title and improper use of names, uniforms and insignias.

“7. Those involving crimes committed by public officers.”

In addition to these, I would like to announce that all schools will, in the meantime, be closed. They will be closed for one week beginning this coming Monday. This means all schools at all levels.

I have also issued General Orders for the government in the meantime to control media and other means of dissemination of information as well as all public utilities. And I asked the international and domestic communications, corporations and carriers to desist from transmitting any messages without the permission of my Office through the Office of the Press Secretary.

The carrying of firearms outside residences even if such firearms are covered by licenses but without the permission of the Armed Forces of the Philippines is punishable by death.

Curfew is established from 12 o'clock midnight to 4 o'clock in the morning.

The departure of Filipinos abroad is temporarily suspended. Exceptions, of course, are official missions that may be necessary. Clearances will be given by the Secretary of National Defense.

In the meantime, rallies and demonstrations are prohibited. So, too, are strikes especially in critical public utilities.

I have ordered the arrest of those directly involved in the conspiracy to overthrow our duly constituted government by violence and subversion.

It is my intention beginning tomorrow to issue all the orders which would attain reforms in our society. This would include the proclamation of land reform all over the Philippines, the reorganization of the government, new rules for the conduct of civil servants and those in the civil service, the removal of corrupt and inefficient public officials and their replacements including those in the judiciary and the breaking up of criminal syndicates.

The persons who will be adversely affected are those who are active participants in the conspiracy and operations to overthrow the duly constituted government of the Republic of the Philippines by violence or by subversion.

All public officials and employees, whether of the national or local government, must now conduct themselves in the manner of a new and reformed society. We will explain the requirements and standards or details as soon as possible.

But any form of corruption, culpable negligence or arrogance will be dealt with immediately.

The armed forces are already cleaning up their own ranks. I am directing the organization of a military commission to investigate, try and punish all military offenders immediately. For more than any other man the soldier must set a standard of nobility. We must be courageous, yes, but we must be humble and above all, we must be fair. As this is true of the soldier, it must be true of the civilian public officer. Let no man who claims to be a friend, relative or at presume to seek license because of this relationship.

If you offend the New Society, you shall be punished like the rest of the offenders.

Persons who have nothing whatsoever to do with such conspiracy and operations to overthrow the Republic of the Philippines by violence or sub-version have nothing to fear. They can move about and perform their daily activities without any apprehension from action or counteraction by the government especially after the period of counteraction which I have directed to be taken against the conspirators.

I repeat: This government is the same government that you, the people established in 1946 under the Constitution of the Philippines. There is no doubt in everybody's mind that a state of rebellion exists in the Philippines. The ordinary man in the streets of our cities, the peasants, the laborers know it. Industrialists know it. So does the government functionary. They have all been affected by it.

This danger to the Republic of the Philippines and the existence of a rebellion has been recognized even by our Supreme Court in its decision in the case of Lansang vs. Garcia et al dated December 11, 1971.

But, since the Supreme Court promulgated this decision, the danger has become graver and rebellion has worsened and escalated. It has paralyzed functions of the national and local governments. The productive sectors of the economy have been grounded to a halt. Many schools have closed down. The judiciary is unable to administer justice. Many of our businessmen, traders, industrialists, producers, manufacturers have stopped their operations. In the Greater Manila alone, tension and anxiety have reached the point where the citizens are compelled to stay home. Lawlessness and criminality like kidnapping, smuggling, extortion, blackmailing, armed robbery, illegal traffic in drugs, gun-running, hoarding, manipulation of prices, corruption in government, tax evasion, perpetrated by syndicated criminals have increasingly escalated beyond the capability of the local police and civilian authorities. The usually busy centers of Greater Manila such as cinema houses, supermarkets, restaurants, transportation terminals and even public markets are practically deserted.

Battles are going on between the elements of our government forces and the subversives in Luzon, the Visayas and Mindanao. In Luzon, particularly in Isabela, Zambales, Tarlac, Camarines Sur, Quezon and in Mindanao, especially in Lanao del Sur, Lanao del Norte, Zamboanga del Sur and Cotabato. If this continues even at the present rate, the economy of the country will collapse, the country will collapse in a short time. In one province alone, Isabela, which we shall adopt as an example, where the Communist Party and the New People's Army have sought to establish a rural sanctuary, they are now in control of 33 municipalities out of 37. Other towns are infiltrated severely by these armed elements of the communists. In this province alone, the supposed invisible government of the Communist Party has been organized through the Barrio Organizing Committees known as the BOC's totalling 207 in 25 towns. In early 1971 there were only 161 BOC's in 12 towns.

In addition to the Barrio Organizing Committees, they have also organized the Barrio Revolutionary Committees or BRC's. And in Angadanan and Cauayan of that same province of Isabela, the New People's Army has established communal farms and production bases.

The New People's Army has started to expand its operations to Cagayan, Nueva Vizcaya, and Quirino as well as the Mt. Provinces like Ifugao, Kalinga-Apayao, Bontoc and Benguet and even the two Ilocos provinces of Ilocos Sur and La Union have been infiltrated.

The New People's Army and the Communist Party have also sought to establish in a similar pattern a rural sanctuary in the province of Camarines Sur and they are attempting to expand into Albay, Sorsogon and Camarines Norte as well as Quezon province.

The armed elements of the Communist Party of the Philippines, Maois faction, have increased to about 10,000 which include regulars as well as farmers in the daytime and soldiers at night. This is an increase of 100 percent in a short period of six months. These parties increased their mass base to 100,000 and their front organization's operations have increased tremendously also. An example of such a front organization is the Kabataang Makabayan, the most militant organization of the Communist Party which has increased its chapters from 200 in 1970 to 317 at the end of the month of July this year and its membership from 10,000 in 1970 to about 15,000 at the end of July of this year.

The Samahang Demokratikong Kabataan or SDK, an outspoken front organization of the Communist Party increased its chapters from almost none in 1970 to 159 at the end of July of this year, and now, has 1,495 highly indoctrinated and fanatical members.

The crucial point which indicates an increase in the capability, the area of operations as well as the manpower and firepower of the New People's Army is the M/V Karagatan or Palanan incident in Palanan, Isabela, last July 4th and 5th of this year. This was a landing by an ocean-going ship of a reported 3,500 M-14 rifles of which only about 900 were recovered by the Armed Forces of the Philippines. About 30 rocket launchers of the M-40 variety of which only 6, were recovered from the area. This rocket can pierce steel 18 inches thick at and reinforced concrete of 36 inches thickness as well as 4 sandbags put together. Also captured by our government troops in this Palanan landing were two. Browning automatic rifles which were originally looted by defector Victor Corpus, from the arsenal of the Philippine Military Academy, five garand M-1 rifles, 1 telephone switchboard, 7 telephone sets, some magazines for rifles and many revealing subversive documents.

This landing of military armaments and equipment in Palanan, Isabela indicated:

1. That the claim of the New People's Army that they are well funded and have plenty of money has basis in fact.
2. That they now have sources of funds and equipment not only from inside the Philippines but also from outside our country.
3. That the Communist Party and the New People's Army are capable of landing armaments, military equipment and even personnel in the many unguarded points of the long sea coast of the Philippines, which sea coast is twice that of the United States. The defense establishment has submitted that there have been attempts to infiltrate the military organizations as well as the Office of the Secretary of National Defense. There have been various incidents and attempts to sabotage not only the operations of the Armed Forces of the Philippines but the operations of the national government. It has been reported that the communications system of the Philippine Constabulary is being utilized by the subversives. The subversives have organized urban partisans in the Greater Manila Area and they have been and still are very active. They have succeeded in some of their objectives.

The violent disorder in Mindanao and Sulu has to date resulted in the killing of over 1,000 civilians and about 2,000 armed Muslims and Christians, not to mention the more than 500,000 of injured, displaced and homeless persons as well as the great number of casualties among our government troops.

At the same time, the economy of Mindanao and Sulu is almost completely paralyzed.

I assure you that I am utilizing this power for the proclamation of martial law vested in me by the Constitution for one purpose alone, and that is, to save the Republic and reform our society. I wish to emphasize these two objectives. We will eliminate the threat of a violent overthrow of our Republic, but at the same time, we must now reform the social, economic and political institutions in our country. The plans, the order for reforms and removal of the inequities of our society, the clean-up of government of its corrupt and sterile elements, the liquidation of the criminal syndicates, the systematic development of our economy, the general program for a new and better Philippines will be explained to you. But we must start out with the elimination of anarchy and the maintenance of peace and order.

I have had to use this constitutional power in order that we may not completely lose the civil rights and freedom we cherish.

I assure you that this is not a precipitate decision, and that I have weighed all the factors. If there were any other solution at our disposal and within our capability which could solve this problem, we would have utilized such a solution and I would have chosen it. But there was none. I have used the other two alternatives of, first calling out the troops to quell the rebellion and I have suspended the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. But the rebellion has not been stopped.

I repeat, it has worsened. Thus, it was discovered that when the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was lifted on January 11, 1972, the organizations of the Communist Party had expanded their area of operations as well as increased their membership.

So, these two remedies, calling out of the troops and the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, are unavailing. You are all witnesses to this. You have witnessed the events of the last year. We have fallen and we are falling back on our last line of defense. You are also witnesses to the patience that we have shown in the face of the provocation. In the face of abuse and license, we have used or attempted to use persuasion. Now, the limit has been reached, for we are against the wall. We must now defend the Republic of the Philippines with this stronger power granted by the Constitution. To those guilty of treason, insurrection, rebellion, it may pose a grave danger. But to the ordinary citizens, to almost all of you whose primary concern is merely to be left alone to pursue your lawful activities, this is the guarantee of that freedom that you seek. All that I do is for the Republic and for you.

Rest assured that I will continue to do so and I have prayed to God for guidance. Let us all continue to pray to Him. I am confident that with God's help, we will attain our dream of a reformed society, a new and brighter world.

Second Address to the Nation Under Martial Law

MGA KABABAYAN NGAYON po ay ika-tatlumpung araw na ang nakalipas pagkatapos ng proklamasyon ng batas hukbo. Sa bisa ng pasiyang iyan ay nagbago ang kasaysayan marahil hindi lamang sa ating bansang Pilipinas kung hindi sa buong Silangang Asya.

Unang-una napigil natin ang isang tahasang panganib sa ating Republika nguni't bukod diyan at lalong mahalaga ay naitindig natin ang watawat ng isang bagong lipunan na sa bawa't araw ay siyang bumubuo ng isang matibay na saligan para sa kinabukasan ng demokrasya sa ating bansa.

Kaya't ngayon, mga kasama, sa buong daigdig ay marahil namamalas nila ang isang pagbabagong buhay dito sa Pilipinas. Nakikita nila ang lahing Pilipino ay nagkakaisa ngayon sa pagbubuo ng isang bagong lipunan, isang lipunang marangya, matiwasay at makatarungan

Marahil sa wari ng mga taga ibang bansa ay nagkakaroon ng himala ang Pilipinas. Sa wakas ay natuklasan ng mga Pilipino ang disiplinang sosyal at pambansa na malaon nang hinanap nguni't hindi masumpungan. Sa biglang turing ito ay dulot lamang ng martial law subali't ang katotohanan ay may ugat ang ugaling iyan sa puso at budhi ng bawa't isang Pilipino. Ang tinungkol ng martial law at ng inyong abang lingkod ay ang buhayin ang ugat na iyan at tulungang lumaya ang mga katangian ng lahing Pilipino.

Mga kababayan, sa tingin ko ay lubhang angkop na sa araw na ito, ika tatlumpung araw ng martial law ay nagtipun-tipun tayo rito upang lagdaan sa aking ipakita ang pagsusulat ng isang mahalagang kasulatan. Sa pagkakataon ito ay ating papahayag ang katubusan ng magsasakang Pilipino.

Lalagdaan natin ang dokumentong naglilipat sa mga lupang sinasaka mula sa kamay ng mga may-ari ng lupa o propetaryo sa kamay ng mga magsasakang nagbubungkal niyan. Ang ibig sabihin nito ay ating itinalaga and buong kapangyarihan ng martial law sa katubusan at kalayaan ng mga magsasaka na siyang nakararami sa ating bayan. Masasabing iisa lamang ang simulain ng Bagong Lipunan, unahin muna ang kapakanan ng bayan, ang kapakanan ng mga maliliit at daang mga mamamayan.

At ito ang simulaing itinatagubilin sa buong pamahalaan.

I have written in my own handwriting this document, Presidential Decree No. 27, decreeing the emancipation of tenants from the bondage to the land they till. And I read: "Inasmuch as the old concept of land ownership by a few has spawned valid and legitimate grievances that gave rise to violent conflict and social tension, the redress of such legitimate grievances being one of the fundamental objectives of the New Society; since reformation must start, as a foundation, with the land and with the emancipation of the tiller of that land from his bondage, now, therefore, I, FERDINAND E. MARCOS, President of the Republic of the Philippines, by virtue of the powers in me vested by the Constitution as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the Philippines, and pursuant to Proclamation No. 1081 dated September 21st, 1972 and General Order No. 1 dated September 22, 1972 as amended, do hereby decree and order, henceforth, from this day on October 21st, 1972, the emancipation of tenant-farmers of the Philippines."

This shall apply to farmer-tenants of private agricultural lands, the principal product of which is rice and corn under sharecrop or lease tenancy all over the 'Philippines. They shall be deemed the owners of their land and each shall be entitled to a family-size farm of five hectares.

This particular document further establishes the mechanism and the instrument by which such ownership is transferred to the tenant-owner. The tenant-farmer in a landed estate, as well as the tenant farmer in a piece of land which may not be considered a landed estate, are covered by this proclamation. Landowners may retain seven hectares only of their land and on condition that they themselves till or cultivate it.

What will be the consideration for the transfer of ownership? The consideration for the transfer of ownership or the cause of such transfer will be the rent of which the land-owner is entitled under leasehold for 15 years, nothing more. In short, the government will be kept out of this transaction, and this will be a transaction between the tenant and the landowner, a transaction to transfer Ownership. Payment shall be guaranteed by a cooperative, and at the same time, be further guaranteed by the government but only with stocks in government-owned or controlled corporations. In order, however, that the landowner may not in turn become displaced in his own country, he shall be extended all forms of relief and assistance. This shall take the form of credit. In order that he may move into industry, taking advantage of his capability and talent in management, we shall furnish him all available opportunities for purchasing public land, undeveloped but alienable and disposable. We shall indicate to landowners the nature of the productive activities which the government and the state will encourage for them. The tenant in turn must organize cooperatives, for it is indeed clear that no matter how much land we may transfer to the tenants, if they do not band together and organize themselves into cooperatives such transfer will merely be temporary and the land may ultimately end in the hands of acquisitive individuals.

Therefore, it is also prohibited that this land be transferred except by hereditary succession. It is also made a condition that government shall now participate actively in the organization of cooperatives. By virtue of this, hereby activate the machinery for the organization of cooperatives and the training of our farmers for cooperative farming. There are now about 1,900 trainers and organizers for immediate activation. We have been training there for the past several months.

Mga kasama, hindi lamang ang tagumpay ng mga maliliit na mga magsasaka ang pinakamahalaga sa araw na ito sapagka't isang buwan na ang nakalipas buhat noong aking ipiniroklama ang batas ng hukbo. Kailangan ngayon nating usisain kung ano ang nangyari buhat noong ika-dalawampu at isa ng Setyembre sa pagsisimula ng martial law.

There were many among us naturally who imagined that martial law would inaugurate a vicious dictatorship in our country. This is perhaps understandable because of the very term "martial law." Martial Law connotes something arbitrary; it connotes the apparent replacement of constitutional law with personal law or law by the Commander-in-Chief. In many states, this perhaps its common meaning and the common experience of the people.

It is one of the basic and significant developments in our country during the emergency, that we have instituted a rule by martial law that is humane and constitutional. It is martial law which, while revolutionary, is also legal, which radical in the pursuit of change, is non-violent.

I am proud to commend the Department of National Defense and the officers and men of the Armed Forces of the Philippines for the orderly and peaceful implementation of the proclamation.

No man is prouder of our Armed Forces than your Commander-in-Chief and your President; no man is prouder of this demonstration of competent discipline, dedication and patriotism that you have shown in the exercises these emergency powers of government.

But the peaceful transition to martial law is not the achievement of the military alone. It is due also to the cooperation of the entire Filipino people from the lowest to the highest man. Everywhere in our country, from city countryside, our people have shown the will and faith to see that this fateful turn in their individual and national life will usher in reforms in our country. They have placed themselves at the service of a sweeping constitutional program of reforms.

What do we seek to achieve by this constitutional revolution? Our purpose is two-fold. First, we seek to eradicate the armed force of the rebellion and anarchy that has long threatened the stability of our Republic. At the same time, we have to remove and eradicate completely the social roots of this rebellion by instituting fundamental reforms in our society, and displace the old iniquitous order with a just and progressive one. It is the second objective that has become of paramount significance to our people today. For they see now that what could not be done before, what only existed in dream and aspiration yesterday, is today taking place in our country. In this, they see clearly, in whose name this constitutional revolution is being waged.

And I say today that we shall not forfeit this chance to secure peace, justice, dignify and prosperity, for every Filipino and for our national community.

These are the basic purposes of our revolution and they underline every action of our government since September 21.

Let me now review, the activities of the government geared to the achievement of these goals.

First, in our objective of restoring peace and order throughout the country and of meeting the brunt of the insurgency, we have pursued a three-pronged thrust against this cancer in our society. Measures have been taken in the field against the insurgents and rebels in all areas where dissident activities have seen flourishing during the past months. These have been combined with measures to dismantle the apparatus of propaganda and recruitment of the insurgency movement that has infiltrated our schools and universities, and the factories and industries. At the same time, we have extended this campaign to eliminate once and for all the forces of crime and violence in our country. The private armies of politicians have been disarmed and many have been taken into custody. Criminal elements all over the country, who are suspects in various crimes ranging from murder to theft, have been apprehended. The firearms ban has been enforced to the letter, and as of this date, we have collected 30,428 firearms and 1,159,676 rounds of ammunition. In one province alone, we have collected 10,700 firearms.

This campaign continues, and I am certain that many more arms will be collected, many more criminals and rebels will be apprehended before there is tranquility in our cities and countryside. I ask for the cooperation and assistance of our people in this drive.

Second, in keeping with Presidential Decree No. 1, reorganizing the Executive Branch of the government, we have combined a drive to rid the government service of "the notoriously undesirable" with a determined effort to streamline the bureaucracy and make government a more effective instrument for the achievement of national objectives. The provisions of the reorganization plan is being followed to the letter: agencies with similar functions are being organized into one unit; the regional agencies of government are being rendered more functional; new offices to displace old and ineffective ones are being organized. Thus, we have abolished the Public Service Commission. Thus, have created the National Grains Authority to replace the Rice and Corn Administration, which has lost 1,300 officials and rank and file personnel in the purge of corrupt government personnel. To go through the statistics of dismissed employees: 237 employees from the Bureau of Posts have been dismissed; 263 from the Department of General Services; 200 from the Bureau of Customs; 192 from the Bureau of Internal Revenue; and so it goes on in all the offices of the national government today.

Third, we have taken drastic measures to make the machinery of justice in our country an effective safeguard of rights and the rule of law. For what may achieve in raising the lot of every man will have no meaning for the Filipino individual if he does not have justice, if he does not receive equal treating from the judiciary as any other citizen, no matter how rich. I have accepted the resignation of judges who are known to be a liability to government and our machinery of justice. I have accepted the resignation of all the judges in the Court of Industrial Relations except two. We have started an overhaul of the Court of Agrarian Relations.

But there is a fear raised by various sectors, that having removed too many judges, the resulting vacancies in the judiciary have to be filled up quickly if the cases are not to pile up to unmanageable proportions. In this regard, I have appealed to the bar association and the association of judges to submit to me recommendations to meet this problem.

Fourth, we have instituted measures to infuse new life into the economy have signed a decree that will govern and promote oil exploration development in our country. This will encourage foreign capital and company to engage in oil ventures in our country. At the same time we are clearing climate for foreign investments, in such a way that these will come in such volume as to truly aid us in funding our economic development.

The other day I just received an offer for a loan of $100 million at very concessional terms in the rate of interest and at a long-term amortization period of 20 years. There has been an exchange of notes between the Philippines and Japan for an additional loan of $75 million. We just received, a few days ago part of the $65 million project and commodity loan. Now, we are getting another $75 million at very concessional terms. In the next 50 years we pay on 3 percent interest. Never have we received offers like this. Never, never in the entire history of the Philippines.

What does this indicate? This indicates, my countrymen, that the investment now find an atmosphere in the Philippines that is conducive to investment. This shows that there is now a sense of trust, an increase in trust and confidence in our country. I have also received offers of loans to our private corporations totalling many millions of dollars. The only condition that I have imposed is that the guidelines must be followed. They must invest first in labor intensive industries because we have, for instance, 4,800 workers removed from the government. Many have been displaced from media because of the closure of several media operations. Many are without jobs because of the closure of the nightclubs and gambling dens.

There was reason for the dislocation of these people, but the fact is that they are now unemployed. We would like to absorb this manpower in industry.

Finally, we have instituted long-sought social reforms in our country. Nothing testifies more to the determination of the government to remove the iniquities in our social and economic life than this document that I have signed here today. For this decree is the bedrock of our constitutional revolution.

All these measures herald the New Society that we have pledged to build. And these are but the start of our enterprise. In the coming days, many more reforms will be instituted to give this vessel of our hopes vitality and life.

And I ask you again today, to give to this, the support, the cooperation and the faith deserved by an earnest call for social change. It will take some pain, some sacrifice, for we are engaged in major surgery. But bear with me, bear with the dreams of our people, bear with me the hopes and aspirations of generations past. For together, we will succeed in this endeavor.

Tayo'y magtatagumpay sa pagtatatag ng bagong lipunan.

Address of President Marcos at the conference of the Asia Pacific Council of American Chambers, October 23, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the conference of the Asia Pacific Council of American Chambers

[Delivered at the Intercontinental Hotel, October 23, 1972]

Developing A New Society

I HAVE BEEN limiting my speaking engagements lately, if only because as the events have shown, this country could use fewer words and much more action. Words, like currency, are devalued by repetition without action. Today we can probably say that in the Philippines, the level of action is fast approaching the level of verbalized intent.

To that extent, honest communication as distinguished from false rhetoric has become possible again, among men of good will.

I accepted your kind invitation because I feel that we have something important to say to you, the businessmen from the richest capital-exporting country which also happens to be our close partner in security, trade and development—the United States of America.

I still believe that history did not create the special bond between our two peoples for nothing. Filipinos still deeply feel this mystical relationship although it is understandable that Americans in general, burdened as they are by world-wide cares as leaders or, as some put it less heroically, as policemen of world, cannot fully reciprocate this emotion. But I consider this providential. We, Filipinos, have a special obligation to become mature, to become self-reliant, to cease to depend even on friends, to begin to depend only on ourselves.

The events that have been taking place in the Philippines, since September twenty-first, may be construed as an expression of this new-born initiative the Filipino people.

In acting as we did, taking inspiration from the genius of our Constitution we have perhaps changed the course of history not only in this country by throughout Southeast Asia. We have struck a blow of great strategic impact. This is a shattering, exact blow from which Philippine Communism as well as Asian Communism may not be able to recover in a long time. But having gained a military objective, we should have the wisdom to realize that what we gained was just a brief respite—a little more time to strengthen our society, our social and economic institutions, through overdue radical reforms.

This is why the other day, I issued a proclamation which transferred more than a million hectares of farm land to the tenants who cultivate them. Before this, land reform was merely a palliative, “a mere padding on the chain of the slave” as our national hero, Jose Rizal, once called such superficial reforms. But today land reform means genuine emancipation. The cultivator will own his land. He is enabled to rejoin his fellow citizens in the mainstream of the national community. In the end, it is through such measures that a nation ensures and increases its solidarity.

Land reform therefore has been aptly called the cornerstone of the new society that is emerging. It is certainly the major strategy by means of which we hope to bring to the masses of our people the benefits of economic and social modernization.

The other day, a respected American, Robert McNamara, who is President of the World Bank, expressed dismay over the fact that all progress in developing countries has bypassed the lowest forty per cent of the population. The distribution of income in the developing world during the last decade has not improved with rising gross national products. Poverty is worse than before. Economic growth has merely entrapped more people in worse poverty and inequality.

I think that contemporary history has one clear lesson that has to be learned and applied by any country wishing to escape from such entrapments. That lesson is — all attempts at economic and social modernization without land reform will fail, because only land reform can activate the large masses of the people and make them truly productive, truly a participating alert citizenry.

Economic growth can also be a trap if it does not promote the full utilization of labor. In many countries, rising levels of economic growth have been characterized by worsening unemployment and underemployment. The creation of employment must be in the forefront, rather than at the rear, of the economic plan. Again, massive unemployment represents a waste of resources beyond imagination and a major cause of social and economic inequality which, like a vicious circle, brings about more serious unemployment.

In the task of building a new society, these two objectives — land reform and employment generations — should define the orientation of the entire development strategy. If pursued with great vigor and dedication, such a strategy will ultimately bring about not only permanent prosperity but also a vital and vibrant democracy.

But at the same time, in building that new society, we hope to create a much better environment for investments in our country, both domestic and foreign. We hope to activate a much wider national market capable of absorbing more manufactured goods. We hope to create a productive capacity in both industry and agriculture and in trade and commerce that will assure the steady, significant progress not of a few but of the whole Filipino nation.

In this way we can make our own humble contribution to the building of a better world — a world of peace based on social justice.

We ask the foreign businessmen who are here to become our partners in this great undertaking. A significant proportion of the needed investments for realizing our aggregate and sectoral targets will have to come from foreign sources. We make this appeal not only because we need your help but also because we can assure better results for our common efforts on a reciprocal basis.

The record of economic development in our country has been encouraging. In spite of the various ordeals of foreign exchange crises and natural calamities our economy still sustained an annual growth rate of six percent in real terms an entirely respectable achievement for any developing country.

Also during those years, we laid the groundwork for progress through heavy government investments in transportation and communications network power and water resources development, to enable our domestic industries directly and rapidly to expand the domestic market for their goods.

Of course, most notable of the new changes under martial law is the peace and order situation, which has improved by more than 70 per cent.

There is, too, the revamp of the entire government machinery along guidelines prepared by the Reorganization Commission. This reorganization has made possible a government machinery which is more development oriented in structure, outlook and operations.

In the area of foreign investment, I would like to say this. While it is necessary to uphold the Constitutional ruling on parity rights, I want to reassure those concerned that this matter shall be pursued in the spirit of justice and fairness to all. If expropriation is to be undertaken, just compensation will be forthcoming. In this connection, I want to say again we encourage and we welcome foreign investors to do business here in our country. We have provided liberty incentives and we are seeking still other favorable measures to attract foreign capital. I want to assure all those concerned that we will be fair and just in these matters.

In the industrial sector, we have already provided liberal tax incentives our industries within the context of the Investment Priorities Plan and the Investment Incentives Act. Let me reiterate that we will further look into other means of giving incentives as well as protection to our developing industries particularly export-oriented industries and import-substituting intermediate and capital goods industries.

We have recently put into effect the Progressive Car Manufacturing Program. This will rationalize the development and expansion of our automotive industry in order to achieve efficiency in production and economies of scale which should ultimately lead to lower prices for our consumers. There will be more of such programs to rationalize and integrate strategic industries. We are studying similar programs for our steel and shipping industries and also for the power industry.

It should be emphasized that these steps are necessary if we are to achieve efficiency in production, make effective use of our scarce capital resources, expand our domestic market and effect lower prices for our consuming public.

In our export promotions program, we have already taken the first steps with the currency reform of 1970 and with the passage of the Investment and Export Incentives Act. This act provides among other things additional and special incentives to registered export industries and exporters engaged in the exportation of finished products. Again let me say that we are exploring still other avenues of providing more incentives to our export sector.

For example, the Central Bank has underscored its policy to liberalize credit, through the commercial banks, for export activities. This is to encourage commercial banks to redirect their lending activities as well as to increase the amount of credit available to the export sector. The rediscounting facilities for exports will be strengthened. The law creating the Philippine Export Credit Insurance and Guarantee Corporation will also be implemented soon to enable our exporters to improve their credit terms with foreign buyers and at the same time be provided with insurance coverage against all types of risks. Likewise, the possibilities for establishing an Export-Import Bank are also being explored in order to beef up and facilitate the credit availabilities for our exporters.

To boost further the exports of our manufactured products, a medium-term program designed to train and advise local exporters on how to expand their exportable goods has been drawn up by the BOI-DCI and the UNDP. With technical and financial assistance from the UNDP, this program is ready for implementation.

These are just some of the domestic measures we are studying and hope to adopt and implement in order to improve our export trade.

At the international level, we will continue to explore all possible avenues to expand our exports. All efforts will be made to secure better terms in the markets of developed countries. In this connection, we will continue to actively participate in various international trade forums such as the UNCTAD and the multilateral rate negotiations going on in Geneva where our trade problems can be threshed out and access to the markets of developed countries can be negotiated.

All these economic investment policies will be implemented in the broad context of a social transformation that is our ultimate objective in the Philippines: the building of a New Society.

We place our hopes on investments, both domestic and foreign, to play the role of catalysts of growth. But at the same time, me main reliance is placed on our people themselves — on the capacity of a reawakened Filipino nation to overcome its own historic shortcomings.

I said earlier that by not hesitating to do the right thing, on September 21st, we have set back communism in Asia and dealt it a serious military and political defeat. But this is different from saying that we have won a lasting victory: that will be the victory of having brought forth a New Society. This is a historic enterprise which you, as long-time friends of the Filipino people, can assist by your trust, your sympathy and your cooperation. We shall be grateful for your trust as you should be confident that our mutual benefit and the good of mankind will be the true ultimate result.

The Continuing Revolution

ITO AY TANGI sa lalong tanging araw na pagpupugay at pagdiriwang ng ating bayan.

Mangyari nga, sa araw na ito pinagpupugayan natin ang isang bayanang pinagkakautangan natin nang malaki sa pagbibigay-sigla at puri sa ating lahi. Sa araw na ito sinasariwa natin sa ala-ala ang isang lumipas na ipinagmamalaki at ikinararangal natin sa buong daigdig.

Kaya naman angkop lamang sa tanging araw na ito, isabay naman natin ang paglulunsad ng isang kilusan dapat sangkapan ng lahat ng tinitimping lakas ng ating kababayan, upang siyang maging tulay ng pagkakaisang landas sa katuparan ng ating bagong lipunan.

Ang pagtitipon nating ito ngayon ay paglalangkop ng kahapon, ngayon at kinabukasan.

In Bonifacio's time, the cries of pain and protest brought together into fruitful union all the aspirations of Filipinos for nationhood and liberation. They brought together brothers, and for the first time in the history of our race. Filipinos recognized themselves as one people. That fateful union, led by the man we honor today, severed the ties of a subject people to their colonial master, and at the sacrifice of life and fortune planted the flag of a new nation before the eyes of the world.

In a later time their sons and grandsons were to fight similar battles and raised the flag of intransigents to rally a broken people back to health and back to aspiration. In the days of the second World War, another generation of Filipino were to give up their lives in order that the nation may continue free and independent.

Today, in our time, a new cry summons into convocation all the strength of our resources — for the building of a new society. Today, several scores removed from the historic revolution launched by Bonifacio, and several decades from the days of Bataan, Corregidor and the underground, we are asked to make a new covenant with one another, not a covenant of sweat and honest toil. It was such a summons that brought us to that fateful decision two months ago that began the transformation of the face and soul of the nation. It is the same summons that bids us to gather here now and begin this important movement to do what we can together to contribute to that transformation.

This is our unique opportunity today, of you, as members of many communities and sectors in society, of myself, as the leader of our government, and of each and every citizen of this nation. For it is axiomatic that no matter how strong and dedicated a leader may be, he must find root and strength amongst the people. He alone cannot save a nation. He may guide, he may set the tone, he may dedicate himself and risk his life, but only the people may save themselves.

Our mission is at once the oldest and the most basic task laid before generations and generations of Filipinos since the birth of this nation: to make a people live in fruitful union, to know our capacities for self-advancement, to distribute what is ours to share, to make this a living place for every citizen no matter how low. This mission underlies all that we are doing today and all that we are committed to do tomorrow.

As with all undertakings, the matter of whether it is to succeed or fail depends on the will and the unity of those who undertake it, and it demands of us not only the utmost in sacrifices and idealism. In the enterprise of nations, success cannot be the gift of a leader alone, however dedicated and gifted he may be. It derives from the unity and the will of a people, just as the collective efforts of the generations that came before us — of the generations of Bonifacio, Rizal and Mabini — unified into one national consciousness the aspiration of a fragmented race. From the darkness of centuries new light illumined an entire race and made them conscious of being one people.

If the revolution of 1896 achieved anything at all, this was its signal victory and it was just a matter of time when the Filipino people would find independence and sovereignty in their own land. For the orientation and the movement to liberation had been set and no accident after that could alter the will of our people. But independence is simply the basis for a people's advancement. It is not itself the path of progress. That, we have discovered.

Leaders now say: It is easier to win a revolution and harder to run a government of a free and independent nation. Twenty-six years of independence have not fully brought us the fulfillment of the dreams of our heroes and the restitution the blood, the sweat, the tears that went into the making of this nation. Three quarters of a century have passed since the sacrifice was made in a revolution, and the promise of that revolution remains to be redeemed.

The time of redemption has now come.

This is the unique opportunity given this generation of Filipinos living day. This is the privilege given to all of us. For what I see when I look at our nation today is a people awakened to their capacities as much as their needs. I see a people responding to their conscience and their responsibilities. I see society that knows the true meaning of community and even in the brief that has passed since September we all see around us the progress we have made and the kind of society that is within the talents of our people to create.

This is the vision that gives birth to this movement, the Mabuhay ang Pilipino Movement. Here are gathered the nation's civic organizations into one common effort, to serve people and country. Even now as we launch crusade, there are thousands all over the country similarly launching this movement to realize the greatest good for the greatest number of Filipinos. In every provincial capital and in every city, rallies of this nature calling upon the people to unite behind this movement are taking place. And it may be that this movement that began with a handful and now commands the allegiance of thousand will tomorrow enlist the dedication of millions.

At the heart of this movement are ideals so basic, so important that the ability to organize it in the past speaks of the paralysis that was our condition for decades.

What are these ideals?

There is, first of all, the ideal of social conscience that animates this movement. Social conscience has always been a basic principle for social reconstruction and social justice in a free society; where there are men conscious only of their self-interest, there is also a society that will always be perilously imbalanced. Benjamin Disraeli wrote once of the two nations that exist in society the rich and the poor nations living together in every country, in every nation. So long, he said, as the materially wealthy, the fortunate and the gifted exercise their powers merely for their own benefit, so long will the other nations of the poor sink in discontent until such a time when revolution will swallow up both nations.

It is the task of government to redress this balance between the two nations. It is the moral obligation of the fortunate man to help his less fortunate brothers to share of his talents and his resources, to bring up the lesser in life to his own level.

There is, secondly, the idea of unity that animates this crusade. In the past civic organizations moved along their specialized areas of interest and though indeed, it may be said that each of your organizations met with success, that was more competition than cooperation among organizations. And in the final analysis there was less good achieved than might have been realized had you been one integrated organization.

I do not say this is disparagement of your work in the past. Your work has, indeed, been noble. It will always be an object of admiration by all. But what I would emphasize here are the tremendous possibilities that are opened by your will to organize yourselves now into one organization, into one movement. It comes, I believe, from the sense that has come upon us of being one people with one common burden and one common hope. As one great thinker has said, we are bound by the double ties of common origin and common destiny. What happens to one will happen to all and let no man forget this. For without unity we can only dissolve, as in the past, in a fruitless quibble over credit and self-importance. Today, it is possible for us to want community, to experience it and to make it viable.

For a nation is more than just the sum of citizens put together. In the final analysis, the life of a nation, its vitality, its reality, resides not in the boundaries of geography or race, but in the consciousness of every citizen in sharing a common identity and a common destiny with others. It is union that strengthens the most basic of social units in our society, the family. It is union that makes organizations effective. So also it is union that not only makes a nation strong, it is union that makes a nation.

The more we are able as individuals and as members of organizations or groups to conceive of our work in the larger scheme, the more shall we be able to fulfill our goals. It is precisely this sense of unity that I perceive in this movement we launch today and which I hope will continue to dominate it in the coming days.

Let us take care that this crusade will not be a mere niñgas kugon or that it will not remain as a mere repository of hopes and desires but a vehicle for the realization of such hopes.

Let it tell every Filipino that he belongs to this society whatever may be his origin, his race, his creed or his station in life.

Let it tell him that he shall share in the wealth of this nation and justly ask for the help of his neighbor, and more than this, let him be told by this organization and this movement that when he does desire and seek help, his neighbor will extend him help.

Let it tell him that he can contribute towards the building of the kind of society and community that he wants, not what other nations and races may want.

Above all, let us announce to him that in this great enterprise he has the opportunity to create rather than destroy.

There have been times in the past when the collective energies of all our people have been summoned together in one undertaking. There have been times of crises, times when we had to fight for our rights. Today, there is no war to fight. There is no foreign foe to evict from our shores. There are no Bagumbayans. There are no Bataans and there will be no Corregidores. There will be no medals to be pinned on the breasts of heroes. But in a certain sense, the calling today for fraternity is even louder and the cry of the native land is more poignant, more urgent. It is a call not for the valor of arms but the valor of honest, patient, dedicated toil.

We have begun this labor and I tell you that there is no force that can hold us back. There is no obstacle so large or so immovable that can deter us from finishing what we have begun.

It is no doubt a demand for long and arduous labor. But if we must live the perpetual sense of being faced by a Promethean task, then, so be it. Let it be the measure of our virtue that we seek no solace, no escape from this undertaking.

Dr. Rizal, reflecting on the difficulties to which his work had taken him wrote: "I seek no shade but light." And so might we say in response to the challenge flung at us: We seek no solace, we will give no excuses. We seek no shade but light.

Address of President Marcos at the presentation of the draft of the New Constitution
December 1, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the presentation of the draft of the New Constitution

[Delivered in Malacañang, December 1, 1972]

A Testament to the Future

I AM INDEED glad and proud to participate in this historic ceremony. President Macapagal has referred to this document as “the formulation of the aspirations of the Filipino people.” I see written on every face of the delegates to the Constitutional Convention the mark of accomplishment and the authority of success, for truly the Convention has just performed an epic task of which it can be justly proud — the drafting and the writing of a new Constitution, a testament to the future of the Republic of the Philippines.

Today we mark such a success, for you have worked against great odds. You have worked against the very tide of history itself, the tide that has brought us through one of the most turbulent periods our country has ever known. We are much too close to our times and, perhaps, we shall not appreciate fully the weight, the nature and the magnitude of this achievement. But in time, as the days and the years recede and a historical perspective emerges, we shall know the full scope of your efforts, the extent of your labors, and the achievement of the Constitutional Convention of 1971.

It is not my intention here to discuss the merits of the Constitution, for indeed we must still submit this proposed Constitution to the people, the final repository of power and authority in this democratic polity. It is the people who must speak.

The Constitutional Convention has been given this commission to write a Constitution, which actually is a draft and a proposal. But as the great thinkers of the world have said — the leaders may lead, they may guide, they may set the principles and blaze new trails, but no one shall save the people except the people themselves. We may propose but the people must decide. This we will do on the day set for the plebiscite. I am certain that when we do, we shall act in unity and thus, it is my hope that our people shall debate this proposed Constitution, and that such a debate will indeed be done with complete liberty.

I hereby direct the military to see to it that no man shall be harassed, molested or questioned on anything said for or against the Constitution and that this order shall stand during and after such debate.

I call upon every Filipino to participate in this historic discourse. Democracy is marked by dialogue, but dialogue cannot exist if it is one-sided. And notwithstanding the unusual circumstances under which we labor in view of the proclamation of martial law, it is my directive and my wish that for all purposes and for this particular occasion, the strictness of martial law, be set aside in order that the full discourse and dialogue under our democratic ideals may be attained.

We hope, of course, in accordance with the new standards, that there shall be less of the corrosive spirit of faction and partisanship; but even this, my friends, we must tolerate during this period.

The President of the Constitutional Convention has quoted me when on June 1st I appeared before you. Let me quote another paragraph from that statement and observation. I said then:

“For as our forebears in the past sought to establish the first Republic in Asia, so now, you, their children, must test a democratic principle, for you must test whether democracy is self-rejuvenating, self-recuperating, and set healing. Even if an unjust social and economic order shall impose itself upon democratic community and corrupt it, the people if they so will can rectify this error. But the people must act through their duly chosen representatives and this is the Congress and you. Now we can say you have acted and now we must ask the people to act, for if democracy is indeed self-rejuvenating we can initiate an action. No leader, no matter how vast his authority may be, can succeed unless the people support that action or his action.”

No matter what the Constitutional Convention may do, no matter what Congress may do, no matter what the President may do, if the people do not support our actions, then we fail in the effort of reformation and the establishment of a new society.

I am indeed happy to note that as this new Constitution is founded on the age-old and time-tested principles of democracy and freedom, it, too, has imbibed the idealism and the vision of the New Society, for these reforms that we have initiated are embodied in the letter of this proposed Constitution.

I am indeed happy that this new Constitution notwithstanding has been finalized standing the fact that for a time the Constitutional Convention and, for matter, our entire government and society, mirrored the virulence and confusion of our times. It may be said that we have passed the crisis. The Convention itself faced the prospect of being overtaken and overwhelmed by cataclysm, while the Republic was challenged as to its stability and even its existence. That both the Republic and the Constitutional Convention have survived such a test is indeed proof of the capacity of a democratic organization like ours for self-rejuvenation and self-healing.

By the guidance of the Almighty we shall succeed and we shall prevail.

The drastic reforms that have been set off pertaining to the rights of every man, no matter how long it took to be recognized, are now enshrined in this Constitution. This Constitution shall be the anchor of every Filipino and shall be his hope. The Constitution shall be the basis for the ultimate redemption of every man and slave whether by the soil or by his past, and this proven resiliency of our democracy just proves that society can be revolutionized by constitutional means.

You have reaffirmed the guiding faith of our people. I am glad you have completed this task and I extend you my personal congratulations and the appreciation of all our people.

In behalf of all the officials who are present here today, and in behalf of the millions who wait with expectation, I accept this proposed Constitution for submission to our people in a national plebiscite.

I, therefore, announce that in accordance with this process of ratification, I hereby sign in your presence a decree calling a plebiscite on January 15 for the final ratification of this proposed Constitution.

Along with this decree, I shall sign the order directing all persons in authority, especially the Secretary of National Defense and the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces of the Philippines, to see to it that the people shall be accorded the fullest opportunity to freely and publicly discuss and debate its various provisions.

I also hereby direct that the cases of all members of the Constitutional Convention who are under detention be now processed, to pave the way for the release of those who have not actually been connected with subversion.

I also hereby direct that the members of the Constitutional Convention who are under detention be forthwith released, unless they are facing criminal charges.

Again, my thanks and congratulations to all of you. With the guidance of Divine Providence, I know that we shall succeed in our efforts to establish a new Philippines.

Address of President Marcos during the First National Conference on Children and Youth, December 4, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
During the First National Conference on Children and Youth

[Delivered on December 4, 1972]

The Care and Development of the Young

I WELCOME EACH and everyone of you to Maharlika Hall, the hall for freemen, the hall for noble men. I consider addressing this conference quite important because the program for the development of the young and of the children is one of the most important programs of, government.

Under Executive Order No. 310 which I signed on April 16, 1971, I created this Inter-Departmental Committee. It is composed, as you know, of representatives from the government as well as from the private sector and a representative from the Office of the President.

Perhaps, more than any other developing country, the Philippines must attend to its youth. Sixty two percent of our population are below 25 years of age. We probably have one of the highest percentages of youth and children in relation to the population in the entire world. Thirty one percent of our population range from age 12 to age 25. This is indeed a very young country. Of course, the increase in birth rate for the past 25 years has something to do with this. You will remember that when the war started in 1941, we were estimated to be only about 18 million people and now we are anywhere from 38 to million people.

I stated that when I proclaimed martial law I was thinking of the young. Why the young? Those who belong to my generation should know the reason. We have known too many battles and too much suffering whether in time of war or in time of peace. We fought against the status quo. We fought against the leftist, the rightist, the bigoted; we fought so many battles that it was my feeling that the young, our children, my children and the children of those who knew the last war and the fighting against the communists in the 1950's should never fight those battles all over again. Anyone who has fought in a war become a most passionate oppositionist to war, no matter how many medals he may have won. I am not unacquainted with those medals that they gave you after you ' have gone out, fought and got almost killed. They pin a piece of medal and a nice looking ribbon on your chest and send you back to kill some more.

Now, the medals are all right because they are symbolic of the appreciation of your people, of your government, of your Republic and your comrades. For in many instances you have to fight for your country and for your people. But the wise leader certainly will not invite war, will not invite bloodshed; and if he can prevent violence through peaceful reform and change, then, he must do everything in his power to do so. This is the meaning of all the efforts that we are engaged in.

This conference is something that I have looked forward to. This is the first national conference on children and youth and I wish to extend a hearty welcome to each and everyone of you. It is almost axiomatic to say the young are the foundation of our national, economic, and social well-being. It is also commonplace to say that from your generation will come the future leaders of our country. Actually, it is literally so. It is literally so because the statistics will bear me out. If 62 per cent of the population are below the age of 25, then, of necessity the leaders must come from that group of young men and women of our country.

I attach a great importance to the role of human beings as decisive elements in nation building. It has been well said that the most valuable resources of a country are its people not the mines, the forests and the other natural resources but the people, the human beings.

However, they are not just resources serving the needs of nation building, but they actually are the very ends of nation building. For this is the purpose of a Republic — that a society and a government be established to uphold the dignity of man in contradiction to that ideology we are fighting against which seeks to uphold the dignity of the state over and above that of the individual.

Economic development must be grounded firmly on the development of human resources. Social justice and the national interest demand that every Filipino youth be given the opportunity for the full development of his personality, his talents, his abilities so that he can participate actively in the challenge of development. Because if 62 per cent of our people do not participate, then the great majority will be a drag on the entire society.

And thus it is that from the statistics alone the role of the youth is well marked out. But more than this, the young constitute the extension of all the dreams and the aspirations of the old. We who are a little bit older — but not too old—are just getting to that stage when we start feeling the pains of age. No one among us — whether he is 55 years old like me or a little bit older — likes to be identified as belonging to the older generation. But in the years to come, one simply will have to admit it.

And so, we have looked forward; ten years from now, depending upon the will of the Almighty, many of us will not be here but the young will be here and therefore, the young must continue our labor otherwise this nation will be lost. But for them to participate they must understand. No one is motivated unless he knows the objectives, believes in them and in the program to attain them.

The young are therefore a continuation of our present. When I think of the young, I think in terms of what they would like to have, let's say, ten years from now. And actually, this should be the driving force for the older generation. For as our great hero, Jose Rizal said, one does not plant a tree expecting to sit in its shade. No, you do not, but you know that your children will someday sit in that shade. And so, it has got to be a good tree. It has got to be a well developed and luxuriant growing tree, because the frailties of humanity are such that one can't plan and work only for a limited time. One finds strength and inspiration from the fact that the young will carry the same banner and bring it forward. The young will be there to nurture the same tree that we have brought to life. Being great in number in our country, they constitute a very potent force that can be mobilized for national development or be misused for destruction.

It is my feeling that our young today are much better trained and better informed, better oriented than the older generation when they were young.

When I created the Inter-Departmental Committee on Children and Youth my aim was, of course, to provide an integrated approach to the important problems and opportunities concerning the youth. Towards this end, the Committee must assist other agencies concerned with the youth.

I have always said that the father takes care and looks after the youngest. Look into any family. When you see a family moving about, whom does the father take care of first? The young, the young baby who can't walk. He carried him.

The same thing is true with the nation. I happen to have been elected as your President and, therefore, I am some kind of a father to everybody. I am not that old but that is the role of a President. More than anything else the President has to be some kind of a father. Now then, as a father what do you think of? What is your purpose? The purpose is to protect the nation. But in protecting the nation you must think of the young—those who cannot take care of themselves, those whom you are depending on to take over when you stand aside and let others take over your place. So we take care of the young.

But in government the various agencies that are engaged in taking care of the young may, in many instances, not be coordinated. Thus, the need for the Inter-Departmental Committee. When the Department of Education, let us attend to its functions, it does so as a basic national policy. Its programs do consider whether the student is young or old. But there must be a program that aimed directly at the young because the young have problems which are not necessarily the problems of the old. And so the young must be given special attention. The redirection of the energies and the idealism of the young is an age-old problem and many countries have special organizations, governmental and private, in order to attend to this. In the Philippines there are many in the private sector, there are many in the public sector who are supposed to attend to this. But I repeat. In many instances they may work at cross purposes and the reason therefore for this committee and your convention is to work out an approach to a program which will brush aside the contradiction and the conflicts that may arise out of enthusiasm and from the petty jealousies and envy that may arise from the frictions of joint action. The needs of the young are varied. They are complex and embrace several sectors such as education, health and nutrition, social welfare, housing, labor and employment.

The role of education in preparing the youth as responsible and productive citizens needs no further emphasis. The youth's basic training at home must be supplemented by a strong educational system, so as to instill in them discipline, self-confidence and the desire to achieve, as well as to impart to them the basic skills demanded of a productive citizenry. Complementary to this is the provision of vocational training programs, preferable at the community level, for the youth who are out-of-school.

The educational program of the Philippines, as you know, is being reformed because it has no relation whatsoever to our economic and social development program.

Health and nutrition are likewise important. There is no need to explain that ill-health saps the vitality and energies of the young and reduces their effectiveness. Moreover, social welfare and housing provide the youth with the environment that is conducive to the youth's physical, mental and moral development.

The area of labor and employment is very critical to our total development drive in general and to youth development in particular. Among the unemployed, a large portion belongs to the 10 years to 19 years age group. It is unfortunate but it is true that in the accounting of the labor force children at the age of 10 are included.

But in statistical studies anybody who is ten years old is a part of the labor force. I am sure this is a surprise to you, but it is true. It is true everywhere else. It's not only true here, it is true in every country of the world. The ten-year-old child is part of the statistical base for the determination of the labor force. And in our country, in 1971, this age group that is from 10 years to 19 years constituted close to 31 per cent of total unemployment. Within the next four years, roughly 2 million "entrants" to the labor force are anticipated, posing a major challenge that demands immediate and vigorous action.

In any case, the child is the ultimate beneficiary of greater employment and higher incomes. The welfare of children can be uplifted most effectively by providing gainful employment to the heads of families. The provision of greater employment opportunities for the labor force will ensure that the benefits of development will reach the children of low-income families. The social welfare and health programs of government sometimes partake of the nature of dole outs or outright philanthropy—the giving of specific amounts of food, clothing, shelter. But, in order to develop a dignified, self-reliant race, we should do away with all these doles, all encouragement to beggarly pursuit and instead develop people who can by themselves assert their own dignity. We don't want to create dignity for others. Every man must create his own kind of dignity and he does so by being self-reliant, by being self-sufficient, which means he must earn his own livelihood. No man is dignified who does nothing but receive from the government his food, clothing and shelter, and I don't know of any Filipino who would like to do this. Everyone whether Filipino or not, I believe, would like to be able to earn his own food, earn his own clothing and earn his own housing. And this is the reason for the reorientation of government policy towards creating job opportunities and employment more than just giving out doles to people no matter how hard-up they may be. Yes, there are periods of calamity during which people have to be helped. Of course, when a person is injured you have to pick him up from the street and bring him to the hospital. That's one of the times when he can't help himself. When there are floods and there is dislocation, you must give out doles. But this should be temporary and we must not encourage the prolongation of such a program. This is the reason for the effort to build up in everyone, especially the young, the habit of self-reliance and of discipline.

Realizing the potentials of the youth and the need of developing the young so that these potentials can be harnessed and put to effective use, we have started to formulate the plans for the development of the young. I say started because the task of improving the young's health and his education, of shaping his attitudes and ambitions, of redirecting his energies and his idealism to constructive causes cannot be achieved within one day or by government alone. This requires a national effort. This requires the effort of everyone whether in government or outside government. There will be a great need for the resources and services of agencies and organizations outside the government. There will be a need to mobilize free and voluntary services dedicated to the welfare and development of the youth. Unfortunately, many of the parents must answer for some, if not many, of the ills of our society. Many of our parents think that after they have sent the children to school their responsibility is finished. This is not true and many regrettable mistakes in our society are due to the fact that the parents have failed in many instances in performing their role in society. And yet we blame the young. We keep on blaming the young. When we speak of drug addiction and we speak of the waywardness of the young, we have an inclination and a tendency to point to them and say, they belong to this drug-addicted generation. Perhaps, we should look inward and into our ourselves and ask ourselves how far have we as parents fallen on our job. I speak as a parent. As President I am a busy man. I sometimes work up to 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning and yet, I have a feeling that notwithstanding the fact that we may be very busy there are certain obligations you and I cannot shy away from and they have to do with the care of our children. When my children were here, even if I was very tired or very occupied, I always tried to see them before they went to bed. When they were working on their lessons or when they were whiling away their time I tried to talk to them even for just a few minutes. I am certain that many of those who are drug addicts among our children will say, will tell us, that it was because we the older generation didn't care enough that they turned out that way.

I will not sermonize, but I think that you and I know that this is one of the important areas wherein there must be collective action if we are going to move forward.

We have, therefore, encouraged and invited private agencies and organizations to participate in the government's drive for youth development. These agencies in fact form an integral part of our plans and programs for the youth.

An example of such a collaborative effort is the Youth Organizations to Undertake Reforms (YOUR) under the Presidential Youth Development Program. This is a program intended to coordinate the activities of both private and government agencies involved with the youth.

The main objectives of the Program are: (1) the identification of the development areas of priorities for the involvement of the youth; (2) the redirection and supervision of existing programs and services towards the defined objectives of the New Society; (3) the participation of the youth in the planning and implementation of specific socio-economic development projects; and (4) is the development and implementation of redefined training programs for YOUR 'leaders and youth organizers.

Now, what are the agencies involved in this? Let me mention them as a form of acknowledgement of their participation. We have the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Boy Scouts of the Philippines, the Girl Scouts of the Philippines, the Philippine Youth Welfare Coordinating Council, the Red Cross Youth, the 4-H Club under the APC and the CAREFOR, the Philippine Business for Social Progress, Rizal Youth Development Foundation, the Department of Social Welfare and, of course, the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

The following priority areas for action have been identified; reforestation, and reform, food crop production, livestock production, vocational training and infrastructure development. I would like to call attention to the fact that land reform involves all kinds of scientific farming and it also involves cooperatives. At present, YOUR is initially launching the following pilot projects: irrigation repair in Bacolor, Pampanga, reforestation in the Arayat Reforestation Area—and later other reforestation areas in Bataan and perhaps, in Benguet Mt. Province—and the pasture improvement for livestock in Sto. Tomas Baguio. Larger projects are planned for the Christmas vacation and will be undertaken on a nationwide basis come summer of 1973.

What I dream of is the young participating in a summer program wherein they would undertake projects which may directly affect the less privileged our country.

I have previously stated that Philippine education is an exercise in solipsism, is misaligned and needs the saving grace of relevance. In short, educational policy-making must dovetail with national development.

In line with this, the Department of Education has evolved a Youth Civil Action Program involving both in-school-youth and out-of-school youth. The in-school youth program encompasses all levels of education involving some 11 million youth and is designed to provide practical work as part of the school curriculum in order to heighten the civic and social consciousness of students and to encourage them to participate more actively in the task of national development. This program will provide rich and varied opportunities for students to apply and test classroom principles in real life situations and to be involved to community development, thus affording them opportunities for self-realization and infusing their lives with direction, with value, with purpose greater and meaning.

Several activities have been lined up for this program, some of which are participation in the green revolution, participation in the beautification and cleanliness drives, participation in reforestation activities, supervised farming programs, cooperative training programs, community health and sanitation courses relevant to national development such as agrarian reform, cooperatives, taxation and family planning.

For the youth who are out of school, programs are likewise being undertaken to enable them to respond to the needs of development despite their lack of schooling. Under the Bureau of Private Schools we have special vocational schools, colleges and institutes. Furthermore, we have what I have referred to as the manpower training program. Many of us don't know it, but the Philippine Manpower Training Program has been adopted as a model by Asian governments. In the Bureau of Vocational Education and Bureau of Public School we see such manpower training programs in cooperation with the Nations, Manpower and Youth Council of the Department of Labor. I have given orders to the agencies concerned to make the training programs community-based, so as to make such training more effective.

Meanwhile, the NMYC is reshaping its over-all training and development programs for the out-of-school youth on the basis of important information obtained from a survey of out-of-school youth all over the country. This survey has just been updated and surprisingly, we were met with enthusiasm by these youth who have missed formal schooling. It is necessary that we recover these wasting human resources. They constitute not only a burden but a danger to our society and therefore, we must do something to recover them. Most societies throw them into the wastebasket of disregard and disaffection. But a modern society must learn to take them back into the main stream of economic, social and political activity, otherwise, that society, especially if it is a young society like ours, is bound to meet with this problem under more violent terms.

Sports development and nutrition are closely related to the youth education program. Our youth must be immersed in a program of competitive sports not only to develop a sound mind in a sound body but also to imbue them with a self-reliant and competitive spirit. I want to see greater emphasis on sports for the development of the youth. I have directed the Department of Education and other organizations to formulate a program of this nature.

But a physical fitness program must be supported by an appropriate nutrition program in order to be successful. Expending energy requires the right amount, of inputs of energy in terms of food nutrients. Thus, both in and out of school, we are encouraging and stressing the importance of proper nutrition.

In school, courses in basic nutrition are offered, and direct efforts involving the public schools' feeding program are supported. In and out of school, we are encouraging food production projects, because, as you know, there is one basic answer to many of our problems. I was asked once during an interview what was the answer, in one single word, to all our problems. That was a difficult question but I immediately shot back—production. If every single man, woman and child in this country produced something, no matter how modest, then, many of our problems would be solved.

The major agencies of the government engaged in this kind of activities like the Department of Social Welfare, the Department of Health, the Food and Nutrition Research Council, the Department of Local Governments and Community Development—this is a new Department headed by Secretary Roño former Governor of Samar—and of course, the Department of Agrarian Reform—another new Department under Secretary Estrella—by the nature of their functions have built-in programs for the youth.

The Department of Social Welfare, aside from providing essential social services also conducts training programs, particularly for out-of-school youth. The Department of Health and the Food and Nutrition Research Council have youth programs in nutrition and health.

The Department of Agrarian Reform has prepared the Home Management and Rural Youth Development Program to train the youth in the rural areas to become responsible, productive, disciplined law-abiding citizens, capable of assuming leadership in the future.

The Department of Social Welfare has reoriented its policies away from mere dole-out programs and towards efforts at helping the needy secure means of living. As the saying goes, if you give a man a fish, you give him dinner for the evening; but if you teach him how to fish, you give him food for the rest of his life. Now, this saying is as old as the hills but there are occasions when we forget that this is a fundamental tenet of government and private welfare activities. We must continue with this.

The Department of Health has volunteer services inviting the participation of the young. Many of our young doctors or the young would-be doctors go to the provinces in summer or even during the holidays and participate in the health programs of the government quietly and without fanfare. This is the kind of quiet, dedicated service which we would like to encourage the students to nurture. We will try and get the students in engineering to participate in the titling program. We need many people to survey the boundaries of the agricultural lands because how can we redistribute lands to the tenants if we don't even know the boundaries of the land owned by the landlords.

I have, by decree, directed that the landowners swear under oath the area and the boundaries of their land. But at the same time, we are also taking at photogrammetry by air of all the lands in the Philippines and we will try and divide these lands on the basis of such aerial photogrammetry. The surveyors on land need to confirm such divisions and we will need the young for this photogrammetry. The surveyors on land need to confirm such divisions and we will need the young for this.

I refer to some of the programs as examples where the young may be of assistance with their volunteer services. The 4-H Club has some of the most active young men and women in the Philippines. I am always heartened when go out to the barrios and I meet these young men and women teaching the old farmers the new farming methods and showing them the benefits to be reaped from irrigation, the use of fertilizers, the use of spacing, the use of pesticides and the like. Some of these boys and girls are 12 to 16 years old and they are teaching 60-year old farmers how to work their farms. That is something. Instead of the old teaching the young, the young teach the old. Perhaps this is as it should be. Have we not heard often enough the wistful thought that in a developing country if one could succeed in replacing the older generation completely and instantly with the young, perhaps, the problems of development would not be so difficult? And has it not also been said by the observers that one of the heaviest burdens of a President is undoing the inherited mistakes of the past. Our work is not only to build, but to rectify the errors of the past. We have committed many errors because we are human. Our own leaders for instance in the 1900's, 1910, 1920, 1930. What did they think about? Did they think of economic development? Of course not. Why not? Because they were single-mindedly concerned with political emancipation. Complete, immediate and absolute independence was the rallying cry and even "a government run like hell by the Filipinos is better than a government run like heaven by the Americans." They had a noble objective. So let us not blame them too much; but the mistakes were there.

Thus, we have an economy too dependent on the exportation of raw or primary commodities. Sugar for instance. Our sugar cannot stand competition in the international market, and if we did not have the American market it would collapse in no time at all. The reason for this is our people did not prepare for a situation which we have now. So we have to start rectifying this. We have to move into all of these problems as fast as we can and we are depending on the young to help out in this because they are the ones who are attuned to new ideas. It's difficult to break a habit, especially the habit of a 50-year old. And this is one of our problems now. Many of our people expect us to create miracles in a period of a few months. This is going to be one of the most difficult things to accomplish: to convince our people to work at this steadfastly, continuously, dedicatedly, regularly. We should do away with our niñgas kugon mentality. We lack dedication. We forget our objectives too easily. We must stop this. We must now teach not only the young, but also the old. And this is where the difficulty lies; we must teach the old to cast aside the old habits. To do this, we need the help of the young.

And that is why I address this to the young. Let us do away with the niñgas kugon mentality. I am happy to see that among the participants in the conference are planners and educators, administrators who belong to the older generation—and whom I hope I have not offended with my references to the habits of the old. But actually they are participants in the effort to root out this habit, this old attitude. But of course I am even happier to note that there is a greater proportion of the youth among the participants.

There must always be occasions for the youth of the land to sit down with their elders to jointly ponder over the nation's problems and needs and to formulate the necessary measures for its well-being. Both the old and the young must understand each other and appreciate each other's efforts. The young should understand that while the old may have committed many mistakes, they have achieved something of value. But not by a man, no matter how powerful, nor by the leaders. The leaders may guide, they may setup the plans, they may put up the programs, but only the people can save themselves. Only the people can dictate a change of habits, a change of attitudes and a change of path. And this is why I address myself to 62 percent of our population: the children and the youth. More than at any other time in our history, even more than the time of Rizal, Bonifacio, Luna and Aguinaldo, the great propagandists and the revolutionaries, the youth will determine the fate of our people, whether they survive or they perish. May God will that you perform the role of saviors of our country.

Speech of President Marcos during the oath-taking of Regional Directors, Assistant Regional Directors and City Engineers, December 7, 1972

of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
During the oath-taking of Regional Directors, Assistant Regional Directors and City Engineers

[Delivered on December 7, 1972]

A New Standard of Performance

I HAVE GONE out of my way to administer the oath to you personally, because we are moving into a new era in highway construction. And one of the principal deficiencies in the infrastructure program is the middle-level supervision and control. There is a missing link between the project engineers and the Department—the contact between the political leadership, the managers up in the higher echelon of government and the implementing groups. That missing link is you, for actually you belong to the implementing group. Since you are Regional Directors, Assistant Regional Directors, and City Engineers, you are actually the “Do Tank” that I have been talking about. The government is full of proposals and plans for development, but there are very few implementors. Hence, we are calling upon you now to act for and on behalf of the planners, and while acting for the planners, you must familiarize yourself not only with highways but with the entire economic development program. This is your responsibility to yourself, the highways, to the Department, and to me. And that is why administered your oath personally because you are my personal representatives. You are responsible to me, and I will support you whenever you perform your duty correctly. By the same token, if there should be any violation of the standards that we have set, I shall be constrained to enforce those standards with the coercive power vested on me.

I give you these guidelines because I do not want anyone to come to me, directly or through somebody, begging for a second chance. There will be no second chances in this particular effort because we must succeed in the reformation of our society, of our country. In such reformation you are the men who will participate most actively, for the things that most people see are the palpable, and the most palpable are roads. During the floods, what was the first thing that we thought of? Reinstate the communication system. We could not do anything about the dikes for the time being, but we had to go to look at the roads. So it is, that roads are a symbol of either achievement or of failure. If you fail me, the whole program of reformation will fail. Any weakness in the chain any weakness among you and the men under you is going to reflect, not just on the Secretary, but on me.

So, do your job well. I would do it if I were in your place. And I will be making spot inspections of everything that you are doing. Let's not go back to the old habits—no more padded payrolls and no more of those 70 to 100 per cent losses of funds. I remember the nine hundred and ninety thousand pesos lost in Masbate in 1969. Nine hundred ninety thousand, it just disappeared. Why? Because that was the old society. Now we are creating a new one. I do not need to sermonize to you about the need for this reformation. There is unanimity of opinion among all the social and political sectors of the country and among the citizenry in general for reformation. But reformation must start from us, from the top. You are the guides, the leaders. Help out in this. As I am inflexible with myself I will be inflexible with you. But as I recognize and appreciate achievement and good work I will be appreciative of good work coming from you. Your appointment, and my personal effort to administer your path is an indication of my trust and confidence in you. Do not fail that trust and confidence.

Address of President Marcos at the 9th Agricultural Credit Conference, December 8, 1972

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 9th Agricultural Credit Conference

[Delivered at the Pines Hotel, Baguio City, December 8, 1972]

Credit for Agricultural Development

IT IS MY pleasure to meet today the people who in more ways than one can accelerate the upward thrust of our rural areas and particularly the farmers, all those who are involved with the basic economy of our land, agriculture, through the extension of that often elusive economic prop — credit. In this gathering, the men and women who might possibly shape the future of our rural areas are now present, and it is my hope that during their conference they will indeed begin to forge the means by which our agricultural sector can develop and prosper.

This ninth conference of our rural bankers on agricultural credit, coincides with the 20th year of operations of our rural banking system. All the more reason why we expect great and good things coming from this assembly. If the next decade can equal the rapid growth of our rural banks, in terms of support to our farmers, then we need not fear that we shall not attain our goals in food production. It took a long time for rural banks to take root, indeed more than half a century of trying was experienced by all those concerned with establishing here a system of banks which could directly induce the development of agriculture. But since the first rural bank was authorized only 20 years ago, the growth of the system has been unequalled in scope and number.

The reasons for the earlier failure were predictably lack of capital, inadequate supervision and management skills. But we persisted because we knew that agriculture was basic to development and we realized that it had to first be fully made a productive sector before we could think of total modernization, or even of partial industrialization.

I would say that the ultimate success of the rural banks can be traced to the simple formula of the partnership of the public and private sectors. Learning from the sad experience of failure, our lawmakers passed R.A. 720 which in essence launched the partnership of government and private bankers. To increase the capital base, the government matched peso for peso the investment of private interest. To make supervision able and efficient, the whole system was placed under the Central Bank. And to upgrade personnel and management, training was imposed on all who would work within the system, with the Institute of Rural Banking in the Department of Rural Banks of the Central Bank taking responsibility for this training. Since then, the growth and stability of our rural banks have been assured.

Just how well in concrete figures this partnership has proved salutary may be gleaned from these facts — there are now 580 rural banks in the country, with total resources of P848 million, total deposit liabilities of P568 million, private investments of P118 million, supplemental capital from the government of P75.2 million and a loan portfolio of P690 million. With such financial sinews the government cannot but expect more from the rural banking system in contributions to the implementation of priority programs for development.

And as long as our partnership holds, as long as it is maintained with faith and goodwill, the rural banks will continue to be a crucial element in the attainment of progress.

There was a time when banks of whatever kind and size appeared to the public, and especially to the lowly such as the farmer, as a rather formidable institution, aloof and heartless and exceedingly unresponsive. Only the rich, those with collateral, appeared to benefit from banks. All that has changed, and I would say that the rural banking system has had much to do in bringing about this salutary change.

Nothing has speeded up this change more than the supervised credit program of the rural banks, first tried out as a pilot project in Laguna in 1965. It was a rousing success. It announced to the farmers the presence of a friend in need — the rural banks — and it opened up to them broader horizons in the cultivation of land. These new horizons yielded new techniques, new tools to make farming less a drudgery and more of a challenge and a profitable enterprise. And the difference lay in the availability of capital for farm mechanization, for better seeds, for more inputs like fertilizers.

I might add that the government succeeded in providing the credit needed through the Central Bank because international financing houses were ready to give loans precisely because of the viability of our farming enterprise and the solidity of the rural banking system. Thus we had a plethora of loan and credit funds, including seven special funds which methodically funnelled out credit to our farmers.

How well our rural banking system serves the country may be appreciated by recapitulating its yeoman work during the destructive floods earlier this year. The massive rehabilitation entailed could not have been undertaken as expeditiously and systematically had there been no rural banks through which credit and loans could be funnelled to the victims.

In an important way, the rural banks became a rallying point for aid and reconstruction. Strategically located, the banks became logical centers for mobilizing the rehabilitation program. Some 159 rural banks in the disaster areas handled P52 million in rehabilitation funds, releasing a total of P65.5 million to 49,664 flood victims in three and a half months. The normalization of agricultural production in the ravaged lands could not have been as speedy as it was were it not for the active participation of the rural banks.

I foresee that the rural banks will once more play a central role in making land reform work in our country, and in every way substantiate and inform the program designed to emancipate forever the tenant-farmer from the bondage of virtual serfdom of sharecroppers. I have recognized the worth of our rural banking system through Presidential Decree 57, which calls on the active involvement of our rural banks among other financing institutions in making available an immediate source of funds for loans or credits to tenants or farmers cooperative under the supervised credit program and in accordance with the strategy for making land reform come alive and yield the desired results.

In many ways, the land reform program will decide the destiny of our country. It is not only because the fortunes of the majority of our people — those in the rural areas — may be decided by its failure or success but also because land reform effectively counters many of the social ills which have raised grievances to a tragic level. Furthermore, as I have already pointed out, we must leap from our agricultural base to modern industrialization, and land reform will be critical in this action. That is why not only the rural banks but also the Department of Agriculture and Natural Resources, the Department of Agrarian Reform, and the Department of Local Government and Community Development, among others, have been harnessed for this program.

Each has its assigned task, and the rural banks are relied upon to channel as fast as possible all available funds to the sectors in need of them, with, however, proper discretion and direction.

Let me add that rural banks need not fear of falling into pitfalls along the way, or of dissipating their strength. The government, particularly under R.A. 6390, has provided guarantees and incentives. Rural banks have guarantee coverage of up to 70 per cent against losses. Loans from the Central Bank Loan Guarantee Fund are covered up to 85 per cent.

Finally, let me ask you to do everything in your power to carry on the operations of our rural banks, for in the days to come, as we increasingly extend ourselves in order to meet old and new problems, we shall need more and more the resources of rural banking. The government itself has been concerned about your energies and sustenance. For example, not so long ago when the prices of palay dropped on a nationwide scale, we took immediate steps to save the situation. We felt that if the price drop were not arrested, farmers would be unable to service their loans with the rural banks and the banks in turn would be hamstrung in their lending operations, perhaps crippled in this operation.

The Central Bank, the National Grains Authority, and the Philippine National Bank joined hands to reverse the trend, and fortunately they succeeded. We must continue to prop up palay prices, and this is the reason the NGA is carrying out its palay and corn procurement program. The NGA, by the way, was created to act as a sturdy link between the land reform program and the farmers themselves. It is not enough that tenant-farmers acquire lands; they must be nourished, assisted to enhance their productiveness. And so under Decree No. 4, we created the NGA.

In the operations of the NGA, the rural banks are again in the forefront as prime sources of funds for grain procurement. You are the direct source of the farmers sustenance, for it is with the rural banks that they will cash their checks from the NGA.

We look forward to the time when our farmers will be truly liberated as persons and as productive members of our society. In that time, land reform will have been past history, a milestone passed. And our land will bloom with crops, our agriculture will be linked to a modern complex of necessary industries. When and if we are still around when that season of well-being and progress comes, we shall know that in achieving our goals we were immeasurably supported and encouraged by our rural banks.

Marcos, F. E. (1978). Presidential speeches (Vol. 4). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Speech of President Marcos, An Ideal for All, September 10, 1973

An Ideal for All

TRUE TO OUR honored tradition and common faith, you have stood on these grounds on this day, under sun and rain, every year of my presidency, to offer your salute to your Commander-in-Chief, and your pledge, of loyalty to our Republic. This salute, and this pledge, I receive in behalf of our people and our country today.

It is a gesture required by protocol and ceremony, but it is a fact that the life you have chosen to live, the task and the burden you have chosen to take up, are by themselves the highest salute, and the highest pledge, you can offer to your Commander-in-Chief, to our people, to our country. For to bear arms for the Republic, as you have chosen to bear arms, is to accept a mandate from a people and a cause: it is to offer not only the strength of your muscles and your manhood, but also everything else that a man can be, every dream and aspiration, every joy and every sorrow that he may want to share with his loved one—be it a friend, a son, a daughter, or a family.

This is why I am honored, more than honored, to come here and pay tribute to the Filipino soldier today.

When one year ago, we decided to meet the anarchy and rebellion, the corruption and reign of special privilege in our society, I asked the Filipino soldier to stand fast — to fight, if the need came for him to fight; to show an example of discipline, dedication and sacrifice. I asked you to join with me in a cause that would transform our country and once more make our people united and proud. To that cause I pledged my honor, my fortune, my life.

A year of that struggle has passed. But no day should pass when we should not be rededicating to that cause our honor, our fortunes, and our lives. Not only do I believe in the lightness and justness of our cause. More than that, I have seen the sacrifices you have made, and are willing to make, for the chance of giving our people, particularly our children, a better life. I have been a soldier for our people, I shall remain so, all my life.

I cannot allow this day to pass without commending you for the exemplary conduct you have shown on those occasions when the capability of the Arm Forces had to be demonstrated, in some measure, during the last 12 months. But more than this, it fills me with a deep sense of personal pride that you have brought into the life of the soldier a sincere appreciation of his real duties to countrymen and brothers, especially those who faced us in misguided confrontation and combat.

The policy of restraint and compassion you have shown in Mindanao at the height of the disturbances there, shows that the Filipino soldier can bear arms for our people not to kill but rather to enforce a policy of accommodation, persuasion, of compassion and love. On behalf of our people, therefore commend and thank you for the work you have done, not only in Mindanao throughout the country, during the last 12 months. In their behalf, I thank for having shown, through your good work, that the Filipino soldier can be exemplar of nobility and sacrifice; that in his work we will see a genuine expression of some of our greatest ideals. You have shown that compassion, brotherhood and unity are not distant dreams for our people, but realities that throb in the hearts of our communities, including those that were once plague by misunderstanding and mistrust.

But the debt we owe to the soldier is not alone confined to the fact offering his life and his honor, he lent himself to the effort to fight the anarchy and rebellion, and restore the peace; or that he led others in keeping the majority of our laws. Much more than this, we owe it to the Filipino soldier for show our society the true meaning and value of discipline; that without discipline there would be no order, and without order, there would be no progress; perhaps, no Republic. He has given more than what the law and the discipline of the service ask him to give; he has given what faith and will alone could build a better world, make it possible for him to give. In a word, he has given the most of himself, in order that the New Society may be built.

The reward that awaits the soldier is not much, when measured in material terms. Often the thought of having worked for something noble and good, something that will last suffices. The soldier in everyone among us here knows this; and yet it is for this— for that fleeting moment when we could, this thought on the altar of our very existence — that we would give our all the soldier, therefore, who has offered his all in order to take part in our pledge one final reward. We shall achieve an authentic society that will part of the consciousness of this age, and be a constant pride of our race you, the workers of this revolution, I pledge the fulfillment of your sacrifice.

We shall attain our dreams. We shall build a brighter and a braver world, a world where we can glory in the beauty of our country and grant every citizen equal opportunity in its true meaning and full dimension.

As we commend the soldier in his role, we must also commend the people in theirs. This has been, and remains, a period of great challenge.

Even as we restored peace and order in the streets, emancipated the farmer from his age-old bondage, increased what is due to the worker, gave every man his due; even as we fought corruption, abolished the hierarchy of special privilege, gave life to our economy in a way and magnitude unprecedented in the history of our Republic, there remained problems we could not fully resolve.

With the massive destruction of the last floods behind us, we came under and drought that dried not only our soil and rice crops and rendered the labors of our farmers meaningless, but also dried up the supplies of the richest rice-exporting countries. Through modern technological methods, we tried to produce rain by seeding the clouds. But in most of these attempts we failed. Nature itself would not give us the right clouds. We went to the richest sources grain, and with them negotiated purchases, but as the time came when we needed these purchases most, the contracts fell through, because the same ought that had hit us, also hit their crops.

In the face of such a problem, we asked our people to accept the facts. There was a shortage of rice. And this could be met, not by recrimination, or by going back to the old politics, but by asking every one to do his share. To stretch the supply, our people mixed corn with rice. They ate root crop substitutes. But this they did without damning anyone, least of all the government, because they considered themselves one with the leadership in its search for a solution to the shortage. We stood together as one people, resolved to make a common sacrifice, without looking for a scapegoat or whipping boy to dress down or renounce. We mobilized the barangays, and the barangays responded to the challenge, to the best of their abilities. Without any salary or emoluments, the barangay leaders worked long hours to ensure the efficient distribution of corn and rice. They showed a fine example of dedication, faith and sacrifice.

We are not yet through with this problem. We are beginning to harvest, it is true, the results of Masagana 99, but we have not left the woods. We are still facing this moral test. It is a test of a nation, it is a test of every Filipino.

This, to me, is one of our finest hours during the last twelve months. We not only welcomed change, we not only supported the unifying power of progress, but we stood fast amid a great problem that threatened to engulf us. The barangay leaders showed that they could administer responsibility with utmost dedication, integrity and sacrifice, and our people showed that so long as we did not have any special treatment for any special class, they too would accept sacrifice.

The problems of food, energy, environment and population will continue to haunt our society, as they will continue to haunt the whole world. But so long as we stand together, we will have the advantage of confronting problems in common, of facing problems that affect one, with the dedication and resolve of all. The Masagana 99 program, which we expect to give us its first harvest soon, is a model of cooperation between the government and our farmers. The "Palayan ng Bayan" is another. Through this project, we expect to cultivated total of 140,000 hectares of virgin lands for our food production. At this time, our economy is still dedicated to the filling of shortages, but we have to higher and think of the day when we should help meet the shortages of other countries.

In energy, we must continue our efforts to produce our own supply, even as the richest countries of the world are threatened with a drying up of their own supplies. This is one of the reasons why I have actively encouraged and gone out of my way to support the oil exploration projects in our country at this time. The world has reached an irreversible period in which the consumption of energy continues to go up, and it becomes the duty of everyone to participate in the effort to generate enough supply. More than this, we have other reasons. We believe that, among other things, oil is a key factor to our own progress and development. The development of Mindanao, Sulu and Palawan is a high priority in our program, and the industrial effort to discover oil there can only complement our official efforts in that part of our country. But beyond Mindanao, Sulu and Palawan, there is our entire country to develop and put in the orbit of real economic prosperity and power.

As we devote ourselves to these efforts, we cannot be diverted from the problems of population and environment. The control of human population must not only be a problem that should concern government; it should now enter the consciousness of every family man, whatever his religious creed. The methods will be left to the individual, rather than prescribed by government; but it should be more than a casual matter to the individual. A great urgency attaches to the problem, and this is once more because of the long-established Malthusian principle that the increase of food supply cannot be expected to cope with the increase in population. Man's planet must not end up as his tomb but overpopulation ensures nothing but our burial.

Not only must we control the rate of human growth, we must also make sure that we remain in control of the biosphere. From the air that we breathe to the water that we drink and the food that we eat, there must be a conscious effort to the part of everyone to ensure maximum safety and health. The Pasig river development project is an effort at pollution control, the cleanliness and beautification drive is another. In every home and every family, there must be an involvement in this problem. Planners and developers of modern dwellings, particularly the subdivisions, must develop new housing and town dwelling concepts that take into consideration the increased hazards of pollution and death, and the corresponding needs of integrated communities.

Mankind should not be distracted from the solution of these problems: that is why it becomes necessary for societies like ours to prosecute vigorous reforms. For it is in renewing the vigor, dynamism and commitment of our societies that we are able to contribute to the solution of grave universal problems. And this is exactly what we are trying to do.

In the last 12 months, we have set a record in all the areas in which we tried to bring some change. The international reserve which was registered at $137 million when the floating rate was adopted on February 20, 1970, reached $731 million as of August 31, this year, its highest level since 1947. Central Bank reserves rose from $121 million to $890 million; and the Central Bank working fund, from $1 million to $690 million. From October 1972 to August 31, this year, our balance of payments registered a surplus of $612 million. Our foreign currency deposits, began in September 1970, amounted to $383.44 million as of August 17 this year, indicative of a steady build-up of the foreign currency deposit system. We have been able to continuously restructure our external debt, and there has been an increased shift from short to long term of our external loans for development, from 43 per cent in 1970 to 66 per cent by June this year. We have also repaid some $296 million of our external debts. We cannot yet quantify the foreign investments that have come in, for most of the investors have an open mind as to the kind of money they would spend in our development. But the traffic has been sustained, and the areas are identifiable. Our invitation to international financiers and businessmen to set up their multi-national headquarters in the Philippines has been met with enthusiasm, and there are a good number of such companies that should be moving to Manila in a short time. Tourism has also picked up, and the Philippines is now a tourist destination in the tourist literature of most travel agencies and airlines in the world. The movement of the economy cannot be arrested. It can only accelerate.

But the progress of the economy, the influx of foreign businessmen and tourists are only some details of the society we are trying to build. After emancipating the farmer from his age-old bondage to the soil, we must make sure that will benefit from his new possession, that he will endow it with technology. After lifting the worker from old conditions of exploitation, we must make sure will transform himself into a creative force in society. We must make sure, indeed, that the gains we have made since September continue, and are institutionalized in our society. We must make sure that social discipline is internalized in every member of society, and that finally, civility and progress, communal and national values, as well as the humanist and creative spirit acquire a life of their own. We are talking not only of an effort, but rather, of result that will last.

With great sadness, I have watched some slight reversion to the old habits and practices of some elements in our society, in the private sector as well as its government, including some, who claim the power of high office, or even invoke some closeness to the Presidency. Before the wrath of the law comes we must apply the discipline of the New Society, and we must apply it with resolve, without fear or favor, without distinctions of friendship, kinship of affinity. "Walang mahina, walang malakas, ang lahat ay pantay-pantay." We, who have been called upon to lead, must lead by example, and we must deal with our relatives, our friends, our subordinates in the same way that would deal with everyone else. The peddling of influence and special privilege must stop. The moral and intellectual corruption of public office and official responsibility must stop. I notice that even in Malacañang, favor-seekers flatterers still seek an audience with the President, hoping to obtain license concessions and special privileges. It is said that sometimes those who are close to the President are party to this conspiracy all over again. I also notice that to some parts of the public sector there is a tendency on the part of some to take the place of politicians who had been repudiated by the society. There are still those who would like to be power-brokers, who would like to exercise unexplained and therefore, illegitimate power.

If necessary, I shall utilize the powers of the law and the military to break these malpractices. But without resorting to the might of the law, I appeal to all to accept and contribute to the growth of the new social discipline.

This is not the time to outwit the law or its enforcers. This is not the time to litter the streets when no one is looking. This is rather the time to help formulate and enforce necessary and wise laws, to pick up the litter in one's backyard, to the street, in the park, or even in somebody else's backyard, even when nobody is looking.

It does not take much to do this. It does not require one to be one who blindly and fanatically follows. It merely requires one to be part of the consciousness of the society; to be part of the objective we are trying to attain and the effort. It only requires one to know that we are doing this not for one man alone, but for all of us, for the entire society, now and in the future; that we do this not only for ourselves, but for our children also. It only requires one to be an involved Filipino.

That is why on this important day, I ask all our people to rededicate themselves to the labor we have begun when we decided to make a new society. Give your oath, and your pledge to our country, and to our posterity. And together, let us build, not a dream but a reality.

Speech of President Marcos, New Paths to Growth and Stability, January 4, 1974

NEW PATHS TO GROWTH AND STABILITY

BY PRESIDENT FERDINAND E. MARCOS

(Proposed speech on the Silver Anniversary Program of the Central Bank of the Philippines, January 4, 1974.)

As I stand before you today, on the occasion of the inauguration and blessing of the Central Bank Building complex and the twenty-fifth anniversary of this venerable institution, my mind goes back about seven years to a similar occasion involving another of the pillars of our financial establishment.

Towards the end of 1966 I was also present at the inauguration of the main offices of the Philippine National Bank and the golden anniversary of that institution. That year was my first year in the Presidency of the Republic. As I look back on that event, I cannot help but note the sharp contrast that exists, on one hand, between the position of our economy and the general thrust of economic policy in 1966 and, on the other, the position of the Philippine economy today and the implications deriving from it for our economic policymakers. Before I spell these out, allow me to recall to you the salient features of our economy during the first year of my Presidency.

Economists have described the year 1966 as an expansionary year for the Philippine economy. The expansionary trend then of our monetary and fiscal policies had my blessings, mindful as I was of the regime of tight credit and conservative budgets that had gone before, and concerned as I was about the sluggishness of the economy, which had not been growing at the rate conducive to making fuller use of our country's abundant human and natural resources,

You will recall that monetary policy became more liberal, credit restrictions were eased, while the government embarked on an ambitious Infrastructure building program. Businessmen were given new opportunity to secure financing for expansion programs, and the countryside began to hum with the activity of earth movers, graders and cranes. All this marked the revival of our economy which began the drive toward the highest rate of real growth in many years.

Unfortunately, the pace of expansion could not be maintained. The balance of payments pressure that developed in the early part of 1967 compelled our monetary and fiscal authorities to shift to a policy of contraction. It became necessary to tighten foreign exchange and credit policies and make cutbacks in government spending programs. Another of our short economic cycles had just been completed, and we had the task of nursing our economy back to a position that would make possible another surge of expansion.

Rash, and sometimes harsh, judgments have been heard in considering that phase of our economic striving. The policy of economic expansion that my administration pursued during its first four years has been seen in various lights, some calling it untimely and premature. But I regard those four years — 1966 to 1969 — as the years which saw through the first phase of the process of laying the work for real development. The facts and figures for schools, hospitals and puericulture centers established, for bridges, highways and feeder roads built, and irrigation canals installed, were far from political rhetoric. They were the tangible outcome of the blueprint for laying the foundation needed to propel the economy into the future.

Any structure envisioned to have a proper degree of permanence must have a strong foundation, and that is never more true than in the case of a nation's economy. You may well ask what the second phase of the process of laying our economic foundation was and the answer was close attention to and the rationalization of the institutional, conceptual and policy deficiencies in the management of our economy. This second phase was programmed through four years.

Those four years — 1970 to 1973 — introduced further changes in the economic framework of our society, in one indeed at any comparable period in our history as a sovereign nation. Because martial law was the dominant element of this period, the economic reforms that most easily come to mind were those that became part of our laws since September 21, 1972. But I would like to stress that economic reform of a somewhat different sort—structural reform—had become part of the fact of national life since February, 1970, when I approved the Monetary Board decision to allow our currency to float.

Given the composition of our import trade, the ratio of our total imports to our gross national product, the foreign exposures of the public and the private sector and the capital structures of most Philippine industries, the nature and extent of the exchange reform of 1970 was bound to bring about significant changes in the structure of the Philippine economy. Substitution, rationalization and economy have been the watchwords in the technical and financial aspects of the operations of both the private and the public sector since the market was allowed to price foreign exchange. As a result of this action, the structure of our economy has changed—for the better, indeed.

The exchange reform has been the single most important economic policy change in the last four years, but it has by no means been the only one. During that period the Board of Investments, working more closely with the monetary and fiscal authorities than it ever had before, adopted numerous policies with the common aim of bringing about a more rational use of foreign exchange and other resources. The Progressive Car Manufacturing Program is the most notable case in point.

In the field of public finance, the groundwork for improved tax and customs administration was laid with the thorough revision of the Tax and Tariff Codes and the success of the various tax amnesties. In agriculture, the administrative framework which proved to be highly effective with rice and corn in the period 1966-1969 was further improved upon in the succeeding four years, and the prospects for more rational development of the countryside have been enhanced by the adoption of the integrated approach, under which the object of developmental activity is an entire region, not, as hitherto, a particular project or a particular industry. The establishment of the Philippine International Trading Corporation, the creation of supervisory authorities for particular industries and the rationalization of the Government's foreign trade promotion service offer promise of greater stability in Philippine merchandise trade.

Finally, mention should be made of the especial zeal with which the external debt is being monitored, an element of great importance from the standpoint of the relationship between the external resource needs of our economic development program and our capacity to service the use of such resources.

I spoke earlier of the contrast between the position of the economy at the end of 1966 and its position today. The contrast has two aspects. One aspect is embodied by the current level of our international reserve. The sharp and sustained upward movement in world prices of our traditional exports, superimposed on the aforesaid reforms and on the improved peace and order conditions created by martial law, have given the Philippines a position of financial strength the likes of which it has not experienced before.

The other aspect relates to the capacity of our economy to sustain an expansion rate in the relative growths of the 1966-67 magnitude. There is much to support the position that the Philippine economy can undergo that kind of expansion today without running into another round of balance of payments troubles. The explanation for this is to be found in the changes that have taken place in the structure and management of the economy during the intervening period. Those changes have made our economy more capable of sustained upward movement. This capability is what I really want to discuss with you today.

If ever the Philippines was ready for an economic takeoff—as generally understood by economists—that time is today. I would not have said this seven years ago; and I would have thought twice before saying it even as recently as a year ago. But today, as we stand here to help celebrate the silver jubilee of the Central Bank, I am convinced that the Philippines has come to that momentous point—the point at which an economic takeoff is imminent.

Let us first examine the economic structure of our country.

The Philippine economy has in the last eight years taken large strides in the direction of strengths—thus less vulnerable now to the vagaries and vicissitudes of external forces. The sectors of the economy which have led to this new vigor — agriculture, exports, small-scale industries, tourism — and which have experienced policy bias of a negative sort during much of the past quarter-century, are the very sectors receiving the closest attention from the Government today.

The recurrent foreign exchange crises which our narrow export base and our high propensity for imports have repeatedly created have had the effect of reorienting our industries, wherever this has been possible, toward greater efficiency in the use of imported equipment and raw materials, toward lower-cost foreign substitutes, and toward domestically produced replacements for imports.

In the field of trade, the measures that have been taken in the direction of greater domestic processing of our traditional exports, the broadening of our export pattern in the wake of the international financial crises and the closer management of our import trade have all contributed toward the enhancement of our economy's capacity to withstand adverse developments in any of our major trade partners.

Finally, the improvement in the techniques used to manage our external debt, and the greater rationality in the distribution of maturities, have brought our economy to the point where it can withstand declines in foreign exchange inflows without having to resort to drastic measures.

I turn now to the resource situation of our country.

I would be doing less than justice to our economic policy makers if I didn't start by discussing our external resources. Not only is the sustained rise in the international reserve the most joyful element in our overall resource situation; it is also, unquestionably, the most important element in any determined developmental drive. With the foreign currency deposits taken into account, the Central Bank now has external resources totaling close to $1.5 billion with which to finance our essential requirements. Barring a need to draw down such a fund on a heavy and sustained basis — even taking into account the energy crisis and the new price levels of oil — there now exists an ample cushion against anything but the sharpest decline in our foreign exchange receipts. The near-term prospects for the continued rise in our international reserve, in the light of current price movements in the commodity markets, the trend of tourist arrivals and the rate of inflow of foreign capital on both short and long-term account, may be considered bright. The stronger our reserve position, the more confidently, it goes without saying, may we embark on a program designed to raise our real growth rate substantially over the levels of the last decade.

There is, next, that other most important element of a developing country's resource endowment: labor. An abundant supply of low-cost and adequately educated workers is considered by some economists to be second in importance only to a sound financial position from the standpoint of accelerated development. That such a supply of labor is of critical value is best seen in the case of the countries in our region which have been recording the highest rates of real growth. I refer, of course, to South Korea, Taiwan, Hongkong and Singapore. It is interesting to note in this connection a survey conducted recently by a well-known local auditing firm showing that our country now has one of the lowest average wage levels in this part of the world. The examples of Hongkong and, not so long ago, Japan show that labor will not stay low-cost forever, and that as an economy's growth exerts pressure on its labor supply.

Then, there are our natural resources. All too often when people speak of accelerating economic development it is manufacturing that they have in mind. Agriculture tends to be seen as a leading sector only in times of sharp upward movement in commodity prices, as at present. The example of Taiwan and the record of our own banana industry show that agriculture of the non-traditional kind can provide the essential thrust to a development program calling for markedly higher rates of growth. The potential of our country in both domestic market and export terms is considerable.

Land is, of course, needed also for industrial facilities, and the folly of taking our land endowment for granted has been demonstrated by the situation of Japan's industries, which now have to seriously consider establishing facilities overseas due to the sheer shortage of good industrial sites, compounded by ecological problems. Land is not going to be a constraint to program of accelerated development for some time to come. For this we should be thankful.

Finally, there are our mineral resources. Anyone who has read the current Four-Year Development Plan will appreciate that our economic planners are fully aware of the potential of the mining industry as a leading sector in any program of accelerated development. Foreign investment analysts are no less aware of that potential, a fact indicated by the economic evaluations of our country that reach my desk and the number of foreign mining-industry officials whom I receive. Indeed, I probably receive as many foreigners interested in mining as I do all other types of foreign businessmen combined. Of course, when I speak of mineral resources I refer also to the offshore variety. One of the things I feel extremely confident about is the outlook on the current exploratory activity on our sea and in the lands that border them, activity which will produce results while I am Chief Executive.

Let me invite your attention now to the third factor supporting my thesis that our economy is ready for take-off. That factor is the rationality that now characterizes the policy framework for our economic activities.

I don't think that there is any major area of economic policy that has not undergone revision of one degree or another during the past sixteen months. Change has in no instance been effected for the sake of change. Revisions of policy have taken place only after the most searching and the most objective evaluation of all relevant factors.

Today's situation stands in great contrast to the pre-martial law situation, when the demonstrated rationality of a proposed policy change was no guarantee whatsoever of its enactment into law. Sound policies being as critical as they are to the efficient use of our resources, the rationality that now attends the making of our economic policies must be considered a plus factor in a program of accelerated economic growth.

I ask you now to consider, as the fourth part of my thesis, the capacity of our economy to generate domestic financial resources for development. One of the aspects of our economic development that sets it apart from that of other developing countries is that we have always provided most of the financial resources — well over 80 percent — required by our development programs. The fact that the contribution of foreign financial resources to our development has been rising in absolute terms indicates that the domestic saver has been maintaining the rate of his savings. Earlier this year I proclaimed a Savings Consciousness Year and created a National Savings Commission charged with the responsibility of undertaking studies and programs aimed at bringing about a rise in the volume of savings. The Government is now considering the question of whether a further change in interest rate policy would on balance be beneficial to the economy. On the basis of the record, there is every reason to believe that a program designed to increase the economy's rate of real growth will get the savings support that it needs.

What are the implications of a program of accelerated growth for our economic policymakers? The answer lies in the basic nature of such a program. Because accelerated growth within the context of our present stage of economic development is ideally a function of increased investment and increased exports, what will be required will be emphasis on policies that encourage saving and rationalize consumption, promote export-oriented activities and discourage imports, and reward efficiency and penalize waste. These are the general precepts that guide present policy making, so there is no need for me to elaborate. I dare say, however, that the possibilities for optimizing the use of our resources have by no means been exhausted.

It is entirely appropriate that the inauguration of the splendid facilities of the Central Bank and the observance of its silver anniversary should be the occasion for the enunciation of a bold new strategy for the economic development of our country. As the Central Bank charts a new course through the next quarter-century, so, also should the nation whose progress Central Bank policies are meant to subserve strike out on new paths to the future. That new course for our country is the one that should keep us firmly on the road to substantially higher rates of growth of which our economy is now capable.

Meanwhile, we should try our very best to maintain a position of strength, to conserve that which we recognize as vital to our economic life-lines, and to take counsel with ourselves as far as we are able in matters that relate us to the outside world bearing foremost in mind our national interest. I need not point out that small developing nations like the Philippines are not asked to participate in decision making when international monetary policies are concerned, nor in fact in many power plays in our world, and yet these same small developing nations are the most severely affected by any worldwide policy change. It is imperative therefore for us to proceed with both caution and inner strength, with an independent turn of mind, and an ever growing self-reliance. It is the only way, by exercising our own powers and using our own resources wherever we can, for us to survive in a complex world.

Message of President Marcos, A College for Leadership, February 4, 1974

A College for Leadership

YOU ARE GRADUATING after 11 months of intensive schooling from one of the most unique institutions of learning in the Philippines. It is traditional in every country, at least in the free world, following the lines of military training for government, to set up a national defense college wherein the master's degree can be granted after 11 months, as you are going to receive your masters now.

As the Course is intensified and compressed into an 11-month period, rather than a longer period as is usual in civilian institutions, you will note the intensity of the curriculum as well as the studies conceived and implemented in the college.

I congratulate you on this training. It is a part of the effort throughout the Philippines, in all institutions, to convert the entire country into some kind of a training institute. You will note that training is going on throughout, the country, from the smallest village or barrio all the way up to the executive academy and international seminars. The idea is that, if there be a conversion or a change, an alteration of attitudes and a reorientation and reassessment of values, then these things must immediately be imparted to as many people as possible to guarantee the continuity of change. As one intellectual has well said, the idea is to establish an epoch, not just an episode which departs and is forgotten with the day or with the period. What is desired is the institution of an epoch which brings about its own fruits and continuity.

As I said, you see training in all levels of life going on. The attitudes of our people are now moved into more stable objectives and the concept, of course, is always to look for leadership because leadership often determines the success or failure of any given mission. It has been repeatedly said that leadership imparts into any period of any country's history its own personality, its own enthusiasm, its own strength. Yet this personality, this enthusiasm and the strengths and weaknesses of leadership may be imparted not only to that period I but to future generations as well.

The National Defense College of the Philippines is, as I stated in the beginning, an unusual institution. It is an institution that picks up men who are already leaders in their respective fields, and gives men a broad perspective of the problems facing the country, not only from the military point of view but also from the broad perspective of national leadership. And here is where, of course, we may be criticized for elitism, for giving emphasis to quality instead of quantity and the like.

However, it is quite true also that in relaying to leaders the broad perspective that does exist not only in the military but also in the political structure, we hope that you will impart the ideals, ideas, hopes and purposes of I the New Society—and of the human society, for that matter, to the greater mass of our people. I belabor the subject because of the fact that, I am sure, many people will inquire, what Dean Marcos Herras, Dean Robles, for instance, are doing here in this military institution? The President is militarizing everybody? No, the idea is to allow counteraction among the different elements of our society especially in the leadership because one of the fatal weaknesses of any society, whether democratic, authoritarian or dictatorial, is the idea of closed compartments. That may be good in intelligence work where you need to compartmentalize, divide and segregate.

But in the establishment of societies, the great leaders have discovered that in many instances, as in a crisis, it may be necessary for men to act on the assumption that their corresponding partners in the movement, in the action or in the project are moving in the same direction—assumptions even without the need for consultations. This is important for purposes not only of efficiency but also for purposes of attaining the greatest objective with the least possible effort and at the least possible price.

The Philippines is at a period where we have to cram in a few years what other countries have attained over a period of decades, nay, even centuries. We speak of the development of other countries. Actually, those other countries have been preparing or, rather, working at development over the years. The modernization of Japan was the work of over a century. The same thing is true with Germany. The same thing is true with America and many other countries; Yet, we are expected to rise up to their standards now without paying the price which, as you all know, was pretty high — the attendant social evils of the industrial revolution which resulted in the misery and degradation of millions of people, especially the young and the women, etc. I need not go into all of these. It is enough to say that we should make up for our lack of experience by learning from the lessons of the past.

We need not, therefore, go into the fact that you are the chosen men in this particular field and as such your obligations are quite clear. I need not go into the fact that the private and the public sectors are represented here precisely because the partnership between these sectors need not be emphasized or argued about. It's taken for granted that when the country moves, these sectors move together and to segregate them is fatal to our efforts.

I need not also state that we have found the National Defense College to have the capability to build leadership in our country. I wish that we could accommodate more students in the National Defense College, and at the same time, increase the faculty members and the administration of the college. I have been talking to Gen. Syjuco here and it's my hope that we will be able to work this out very soon.

There have been efforts to lessen the emphasis on the defense college or postgraduate work. I remember that sometime ago, I imposed as a condition for promotion to the rank of colonel, graduation from the general staff school and the defense college. Of course, there were many complaints because, indeed, habits die very hard and once you have dropped the ways and habits of scholarship and move into the pragmatic day-to-day life of survival, you lose the aptitudes that you learn in school. But the man who commands people, the man who makes decisions, must both be a scholar as well as a man of the world. And it cannot be gainsaid that you can separate one from the other for a decision-maker must depend upon certain wisdoms that are no longer beyond question. I have talked to all leaders in both government and private sectors and this is what they found out: that the men who are running the affairs of corporations and government often become dry, stale and completely burned out. There are no more new ideas. Then is the time to go into postgraduate work, sabbatical leave, etc. I even feel it myself and I know when I am burnt out. Then I refuse to meet anybody and I go back to studying. I go back to working along the same lines that you have worked.

I was talking to the General about the tutorial system where they give you your work for over a week and the professors may guide you once a week. You may have certain questions to ask but it is up to you to go in there and read and brush up on your new, original ideas.

When the energy crisis started and, of course, many of us anticipated this way back in 1972, I ordered all the books that there were on the energy crisis, of new sources of energy as well as all related subjects. Then I went for a one-month sabbatical. I went around. They thought that I was traveling around in the provinces. Yes, I was, but I was reading more than meeting people. This, to me, is some kind of, you know, scholarship which every leader must devote himself to, otherwise you will spend time in conferences listening with a mind completely blank. It has lost its facility to absorb new orientations and new ideas. We cannot utilize old formulas for new problems and while you may try to reshape this present world with sheer energy, there are easier ways of reshaping it and man, in his capability to change his environment, must find out, must determine for himself what is the easiest way or the more pleasant, the more graceful and the least costly.

This is the eighth graduating class of the National Defense College. This is a group of leaders that will now go into the field. Some will say that yours has been a lost and completely useless effort. Eleven months, what did they gain from it, some will ask. A lot of new wisdom but they didn't produce anything.

The new economist now includes education as a priority investment. Many, if not all of the modern economists now agree that education should constitute a greater portion of the investment of countries aspiring for something higher than present-day levels of civilization. If this be true, then no education of any kind is a waste of funds, time and energy.

So I say that we should encourage the National Defense College, to sharpen bright minds, and when these minds tend to deteriorate with misuse or abuse, then to re-sharpen them all over again so that they may be utilized in spreading the gospel of new frontiers, new aspirations and new objectives.

I congratulate you for your effort. No one, except a scholar, can understand the efforts that go into scholarship, into self-discipline and the effort to extend knowledge or its application. It is easy to study when you are young. It is hard to do so when you are old and you have set habits and prejudices because you must reopen your minds all over again. You must broaden your perspectives. I know because I have to warn myself against this all the time. I must warn myself against prejudices, against the lack of openness of mind and the breadth of mentality required of scholarship. At the same time, it is always easy to be satisfied with the familiar and the old. This is natural, this is human. It is also easier and less taxing to devote yourself to escapist literature rather than to more intellectual and rigorous pursuits.

I, therefore, congratulate the effort that you have put into your scholarship. I congratulate the college administration and the members of the faculty for participating in a noble effort and I urge you to continue with the same enthusiasm that you have shown and I look forward to greater achievements. You are now authorized to grant master's degrees. May these degrees continue to increase and increasing, spread the gospel of its new endeavors and new wisdom throughout our land. And much more than this, remember that in these efforts of yours, both of the graduates as well as of the members of the faculty and administration of the college, you have the complete and enthusiastic support of the President and the entire government.

Address of President Marcos on the 35th anniversary of the Philippine Navy, February 8, 1974

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
On the 35th anniversary of the Philippine Navy

[Delivered on February 8, 1974]

The Expanding Role of the Philippine Navy

IKINAGAGALAK KONG MAKILAHOK sa ika-35 kaarawan ng Hukbong Dagat ng Pilipinas. Sa araw na ito, ating muling inaalala ang mga pinagmulan ng ating hukbong dagat at gayon din ng ating Armed Forces. Napakinggan ninyo ang mga citation o ang pagbibigay-alam ng kadakilaan ng lahat ng nasabitan ng medalya sa araw na ito.

Sa lahat ng labanan, ang Hukbong Dagat ng Pilipinas ay nangunguna sa katapangan at sa matapat na paglilingkod sa inang bayan. At gayun din, aking nakikita na magaling din silang lumakad at magmartsa, at marahil, mas mahusay sila sa ganitong bagay kaysa sa mga taga-lupa. Pinagmamasdan ko ang mga mukha ng mga namumuno sa Philippine Navy, Philippine Constabulary at Air Force sapagka't marahil hindi nila tatanggapin ang papuring ito sa Hukbong Dagat.

All of us are, indeed, very happy to be here to participate in this ceremony in the name of the people of the Philippines. I congratulate and commend the officers, men and civilian personnel of the Philippine Navy on their 35th anniversary. We are all convinced that in the years that the navy has been in the frontline of service to this nation, it has discharged its responsibility with loyalty, devotion and high efficiency.

Doubtless, we have a small navy compared to other countries. We are a developing nation with limited resources and means. We are a young nation and, therefore, we have time and opportunity to grow. This goes for our navy as it goes for many of the things that we are now building starting with the New Society.

Today, I am proud to report to you that we have acquired a distinct reputation as a nation that has posted achievements based not on our size or numbers but on enterprise, boldness, competence and lately on a new discipline that has added a greater sheen to the character of our people. And, of course, the Filipino soldier has always been known and noted for his valor. The forerunners of the men in the Philippine Navy proved this in the last war. All the fighting men, of course, in the last war had demonstrated this capability in the decades before that as we struggled for our rights and the realization of our dreams.

You will note the peculiar quality of courage, individual heroism and valor cited and quoted in the citations that have been read during the awarding ceremonies this afternoon. I note the participation of navy personnel especially in the fight against insurgents and subversives in the South. I have awarded the presidential streamer to a distinguished battalion, the second battalion of the Marines commanded by one of your outstanding leaders, Lt. Commander Asuncion, who incidentally, used to be with the Presidential Security Command. I have awarded also several gold crosses and a bronze cross and military merit medals, all for outstanding valor.

Thus, it is in this context that our small navy enjoys the affection and the confidence of our people. Not only in combat or in war but also in peace has the navy earned this accolade from the people, for there is something splendid in a small band of men struggling against great odds as during the war when our navy, still in its infancy, faced overwhelming forces and never once flinched in the fulfillment of their duty. In the same way, we look upon the life and times of our navy as the story of our country. The Philippines, from the time of its birth as a nation in modern times has had to struggle uphill, raising itself from the dust and the ruin of war, to begin the noble and inspiring task of making itself in a worthy member of the community of nations, as well as worthy of our devotion, of our toil, of our sacrifices, of the sons and daughters who will come after us.

I like to think that the men and women who compose our navy today having in their veins and in their hearts the faith, the aspirations, the sublime compulsions and visions of our forebears who left comfort and comparative security to rise above tyranny and found for themselves a new country where freedom will be a touchstone of life. Thus, braving unknown seas, sailing frail boats, they immigrated to this land in the course of which adventure they developed unity, a comradeship and a brotherhood that was to stand the test of time.

It was that same spirit and inner compulsion which, if you will remember, brought glory to our aptly named Mosquito Fleet, small, fast Q-boats which during the war performed impossible feats to harass and halt the enemy, buying time for our forces. These exploits loom large today, I feel, in the minds of the men and women of our navy, and inform the activities and missions of the present-day navy. This I feel, has made your organization peculiarly fit and capable in facing up to the challenges of our times.

In performing your traditional role as the first line of defense archipelago, the navy has been not only ready and capable, but highly responsive to the needs of the hour. Though constrained by resources and operational limitations, our navy has continually grown, acquitting itself well with every mission it has undertaken. For instance in giving support to the ground elements of our armed forces, as in the early stages of our pacification campaign in the South, the navy played a crucial role in making mat campaign a success. The navy's effectiveness in every instance is, of course, the fruit of your realistic and unceasing training through bilateral and multilateral exercises. Of this, I am sure, all our navy officers and men are truly proud.

On this occasion, it is perhaps also timely and proper that I, on behalf of our country and our people, articulate the appreciation mat we have to our allies, especially to the United States of America, represented here by no less than Admiral Shelton and the head of JUSMAG, General Grimsley, who have been instrumental in helping us develop the Philippine Navy. Many of the units now composing the Philippine Navy have come, under one arrangement or another, from the United States government and the American people. For this, let us thank our American friends.

I am particularly gratified to find navy ships deployed not only all over our long coastline but also in more distant waters, serving in every area with distinction and fired by a single objective, to protect the integrity of our country. Our navy today is engaged in continuing and multifarious missions I such as the maintenance of navigational aids, search and rescue operations, weather patrol, ensuring the safety of life and property at sea, looking after boating safety, port safety and helping in solving the problem of pollution as well as committed to the enforcement of laws and regulations. Indeed, I find the Philippine Navy an example of dedication and sacrifice, worthy of the emulation of our people.

As your Commander-in-Chief, I consider it fundamental that armed services must have the sense of unity to the point where coordinating operations become an automatic reflex action. I find this cohesive spirit vibrantly expressed in the navy, particularly in the Marines. This unit of the navy; has served and still serves valiantly with other units of the armed forces in the still unfinished business of stabilizing peace and normality throughout the land. I repeat, the citations and awards and declarations this afternoon demonstrate this outstanding quality of the Marines, this band of men who have been committed repeatedly to the protection not only of the people's honor but also of the peace and tranquility of our homes.

No less remarkable is the herculean job of maintaining the logistics pipeline of the entire armed forces, which was accomplished by the navy through its military sealift and terminal command during the critical early days of martial law. You will recall that when the crisis in the South suddenly developed, we had to rely initially on our Air Force to airlift troops and critical supplies to the front. However, the rapid increase of the field operational requirements outweighed the physical capabilities of the Philippine Air Force, despite its heroic efforts and despite its use even of civilian air units. Thus, we realized that the momentum of required logistic support could not have been sustained without the Philippine Navy. And your organization responded with such high Spirit that the massive requirements for personnel and cargo transshipment were ably met. On another front the tremendous contribution of the navy is equally on record. I refer to the part played by the navy's terminal command in vigorous implementation of the government's national electrification and infrastructure development program. I am, therefore, happy to commend the navy for these outstanding contributions to national progress even as it unflaggingly discharges its basic function as a potent arm of national defense.

There is no question that the navy has indeed contributed immensely to the general well-being and progress of our people, and I shall mention here only a few naval programs — the massive and effective home defense programs; this naval ferry in Cagayan; the floating clinic; your participation in the equitable distribution of oil, grains and other prime commodities; and the signal role the navy has played in the Pasig river beautification campaign. These are just a few of the navy's concrete contributions to the national interest for which our people are palpably grateful.

The navy is by all indications in the forefront in the equally important task, of developing a self-reliant posture. The launching of the RPS Tawi-Tawi this morning and the Patrol Craft Fast 325, the successful outcome of the first amphibian vehicle built by the navy completed only a few months ago, are again eloquent testimony to the imaginative efforts at making use of our indigenous resources as we stand out to achieve our objective of self-reliance. But self-reliance does not only mean the development of our internal military capabilities. It also means the development of allied civilian industries — these must be assisted and developed to enable them to extend a meaningful assistance to the national effort, especially in times of emergency. It is therefore, with this need in mind that I ask you to sharpen the growing awareness of our people about this necessity by procuring some of your requirements from qualified civilian establishments, and thus provide the starting point for the effective unification of existing efforts so that in time of need we shall be ready. This partnership in peace between the military and civilian sectors is not only an essential ingredient of self-reliance but also one of the fundamentals of the reformation we hope to institutionalize in our New Society and to infuse into our people.

Again, I, as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the Philippines in representation of 40 million Filipinos, extend commendation and congratulations to you, the Philippine Navy, your flag-officer-in-command Rear Admiral Ruiz, to the officers, men and civilian personnel of this organization. You have done well. We salute you on this day.

Message of President Marcos, The Competence of the Philippine Navy, February 8, 1974

THE COMPETENCE OF THE PHILIPPINE NAVY

BY PRESIDENT FERDINAND E. MARCOS

(Proposed remarks at the launching of the 87-Ft and 65-Ft Watercraft, Cavite Naval Shipyard, February 8, 1974)

I am proud to be here today.

I feel proud because these vessels that we are launching today are proofs of the creativity and resourcefulness of the Philippine Navy.

Exactly two years ago, I officiated here the launching of a 20-meter ferro-cement boat. Since then Admiral Ruiz tells me, ten vessels of different sized have been built and launched from this shipyard.

I remember that on that occasion I directed the Philippine Navy to develop a capability to design and to build boats and ships using Filipino resources. I can see that from the Flag Officer-in-Command down to the yard personnel, this order was taken literally to heart.

As your Commander-in-Chief I commend all of you for your good work and dedication. It pleases me to see that we have in the Philippine Navy men who can translate into tangible achievements our aspirations as a people. These are the men we need today not only to reform our society but to building the New Society as well.

I am, therefore, looking forward to the acceleration of the boat and shipbuilding project of the Navy. I want to stress that this project is an important component of the self-reliant defense program of the Armed Forces of the Philippines. We will continue to commit resources to this project in order to hasten transformation and the modernization of the Philippine Navy, as well as to extend assistance to the private sector consistent with our policy of replacing obsolete commercial vessels engaged in inter island and international shipping.

With the launching of these two watercraft, the Philippine Navy has proved that it has the developed capability to build some of these vessels that we need both for defense and development. I am sure that with additional facilities, it can design and build bigger ships.

The Philippine Navy, as with the other major services of the Armed Forces, has two principal roles in our national plans. Its primary task is to secure the territorial waters of our country, and its secondary, but no less important, task is to support our development effort;

Thus during the rice crisis, for instance, the ships of the Philippine Navy were used to transport rice and corn from the southern ports to Manila. The Navy is sealifting the bulk of the equipment for our national electrification program. This is not of course to mention the critical role that it played in the pacification campaigns in Mindanao.

I am already looking forward to the day when we shall be able to defend and patrol our shores with ships and vessels that our people have built. This day is not distant. From what I have seen today, I can say that we have already this capability. It is now a matter of nurturing this capability to its fullest development. This I intend to do.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Marcos, The Meaning of Bataan Today, April 9, 1974

THE MEANING OF BATAAN TODAY

BY PRESIDENT FERDINAND E. MARCOS

(Speech at the Bataan Day celebration, April 9, 1974, Mt. Samat, Bataan.)

Once again we remember Bataan, and to those of us who had lived through that stirring time, the memory of that battle is still vivid and moving. But more and more there are among us who now regard with only passing interest the great struggle on that peninsula. As to the young Filipinos who came of age long after World War II, Bataan is now only a dim echo of a lost era, perhaps no more than myth told in quiet recollection by their elders. But it would be wrong for us to forget Bataan so easily and all that it had meant to our people, all that it revealed of our countrymen, particularly the nobility of spirit that made possible defeat in victory, a paradox that was to carry us through four years of cruel enemy occupation and bitter deprivation, and eventually to make us savor the sweet fruits of victory.

One Strong Bond

The soldiers who lived through Bataan could only deplore war, the needless waste of it, the brutal violence that maimed bodies and cut down the very young, and imposed tremendous demands on human endurance. But the soldiers also marveled at the generosity of men who even as they fought to survive could turn to a comrade and give comfort, or even give up their own lives so another may live. And there was the miracle of men refusing to accept the inevitability of defeat or surrender, as the enemy forces multiplied and the enormity of their engines of war loomed with crushing effect. That we could still look to hope and victory even as we narrowed down our hold on the peninsula spoke eloquently of the infinite capacity of man's mind to soar, to break the fetters of despair and to deny death. Even as the lights went out in Bataan, and finally in the hearts of our soldiers, we had looked forward to a new dawning of light, to a new day in our country when the devastation and the killing would cease, and we could stand upright once more and begin to build, to build fresh from the ground, and not only towering temples on our land, but also shining temples in the hearts of our people. We saw the brotherhood that embodied the resistance at Bataan as the one strong bond that would make our people rise from the ruins and build a new country, a better country, a freer country, and a country that could go forward into the future moved by the purpose and will of a united and inspired people.

Symbolic Cross

This soaring stands for, the spirit that made the soldiers, the nurses all those who stood fast on this hallowed scrap of earth and gave fully of themselves, seemingly a race apart. But they were not unique, as events were later to prove, for even as Bataan and Corregidor grew silent, there was a stirring in the land, in the hills and mountains, the towns and hamlets, of our country, as Filipinos of all ages seemed, to gather strength from the surrender on this peninsula, from the pain and the agony of our troops who were herded into prison camps, to gather a tremendous and irresistible will to continue the battle. And thus spontaneously the resistance forces were born, marshalled into fighting units, and through the four perilous years that ensued, which again reenacted Bataan in every region of our country, except now we were not an isolated, hemmed-in force, but a great wave that flowed back and forth, with the majority of our people enlisted in the fight, men, women and children, all fighting together under one flag, and with one purpose — to regain our freedom and to extend it through time.

I had known many of those fighting men, the majority of them unsung heroes, and I speak as well of the women and children who helped the resistance grow, who sustained the guerrilla fighter when he was wounded, or hunted, or hungry, or sick, or friendless. I knew the heroes in Bataan who died with bright dreams on their lips; who thought of the well-being of loved ones even as they sickened in the trenches and in desolate battlefields, conjuring up a vision of a better life for their children, when the smoke and the carnage had died down, and there was time to consider the edifices of peace, time to work and plan, and to invest life in this country with the power and the glory of fighting, except that in that time, it will be a fight beyond survival, dedicated to the winning of the far frontiers of development and progress, of growth and prosperity, of a freedom that would never again succumb to greed and grief; nor to cruelty, nor to selfishness and vain glory.

A New Meaning

And it was in knowing them, and in following the gleam of their vision, that I left the narrow trail leading to my own personal search for a private place in the sun, to the larger field of public service.

I have never regretted this, and I have never regretted the decision to come to grips with the tragic turn of events that was leading our country back to the chaos and the wasteland of war. Today, as we gather here to remember that war, and particularly the turning point at Bataan, let us also remember that if Bataan had meaning then to our country, as the last bastion of freedom, Bataan today has new meaning for us, for all Filipinos, for even as we sought to survive terror and tyranny in that now distant time, Bataan today offers to the Filipinos of this decade the same indomitable will to survive, and beyond survival offers the same dream of making this land something more than just a place to find shelter in, a place that we could truly make our own by endowing it with the reality of our dreams, by giving to it the sweat of our brow, the wonders of our imagination, the achievements of our genius as a people.

A nation grows by the force of its achievements, the iron of its will to make something more than what may be seen by the eyes, to give life within its boundaries a quality that will shine in the dark and define for all time the character and worth of the people of that country. I like to think that in Bataan we had forged this kind of quality, out of the materials that Filipinos before us have provided, from the time we claimed our right to this country, through the changing centuries, through slavery and colonialism and through the first intimations of the great destiny we could make for our nation, through the wars and the yearning, the disappointments and disenchantments, the many surrenders and defeats, and the surging leap once more to possess ourselves and our future.

A Guiding Beacon

Bataan today has more meaning than at the time when we fought an invasion of an alien force, for today Bataan shines forth as the beacon to guide us through the new battles we must fight, not to throw back an enemy from without, but to conquer the enemy from within — everything that would deter us from our purpose, that would weaken our will to gain self-sufficiency, that would divide us and thus make us vulnerable to even greater defeats, that would throw us back to the old and corrosive ways that rob us of our spirit and our valor, that would make us lose faith in our own capacity for greatness, our capacity for achievement that would make us willing victims to a new kind of slavery — the slavery of ideology when that ideology runs counter to the Filipino grain. Bataan today means that we must adhere to the discipline that made the soldiers on that peninsula more than a quarter of a century ago stand up and fight, even when there was no point in holding a piece of real estate anymore.

Finally, Bataan should mean to us something of a light showing us our objective, if the objective then was to delay the enemy, the objective now is to move forward to the future. And there is greater challenge in this for the future is infinite, and winning one battle means fighting new and more battles. There is greater courage needed for we must face up not only to the odds on hand, but to the odds that we still cannot even see, and which we must have future generations of Filipinos to fight. And thus our job is to make the future generations strong enough, courageous enough, gallant enough, and motivated enough to continue to fight, and more than that, to triumph over their own formidable foes.

If we must give meaning to the Bataan that was, and give as much of ourselves to the Bataan that we face today, in the way the defenders of the peninsula gave of themselves, then we must press the gains we have already made in nation-building, particularly the gains we have made in making a new and purposeful Filipino, the Filipino of this new era who has proven beyond all doubt that he can accomplish things and conquer.

Speech of President Marcos, Cooperative Endeavor in the New Society, April 18, 1974

COOPERATIVE ENDEAVOR IN THE NEW SOCIETY

BY PRESIDENT FERDINAND E. MARCOS

(Proposed speech at the 8th annual Assembly of the Government Employees' World League, GSIS Social Hall, April 18, 1974)

It is both a pleasure and a privilege to address the general assembly of the Government Employees' World War Veterans League, Inc., an organization that has done so much for the welfare and upliftment of our war veterans and of countless other workingmen in the country.

Worthy Causes

While it is understandable that an organization like yours should concern itself primarily with the interests of its own members, it is a matter of record, and for which you should feel justifiably proud, that your League has identified itself with the worthy causes of other groups of workers in the country and has strived as earnestly and tirelessly to secure for them the same benefits that you have sought for those of your own ranks.

This is as it should be. Indeed, it is on this concept of mutual help and cooperative endeavor that the New Society has been built. The government, needless to say, is doing all it can to alleviate the ills besetting our society and to improve the general well-being. But even with its vast resources and facilities, there are many things that by itself alone our government cannot accomplish. Private enterprise and initiative must come in and share in the effort.

The full realization of our goals in the New Society is the work of generations, both in terms of time and contemporary solidarity. Every citizen — the old and the young, the rich and the poor — all are needed. Everyone has his place and his useful of the benefits of common effort.

Initiative and Enterprise

Your organization has shown exemplary initiative and enterprise by broadening the scope of its involvement to include working for the interests of other groups as deserving of attention and concern as the most deserving among you.

Aside from helping obtain government recognition for deserving guerrillas and the extension of education, employment and other benefits to war veterans, your League has sponsored for supported measures and resolutions, most of them in the former Congress of the Philippines, aimed at improving the lot of the common man.

Your association, on its initiative or hand-in-hand with others, has sought the enactment of a Labor Code and the creation of a Workers' Bank. It has proposed or supported amendment to the Social Security Act to provide employment to voluntarily unemployed workers and has had a hand in the move to set up public-defender offices and government employment agencies throughout the country.

Your League has pushed the move for a national manpower and youth development program which is now being implemented on a nationwide scale. With others, you have worked unstintedly for the unification of labor and have pursued a vigorous campaign against illegal recruitment and other labor malpractices.

In short, your League has all but completely lost its distinct identity as a strictly veteran's organization by branching out and involving itself in numerous laudable projects and drives affecting all sectors of our working class.

Unselfish Stance

This selfless and unselfish stance commends itself highly to the attention and emulation of other civic groups and organizations in the country which should concern themselves not only over ways and means of securing more benefits for their members but should think as well, if not in greater measure, in terms of the great good they could accomplish working by themselves or cooperating with others in promoting the public welfare.

In my Notes on the New Society, I made an observation which I find most apt to recall here by way of a reminder. I said that the authority of government must be brought to bear whenever the ends of the New Society — that is, the promotion of the interests of the individual and the welfare of the whole — are not being served.

On the other hand, it should be obvious that individual enterprise will play a significant role in our society, particularly in the economic field. And while it is true that the distinction between the public and private sectors is formal, since each has its particular duties to the people and their society, there is nothing that should prevent the two sectors from joining together in a common cause.

Nation Building

It is in this spirit that I commend your League for its distinctive performance, especially in those aspects of it where it has gone out of its way to work for the interests of others — initiating projects of helping in the effort to alleviate or improve the lot of our workingmen, veterans and non-veterans alike.

Your current general assembly no doubt will continue to preoccupy itself with such matters and to strive even harder to devise ways and means of further contributing effectively to the tasks of nation-building. By your own performance, you have shown that this is possible and that the ways of doing it are indeed varied and rewarding.

Urgency of Increased Production

In passing I might mention that one area in which your involvement as individuals or as a group would be most desirable at this time, is where you could add the weight of your collective influence in helping bring home to the people the urgency of increased production,

We have to redouble our efforts in this direction as a means of counteracting the inimical impact of the energy crisis which has the whole world in its grip.

We must go on producing more for local consumption and for export — to boost our foreign exchange which we need more greatly than ever to support the additional costs of importing oil and capital goods.

Global Problem

The need for greater production has become a global problem, felt in varying degrees of gravity by countries around the world. Though we are comparatively better off than most developing countries in this regard, the problems we face are no less serious and demanding — problems which we can hope to surmount only through concerted and sustained efforts.

I have called upon our local officials to rally the people behind the drive for greater production, even as I now call upon you, as leaders and leading citizens, in your respective communities, to help similarly in arousing public awareness to this great need;

These are thoughts of compelling urgency which I leave with you for your serious consideration, along with my own personal greetings and best wishes for a successful and fruitful assembly.

Thank you, and a success to your undertakings.

Speech of President Marcos, The Government as Physician, April 24, 1974

THE GOVERNMENT AS PHYSICIAN

BY PRESIDENT FERDINAND E. MARCOS

(Proposed speech at the 67th annual national convention of the Philippine Medical Association, Cebu City, April 24, 1974)

It is for me a source of special satisfaction that at its annual conventions, the Philippine Medical Association has frequently expressed both an awareness of the national condition and a willingness to get actively involved in tasks directly related to popular needs. Last year, your convention theme was, "Health Care Delivery in the New Society," Similarly motivated, with an equally large view, is the theme you have adopted for this year's convention "The Physician in the National Health Plan."

A Fresh Impetus

Expressions of collective purpose like this provide fresh impetus to the program of national action that I am pursuing. They also confirm my conviction that the responsibility for the advancement of the Filipino people is accepted by all segments of our society, and that the task of fulfilling this responsibility is not an undertaking confined to a few.

I can assure you that. I value your support highly, and that your welfare as professionals will receive the constant and reciprocal support of my administration.

Man For All Seasons

The medical profession has always stood close to the center of my concept of national progress. I will go farther than the statement of your convention theme: I will say that the physician holds a vital place not only in the national health plan but in the total national plan. I cannot conceive of a plan of government that does not give prime importance to the struggle against disease, which, along with illiteracy, has been for countless decades one of the major obstacles to national growth. The total national program is therefore a program in which the medical practitioner, the trained and dedicated physician, is a man for all seasons. His constant presence is a requisite in any program that endeavors to succeed in liberating the entire national community from ancient ills.

At the beginning of my first term, I had occasion to point out that, according to surveys I had caused to be conducted, a very high percentage of our people, especially in the rural areas, lived and died without once seeing a doctor. This report signified two facts — first, the bleakness of life among a great majority of our people at the time; and second, the scarcity, and therefore the great value, of doctors in the country. I resolved then that the undertaking to rescue the common man from age-old neglect shall be pursued relentlessly with your help and with all possible resources.

Article of Faith

It is an article of faith in my program of government that the true measure of human progress is not the Gross National Product; it is not the Balance of Payments nor the heights to which the dollar reserves soar — although these have the if own important and peculiar place. The measure, rather, is the well-being of the individual citizen, the visible state of his person. When you apply this measure, you instinctively ask: Does he have a roof over his head? A shirt on his back? Is he secure against crime or injustice? Can he read? Can he think for himself? Is he healthy?

More than anything else, is he healthy?

Almost always, when we speak of the nation's well-being, we have in mind an idealized composite of pleasant and comfortable conditions, a happy state of economic stability, of high employment, of factories in full production, of good wages and high savings.

Seldom does the literal meaning of well-being occur to us — the simple, fundamental condition of personal good health. If a government program is thoughtful; if it is cast in humane dimensions; if it is geared to people and not to abstractions and statistics, surely it must consider the basic condition of the individual man, the wholeness of his limb, the reliability of his body functions, the soundness of his tissues and glands, the precision of his heartbeat. That is the well-being that I would like to see before everything else; it is the well-being to whose attainment I hope you and the government could cooperate and support each other.

Health Needs Paramount

I appeal to you to direct your energies, as we in government have been doing, to the planning and perfection of measures which could secure to the ordinary citizen the benefits of medical progress and science, for his own sake as a human being.

I need not point out that in the past, the man in the remote town or in the barrio received a degree of medical attention, if at all, because it was politically useful, because it would bring votes to a candidate. In the society we want to create, under the program of government I am endeavoring to carry out, the health needs of our people will be answered for no other reason than that they deserve our attention and our energies as well as our knowledge and skills. We will give to every man in this country what medical science and technology can provide because he is a Filipino, because he is a member of a community of human beings, and because it is for human beings that government is established and society is organized and maintained.

Government as Physician

It is not for me to call attention to the Hippocratic Oath, since you, more than anybody else, are acquainted with its language and its substance. I do wish, however, to relate it to the image I have in mind of the government as physician to the ills of the nation. By the standard of the Hippocratic Oath, the sick man is reason enough for excellence and sacrifice on the part of the physician. No physician worth his profession, can permit a man afflicted by disease or pain to be also a victim of discrimination or neglect: it is a poor and unfortunate physician indeed who will give his best skill and knowledge only to a patient who can reward him for his ministrations. Similarly, I shall be ashamed to remain at the head of a government which will not give service for the sake of service, or a government that needs first to ascertain the rewards of work before exerting effort and expanding energy to cure the afflictions of society.

Program of Assistance

To enable you and the medical profession as a whole to help government merit provide maximum service to the common citizen, especially in those areas blighted until now by apathy and negligence, we have drawn up a program for wider distribution of hospitals around the country, to correct the long existing situation in which hospitals proliferate in a few urban areas and the rest of the country is left with virtually none. The Medicare program is being expanded so as to include, if possible, every citizen in this country. The loan program for hospitals will be reexamined closely with the end in view of supporting the initiative for greater and more intensified service among private hospitals. The compensation and incentives program under Medicare will also be reexamined, for a similar objective. You have my word that everything possible is being done, or will be done, to make stronger and more effective partnership between government and the private sector.

You may therefore consider this an invitation to the medical profession to an enduring and more effective alliance with government.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Marcos at the annual reunion of the U.P. Law Alumni Association, April 26, 1974

Speech of His Excellency
Ferdinand E. Marcos, President of the Republic of the Philippines, at the annual reunion of the U.P.
Law Alumni Association at the Social Hall of the DBP Building,
Makati Avenue, on 26 April 1974.

You have bestowed on me the most distinguished alumnus award for 1973-1974, for which I thank you most sincerely my gratification becomes more complete as I recall to mind the truism that no person was ever honored for what he received; honor has been the reward for what he gave. At the same time, I remember the story that when a high official resigned from the government to become president of a multimillion international firm, he was awarded a medal after listening to the long and glowing tribute paid him, the honoree said: "I am sorry my mother is not here. She not only would have enjoyed this ceremony, but she would have believed every word of it." It has been a year since we last broke bread together at our annual reunion. The years, I am afraid, speed by faster than many of us care to remark; but I for one do not fear the passage of time. Victor Hugo, Titan of Freedom Literature, was once called upon to comfort a friend who had arrived at his 50th birthday and was depressed at the idea of growing old. "You should rejoice, my friend," Hugo told him, "that you have escaped your forties, which are the old age of youth, and have at least arrived at the age of fifty, which is the youth of old age."

A reunion is always a time for stocktaking. If I could, I would conduct a simple experiment to distinguish two types of human nature. I would gather a throng of people and put them into a ferryboat. By the time the boat swings into the river I am sure to find that a certain proportion have taken the trouble to climb upstairs in order to be out on deck and see what is to be seen as they cross over. The rest have settled indoors, to think what they will do upon reaching the other side, or perhaps lose themselves in apathy or tobacco smoke. But leaving out those apathetic, or addicted to a single enjoyment, I would divide all the alert passengers on the boat into two classes those who are interested in crossing the river, and those who are merely interested in getting across.

As alumni of the College of Law of the University of the Philippines, all of us gathered here tonight are to be classified, not only as those merely interested in getting across, but more characteristically as those interested in crossing the river. And indeed, at this point in our national history, we are crossing the Rubicon; our people are fording the stream of national destiny. Never in our progress as a nation has the rule of law been more crucial than it is today. As your humble head of state and head of government, I must confess quite candidly that the need for the support of the U.P. Law alumni in the total development efforts of the administration, has never been greater than it is at this time.

Recently, the bestseller lists in the United States have included a book written by Joseph C. Goulden called The Superlawyers. It is about the s-called Washington lawyer who is defined as an attorney who practices before the federal government in the American capital – a man of immense expertise, influence, and wealth. The book includes a story, perhaps apocryphal, of the corporation general counsel in the midwest who asked one such superlawyer what his company should do concerning certain tax legislation. After several weeks, the Washington lawyer responded, "nothing," and enclosed a bill of $20,000. Unaccustomed to this style, the general counsel testily wrote that for $20,000 he certainly was entitled to a more complete explanation of the recommendation. He got it. "Because I said so," the Washington lawyer said in letter two, and billed the corporation for another $5, 000.

As U.P. Law alumni, many of you here tonight are the superlawyers in Philippine society, considered the best of the trial lawyers in the country. What does a trial lawyer do? A superlawyer would say that when he sits down at his office, he is confronted by a voluminous collection of facts. What he has to do is to winnow through them and find out what are most salient. He must organize them so he can understand them and put them into an orderly, logical sequence. Then he faces the burden of proving his case that is, presenting the facts as articulately and persuasively as possible, in an effort to guide those who are going to make the decision. Of course, very few lawyers receive the unusual and pressure-filled course, or go through the arduous discipline, of a trial lawyer.

I have made this digression to emphasize that the new society needs men and women who think like trial lawyers – people who can sift the facts, present them articulately, and use them to guide the people who, are the ultimate judges of our efforts. As your President, I call on your appreciation of the facts as they existed before the new society was born. Constitutional opposition, so indispensable in a democracy, was repudiated with such cynicism that I was forced to conclude that the democratic order had broken down in the Philippines even before we were confronted with the martial necessity.

The legitimate opposition found common cause with the openly unconstitutional opposition consisting of the communist revolutionaries, in no time, the legitimate opposition became illegitimate, pursuing its ends outside of the democratic political machinery.

I had learned in our alma mater that a threatened constitution provides for itself its own means of survival. And it invests the exercise of this means in the highest magistrate bound by oath to protect and defend the constitution. The commander-in-chief clause of both the 1935 and 1973 constitutions not only protects the republic from its enemies but also indisputably sanctions the martial necessity without interjecting the supremacy of the military. Since the civil authority remains supreme over the military, the civil courts continue to exercise jurisdiction over the entire legal system, unless it is over crimes against the state. The constitution, therefore, provides for its survival in the democratic manner, using the instrument which is not only legal but moral in the highest sense. It places the proclamation of martial law under the rule of law.

No less than majority leader Mike Mansfield has submitted a report to the United States Senate with this statement: “Martial Law was declared and is being administered at this time on a constitutional basis in the Philippines. The military carries out the orders but it is the president who gives them. In this respect, the principle of civilian supremacy remains in the saddle.” Indeed, the new society is anchored on a new social contract: that the political authority will establish the priorities and promote the mechanisms of equalization, but it is the entire citizenry which must provide the work and accept the sacrifices.

To insure the people’s support and therefore the eventual success of our democratic revolution, I immediately took steps to formalize the acceptance of martial law through the adoption of a new constitution which was ratified almost unanimously by the barangays on 17 January 1973. This action was questioned in a petition filed before our Supreme Court in the cases entitled Javellana vs. Executive Secretary, et al., Raising the issue of whether I had the power to call a plebiscite and whether I could proclaim the ratification of the new constitution. In so raising this issue, the petitioners (who, incidentally were liberals or political opposition leaders) raised the fundamental issue of the power of the president under a proclamation of martial law to issue decrees.

In 1971 I submitted myself to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court – in the case of Lansang vs. Garcia on the question of the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. In 1973 I again submitted myself to that jurisdiction – for the Javellana case raised the question of the legitimacy of the entire government. Additionally, I proposed to meet the insistent suggestion that, in the event of an adverse decision, I would proclaim a revolutionary government or set up a dictatorship. For who is the dictator who would submit himself to a higher body like the Supreme Court on the question of constitutionality or validity of his actions?

Even more to the point, I wanted to emphasize that the revolution which I was leading was a constitutional revolution. It was constitutional in the sense that it did not depart from the strictures or limitations of the old and the new constitutions. The Supreme Court upheld our position in its decision of 31 March 1973, ruling that there was no further judicial obstacle to the new constitution being considered in force and effect.

We therefore now have a basis for the formalization of the political base of the new society. We also have the foundation of the legal structure of this society. We pursue a course relying on the political will, which makes political reforms imperative. Constitutionalism remains the basis of the present government constitutionalism that reaches down to the humblest level of the citizenry.

Tonight I make this assessment, that the gains in the political reorganization of our society have been substantial, but I would not call them satisfactory. We have tamed the old political habits, the old alliances between oligarchs and their political retainers; now we must uproot them. Only those succumb to backsliding who have lost their old privileges and thus miss their failing dominance.

To my fellow alumni, I appeal for a renewed sense of loyalty to the rule of law under the new society. We are engaged, more than anything else, in a crucial experiment for survival. We talk of a development program but it is the moral development of our race which is ultimately at stake. And I would recall to you that the law is the external deposit of our moral life; in the immortal words of the great justice Holmes "The life of the law has not been logic; it has been experience." What more momentous experience can a nation undergo than to pass the crucible of constitutionalism and emerge tempered and poised for the cataclysmic task of national construction.

For the U.P. alumni who are devoted to the law – let us consecrate ourselves to the thought that the law has honored us, and may we honor it.

Address of President Marcos on the occasion of Labor Day Celebration, May 1, 1974

LABOR – OUR GREATEST WEAPON

BY THE PRESIDENT FERDINAND E. MARCOS

(Address on the occasion of Labor Day Celebration, Maharlika Hall, Malacañang, May 1, 1974.)

Mga kapatid kong manggagawa:

Ibinalita sa akin na ang pagtitipong ito sa bulwagang Maharlika ng Malakanyang ay ikakalat ng radyo at telebisyon sa buong bansa — sa Luzon, Bisayas at Mindanao. Salamat naman sapagka't sa pamamagitan nito ay ating maipahahatid and ating taos-pusong pagbati sa baw't manggagawang Pilipino sa muling pagsapit ng Labor Day. Itinuturing kong isang banal na tungkulin ang makipagpulong sa bayang manggagawa sa araw na ito — sa mahigit na labingtatlong milyong Pilipinong siyang bumabalikat sa kabuhayan nating lahat at siyang pumapasan sa madlang pananagutang pangkabuhayan at panglipunan sa ating bansa.

Dinaramdam kong iilan lamang ang maaaring makarating dito sa bulwagan ng Malakanyang. Ang napipisan dito sa kasalukuyan ay ang mga lider obrero na galing sa buong bansa. Napansin ko si kasamang Bert Oca, na siyang pangulo ng Pinagbuklod na Manggagawang Pilipino, na ngayon ay isa nang jobless ex-delegate sa Concon. Narinig ninyo si Johnny Tan sa kanyang pagbasa ng Labor Day Manifesto. Nakikita ko rin sina ex-Justice Rafael, Ignacio Lacsina, Felixberto Olalia, na may ilang panahong naging panauhin ni Secretary Enrile sa Camp Crame — datapwa't ngayon ay masugid na tagataguyod ng Bagong Lipunan. Nariyan si Democrito Mendoza, na siyang bagong Lapu-Lapu ng kilusang manggagawa sa Bisayas at Mindanao, nadiumano ay kasalukuyang lumulusob sa Luzon. Hindi ko nakikita si Dong Panong — ang kapatid na Cippiano Cid, na siyang tunay na kahalili ni Isabelo de los Reyes palibhasa'y Ilukano rin; balita ko'y maysakit at kami ng First Lady ay nakikiramay. At para kung nakita na bakante ang isang silya ditosa Presidential table — na siyang dapat maging luklukan ng kaibigang Pedro Fernandez na kasalukuyang nakaburo sa Funeraria Paz. Biglang nalugmok na lamang samantalang nangungulo sa isang kumperensiya para sa pagkakaisa ng kilusang manggagawa — isang dakilang kaibigan at gabay ng kilusan.

Napansin ko rin ang mga kinatawan ng mga unyon sa sugar industry: Zoilo de la Cruz, ng NACUSIP sa Negros at Panay at Ric Alconga, sa Gitnang Luzon. Di ko na kailangang ulitin ang mga pangalan nina Ancheta, Padilla, Suansing, at Arniego. Wala akong natatandaang Labor Day na hindi si Arniego ang tagapagpakilala — sapol ng unang ipagdiwang ang Labor Day sa Pilipinas buong panahon pa ni Isabelo de los Reyes.

Maging ang Muslim Mindanao ay may kinatawan — namasdan ko si Datu Blah Sinsuat ng Kotabato, Alam ninyo, si Datu Blah ay nagdala ng apat na pu't pitong mananayaw at mangangantang Muslim upang maghandog ng kanilang awit at sayaw sa amin ni Ginang Marcos, sa aming kaarawan; ang hirap ay napakaliit ng ispasyo dito sa Malakanyang, kaya't baka diyan sila mataboy sa grandstand sa Luneta, Gayon pa man ay lubos ang aking pasasalamat sa kagandahang-loob na iyan ng ating mga kapatid na Muslim sa Mindanao.

At nabanggit na rin lamang ay marahil dapat ko nang aminin na ngayon ay anibersaryo ng aming pag-iisang dibdib ng First Lady — ika-dalwampung kaarawan o ang tinatawag na “porcelain anniversary.” Ayoko sanang aminin na ito ay ikadalawampu na, sapagka't baka mahalata ang tunay na gulang namin ng Unang Ginang. Maniniwala ba kayong ang First Lady ay mayroon nang apat na pung taong gulang? Kung masdan ko, lalo na sa araw na ito, para bang hindi nagbago, bagkus ay lalo pang gumanda, buhat nang kami ay ikasal. At ako naman — kamakailan lamangay sinabi ng Time magazine. “The President of the Philippines is without doubt the most athletic chief of state in the whole world.” Naniniwala ba kayo rian? SI First Lady ay naniniwala rian, bagaman hindi gaanong lubos ang kanyang paniwala sa Time Magazine.

Tinatanggap ko ang paratang na iyon ng Time. Ang dahilan ay sapagka't nang ipasiya kong maglingkod nang puspusan sa ating bayan, ay itinalaga ko ang aking sarili na kung ako ang magiging instrumento ng aking bayan upang isakatuparan ang kanyang mga layunin, dapati namang ang instrumentong iyan ay manatiling laging matalim(hindi mapurol) malakas, at laging handa sa anumang hamon o kalagayan. Sa isang dako, ang Panguluhan ay maaaring iwangki sa obrero. We both deal with conflict and tensions as a matter of daily occupational hazard. The Presidency has been described in fact as a permanent crisis; and the mastering of crisis is above all, a matter of self-mastery, — or self-discipline.

Martial Law and Unionism

The whole world by now knows that in the Philippines, martial law has developed into a unique form of government which combines firmness with compassion, order with justice, and force with equality. One of the great manifestations of this uniqueness is to be found in the field of labor relations. For the Philippines is probably the only country under martial law where trade unionism and collective bargaining go on freely and are encouraged and promoted by the State within the framework of voluntary or compulsory arbitration, and where all labor laws continue in their normal operation and effect. In several countries under martial law, free trade unionism is simply forbidden or is violently suppressed.

But under the New Society, we have guaranteed the right of the workers to self-organization and to free collective bargaining. In fact, more unions have been organized and more collective bargaining agreements have been signed under the New Society than in any comparable period in the past. Through their unions and their collective bargaining agreements, our workers are truly major participants in development — in its tasks and responsibilities as well as in its rewards.

7,000 Workers Reinstated

Through the National Labor Relations Commission, which I created under Presidential Decree 21 on October 14, 1973, we have not only maintained a dynamic system of free trade unionism and collective bargaining under the New Society.

We have also decided 8,531 labor disputes, resulting in benefits to 70,441 workers in the form of increases in wages and other terms and conditions of employment, separation pay, overtime pay, and other monetary claims arising from employer-employee relations. We have also caused the reinstatement of 7,189 workers considered illegal or unfairly dismissed by their employers.

From September 1970 to September 1972, only onset and certification elections were held. From September 21, 1972 up to the present, under the New Society, a total of 179 consent and certification elections were held, resulting in the recognition of 179 unions as new collective bargaining agents.

More CBA's

From September 1972, under the Old Society, only 425 collective bargaining agreements were concluded. From September 21, 1972 to the present or a period of one year and eight months, a total of 1,762 collective bargaining agreements were entered into by labor and management, each providing terms and conditions better than those signed under the old Society.

The National Labor Relations Commission in the Regional Offices of the Department of Labor, aided by Field inspection, has caused the payment of ₱7,945,229 to 17,758 workers under the New Society. In the Old Society, only ₱183,734 was restituted to workers during a comparable period.

Total workmen's compensation awarded under the New Society added up to ₱83,520,171, compared with only ₱54,198,419 during a comparable pre-martial law period, benefitting a total of 34,633 workers, many of whom were disabled by industrial accidents.

Because of the energy crisis and the global inflation it has set off, real wages in our country, as in the rest of the world, have suffered. Responding to the situation, I have ordered the payment of emergency allowances to all government workers earning ₱600 or less under Presidential Decree 390. I have also called upon all employers in the private sector to grant emergency allowances to their workers. The response of the private sector to my appeal has been encouraging; I like to hope that the momentum of compliance will be sustained.

Emergency Allowances

To date, since the promulgation of the appeal on February 18, 1974, in the form of Letter of Instructions 174, a total of 18,166 enterprises have already paid ₱37 million in emergency allowances to some 800,000 workers in all industries. Considering that there are an estimated 55,000 enterprises employing five or more workers all over the country, we shall expect more substantial compliance by the time of the next reporting deadline on May 7.

These emergency allowances, no matter how modest, constitute a vital investment in social stability and national solidarity. I therefore strongly urge all the capable employers to extend this aid to their workers as soon as possible.

More and Speedier Benefits

Early under the New Society, I ordered the implementation of the new minimum wages in the sugar industry — ₱11 for non-agricultural and ₱6, ₱7, or ₱8 for agricultural workers. The minimum wages in the sugar industry were further improved through the “pakiao” rates voluntarily established by workers and employers at the initiative of the Department of Labor.

Through the GSIS, the SSS, and Medicare, we have provided new medical, death, burial, survivor and housing benefits for the workers. On the other hand, I have raised today the maximum worker’s compensation benefits from ₱6,000 to ₱12,000. Moreover, as a result of the integration of workmen’s compensation security, to be administered by the GSIS in the government sector and by the SSS in the private sector, workmen’s compensation benefit shall now be paid speedily and on time to victims of work-connected injury and death.

We have provided jobs for our people not only in our new and expanding industries and but also in the world labor market. During the past year and eight months, we have provided employment to 60,000 Filipino workers overseas. Filipino talents and skills are becoming ubiquitous in many parts of the world. In 1973 alone Filipino workers abroad remitted an estimated 100 million dollars through our banking system. Returning Filipino workers have helped improve our skills and technological standards.

At the same time we have expanded and reinforced our training program under the National Manpower and Youth Council, the Bureau of Apprenticeship and the regular educational system, thus raising significantly the employability of our workers.

The Poor and the Rich

Today is Labor Day throughout the world, and the theme of many marches and parades is the great gulf between the poor and the rich. But not too many have remarked the great gulf of division and injustice between the rich countries and the poor countries. The workers in the rich countries are likely to be rich; the workers in the poor countries are likely to be poor. If the American worker earns twenty times the wage of the Filipino worker, the Japanese worker perhaps fifteen times, and the Taiwanese or South Korean worker three times his wage, the reason is not to be found in the shortcomings or deficiencies of governmental protection or in the militancy of trade unions, but in the level of development that has been attained and in the basic character of the labor market — whether it is in a state of scarcity or surplus.

Labor Supply and Demand

I do not want to disparage the efforts of the Government as well as the efforts of trade unions. Your own contributions to social justice are fundamental and irreplaceable. And so are those of the Government through the Department of Labor. But there is also merit to the accusation frequently heard that unions are insensitive to the plight of the unemployed. I do not want to believe that you are insensitive to the unemployment problem, because if you are, then this is a very myopic view. For so long as we have not overcome our chronic unemployment and underemployment, the presence of a large reserve of unskilled labor available at cheap prices will always act as a pressure to depress wages and working conditions, no matter how much protection the government may extend to workers by law, and no matter how militant the struggles of trade unions might be. For the price of labor is in the end subject to market determination, too, — to what we call the law of supply and demand.

Employment Program

The Government therefore has embarked resolutely on a national government program which is at the same time strongly employment-oriented. The fruition of development efforts especially in terms of employment requires gestation periods of longer or shorter duration. But we are at least sure that we have at last taken a basic direction which will provide the results we want — a direction which we hope by the end of this decade will change the character of our labor market from a surplus to a scarcity of unskilled labor.

With the mopping up of our labor surplus, the real wages of our workers and the real incomes of our people as a whole will go up dramatically in an irreversible manner. Only then can we reverse the spiral of unemployment and low wages into a spiral of prosperity. Only then can trade unions realize those conditions and that climate where their own influence in national affairs will increase — in direct proportion to the development of the country.

This point is so important that I feel I must refresh your memory about the statement I made before you on the last Labor Day last year. I said then that “unemployment is the real exploitation of labor.” I am glad to learn that the Conference of Asian Labor Ministers held in Tokyo from October 1 to 3, 1973, built its final communiqué around this theme. It said: “Unemployment” is the greatest exploiter of labor and the greatest threat to peace and prosperity.” And the report of the International Labor Organization/UNDP Comprehensive Employment Strategy Mission, which for short we call the Ranis Report, after the name of its leader, stated, and I quote : “In practical terms, this means that our basic strategy must be directed towards a sustained increase in the incomes of the working families of the Philippines, an objective which can be accomplished only by mopping up, as quickly as possible, the unemployed and underemployed labor force. In other words, we fully agree with those who have called unemployment the worst exploitation of the working man.”

The Ranis Report

Now, the Ranis Report as you know is the product of intensive study by a 30-man task force of social scientists that came here from several countries and distinguished international institutions at my request. The ILO sent them and the UNDP financed their study. The mission conferred with responsible Filipino leaders in all fields — government, labor and management. Their study is the first major systematic assessment of our economy since the Bell Report and it sketches for our consideration policy strategies for the solution of unemployment and the improvement of the lives of our workers.

The major recommendations of the study happen to jibe with some of the major policy decisions that we have already made under the New Society the mobilization of the rural hinterland through small-scale and medium-scale industries, and the reorientation of our industry from import substitution to labor-intensive industrial exports.

I want on this occasion to thank the ILO and the UNDP for this valuable service to our country. I am glad to see that the director general of the NEDA, Dr. Gerardo Sicat, is here. He, together with the Secretary of Labor, was the focal point of the Ranis Mission in the Philippine Government. This Report is still considered classified. But now, at this moment, I order it declassified. I want it disseminated to all the organizations of workers and employers, as well as the policy-makers of the Government, so that it can be exposed to a thorough scrutiny and debate and so that by this means the concrete strategies of development and employment which all sides can support, will crystallize.

(At this point, the President may hold up the 2-volume Ranis report for the TV audience; he can ask Secretaries Ople and Sicat to step forward and receive the Report.)

The Labor Code

At the onset of the New Society, I made it clear that all priorities must be reviewed in terms of development. Thus, in the first Cabinet meeting after the proclamation of martial law, I directed the Secretary of Labor to accelerate the codification of all labor laws to the end that they will be attuned to the demands of development and the promotion of employment. I directed him to consult with all the responsible men in labor, management and the Government; to purge labor laws of historic biases against employment and development; to streamline the administration of labor relations to make it more positive, more efficient as well as more just.

I recall that the National Tripartite Congress of 1973, representing labor, management and the Government, took up this challenge and evolved a draft Labor Code which you submitted to me on the last Labor Day. I have followed the debates on the code which continued throughout the year. I am glad that not only the workers' organizations, but also the various employer organizations, the NEDA and the Board of Investments have, endorsed this code. Since all endorse it must be either a work of wisdom or harmless work. I prefer to believe that it is the former.

Since the Code provides for a six-month transition period, there will be enough time and scope, I believe, for proper adjustments to be made, in any event, we shall, where necessary, cause amendments to be made to strengthen what experience will reveal as the weaknesses of any part of the Code. The code in fact introduces fundamental reform seeking to reorient labor laws towards the promotion of development, employment, enforceability and industrial peace based on justice.

What are some of these reforms?

Anti-Graft Precautions

The Labor Code of the Philippines reorient labor laws towards development:

- a) By purging labor laws of built-in leverages for graft on the part of labor enforcers and fly night labor leaders;
- b) By removing archaic and unworkable provisions of labor laws, and;
- c) By eliminating the permit system in labor administration without impairing the substantive rights and privileges and the umbrella of protection assured by law to the workers.

Permanent NLRC

Second, the Labor Code of the Philippines institutionalizes the National Labor Relations Commission established under Presidential Decree No. 21 in place of the old, discredited Court of Industrial Relations. Composed of one representative of the government who shall act as chairman and two representatives of labor and two representatives of management as members, the National Labor Relations Commission is attached to the Department of Labor rather than to the judiciary to make possible the speedy settlement of labor disputes unimpeded by legal and judicial technicalities, and to give the President of the Philippines a free hand in the direction and control of the labor relations machinery under the New Society. Procedures under the National Labor Relations Commission shall be non-technical, but they shall assure due process; hence, the guaranty of swift justice for all.

Transforms Workmen's Compensation

Third, the Labor Code of the Philippines abolished the present workmen's compensation system, which has become graft-ridden and unworkable, and integrates workmen's compensation benefits into the social security system to be administered by the SSS for the private sector and by the GSIS for the public sector. The integration of workmen's compensation benefits into the social security system will save the government at least P28, 000,000 a year in dubious workmen's compensation claims facilitate the prompt payment of benefits, assure payment of the meaningful compensation, save the government ₱12,000,000 in administrative expenses a year, and establish a new, major source of fund for economic and social development.

Overseas Employment Development

Fourth, the Labor Code of the Philippines establishes an overseas Employment Development Board and a National Seamen Board which shall undertake the systematic employment of Filipinos overseas and optimize the national benefits therefrom in the form of dollar remittances and improved skills and technology for our people. At the same time, the establishment of the Overseas Employment Development Board and the National Seamen Board in the Department of Labor shall mean the liberation of Filipinos seeking work here and abroad from graft, abuse and exploitation.

Government Corporations under Civil Service

Fifth, the Labor Code of the Philippines implements the provision of the New Constitution placing employees of government-owned and controlled corporations under the Civil Service Commission and mandating the National Assembly to standardize their salaries. The terms and conditions of employment in government owned and controlled corporations shall henceforth be fixed by law rather than left to the free, dislocating play of collective bargaining forces

Restructing Labor

Sixth, the Labor Code of the Philippines will eliminate the wasteful, and energy sapping anarchy and opportunism in the Philippine movement by restructuring and uniting by region and by industry. The immediate goal is to eliminate inter-union and intra-union rivalries and Old Society union politics which made unionism in the past an obstruction rather than an act of development.

Seventh, the Labor Code also embodies the Presidential Decree 27 which emancipates the tenant from the bondage of the soil and as laborer.

These features of the Labor Code demonstrate the truth of the claim that the labor laws have been revised to make them more responsive to development as well as to social justice.

I am therefore glad to sign in your presence this Labor Code of the Philippines into law and ask that you fully support its implementation.

(SIGNING CEREMONY)

In a world marked by sudden changes and growing uncertainty in the economic and political fields, amidst a ravaging inflation, the best defense any nation can have is to sustain its productive capacity and if possible increase its productive thrust. This is a challenge to management, but an even greater challenge to labor.

God has endowed us with rich natural resources, but our main blessing does not consist in that. It consists of our human resources. As the Ranis Report points out: "South Korea and Taiwan (and to some extent Colombia, Brazil and Pakistan) have utilized the combination of an entrepreneurial group, emerging via the import substitution maturation process, with an unskilled but high quality labor force, to initiate major industrial export drives.

Compared to her present potential rivals in this part of the world, the Philippines has substantial advantage in terms of both indigenous entrepreneurial capacity and the existence of a highly literate, high quality labor force. It is an advantage which is, however likely to erode.

As you can see, this strategic moment has arrived for us to employ to the fullest extent the greatest weapon that we possess and the competitive edge that we enjoy in the world economy — the highly literate and high quality Filipino labor force. With this we shall effect a major shift in our exports from land-based products to labor-based products. With this, we shall generate a massive industrialization of our countryside. With this we will achieve in less than a decade those conditions that will enable the Filipino worker to rise to the level of the most affluent workers in Southeast Asia.

A Charter of Rights and Obligations

I pledge to you that with your support, this aim will be realized. And I pledge to you that even as we accelerate our economic strides, even as enlarge steadily the size of our Gross National Product this growth will be the growth of the laboring man and the family — we shall see to it that growth will always be tempered by justice and development will always be weighed in the scales of the dignity of man. An earnest of this pledge is the Labor Code that I have just signed. Let it be accepted as a charter of human rights as well as a bill of obligations for every working man.

Proposed speech at the inauguration of the Population Center Foundation Building, South Superhiway, June 11, 1974

POPULATION GROWTH: A MATTER OF GRAVE CONCERN

BY PRESIDENT FERDINAND E. MARCOS

(Proposed speech at the inauguration of the Population Center Foundation Building,
South Superhighway, June 11, 1974)

About two years ago, on April 21, 1972 to be precise, we gathered around these very same grounds to lay the cornerstone of this magnificent building. Today, we celebrate its completion and the start of the foundation's population program. There is much to be proud of and thankful for. To those who have worked for the completion of this building, my congratulations. And to those who have assisted us, my sincere gratitude.

Rapid Population Growth Cancels Gains

On an occasion such as this, I feel it is appropriate if not necessary restate the vital issues that stem from the problems of growth and national development, the policies and the direction we must pursue to overcome the pressures and strains of a rapid population growth rate.

We cannot overemphasize the fact that our rapid population growth erodes the economic gains we have painstakingly worked for and earned. Attrition of our economic and social growth will continue unless effective and appropriate measures to control population growth are instituted and made an integral part of national planning and development.

The problem that faces us is the problem of inadequate resources coupled with the uncontrolled increase in the number of consumers of these resources. We can do either or all of three things first, improve technology; second, improve land utilization or, if possible, increase the land area; and third, decelerate population growth.

We are in fact doing all these things. Through technology we are improving the productivity of both agriculture and industry. Through more rational land policies, we intend to make better and more efficient use of our land. And of course through this foundation and the Population Commission we are engaged in a massive effort to arrest our population growth.

Social and Political Pressures

But it is not sufficient to say that population growth merely strains our economic growth. It is productive of other social and political pressures that threaten the social well-being of our people. It is for these reasons that I have always regarded our national population program with deep concern.

The Context of our Population Policy

However, in the pursuit of solutions to our population problems, I have always stressed that these problems should be perceived in the context of our own necessities, resources, culture and socio-political structure. Whatever may be said of population problems of other developing countries, particularly of developed countries may not always be true of our country. It is essential that we adopt strategies that are relevant to the traditions and ways of our people. This delicate and personal problem is deeply rooted in tradition and culture and requires measures that recognize and respect the beliefs and convictions of our people. Thus, we have and will continue to adopt a non-coercive policy. And I enjoin all concerned in our program, those in the government, private and religious sectors of our society to uphold and safeguard this fundamental policy. It is the Filipino way. I take this opportunity to dispel all fears, if there are any, that this program will in anyway enroach on the individual's right of freedom of choice and self-determination.

Effective Integration

I have also pointed out that the approach to our population problem should be a total approach. An approach that considers all factors germane to it. Consequently, we must continue to integrate population and family planning into all our development programs: education, health, labor, community development, agriculture, welfare and above all in national planning. Only through a process of effective integration can we expect to achieve a sustained and comprehensive effort that will yield meaningful gains. The problem of population cannot be viewed in isolation of other problems. It is essentially related to development, to human development and all its facets.

The Role of the Private Sector

Corollary to this, no one institution alone or even government itself can provide sufficiently are effective measures. There must be the total involvement of everyone. And I am pleased to see the private sector take up this challenge. The Population Center Foundation, a private institution, is pledged to support a more vigorous and expanded participation of the private sector, it is precisely this type of cooperation and working relationship that government seeks of the private sector in its effort to attain national prosperity.

To Reach the Barrios

Finally, a reassessment of our performance shows quite clearly that we must redouble our efforts to increase the outreach of our family planning services. We must zero in on the youth and on young couples.

It seems that the conventional methods of providing family planning services must be augmented by more practical and effective delivery systems. Despite the fact that we have established 2,500 family planning clinics, I felt it was necessary to authorize through Presidential Decree 79 paramedics to provide the family planning services that have heretofore been furnished by doctors. The barrios must be reached. Since most of our doctors are found in urban centers we must field paramedics to the barrios where the need for these services is critical.

A simultaneous and equivalent effort to inform and educate our people is a sine qua non of effective family planning practice. Unless we enlighten and educate our people in the need and benefits of family planning, our efforts, in the main, will fall on barren ground.

A Grave Responsibility

These are the directions we must pursue with vigor and determination. The responsibility is grave and it rests on everyone. Again, I wish to congratulate the Population Center Foundation for its pioneering work in mobilizing the participation of the citizenry. I also wish to thank all those who helped us in one way or the other to make this foundation a reality. On my part, I shall match the foundation's efforts to improve the quality of life of our people with equal concern and zeal.

Good day and thank you.

Address of Ambassador Carlos P. Romulo in the celebration of the First Anniversary of the Philippine Independence Day-Banquet and Ball held by the Filipino Community of the City of New York, July 4, 1947

Address
of
Ambassador Carlos P. Romulo
Permanent Representative of the Philippines to the United Nations
In the celebration of the First Anniversary of the Philippine Independence Day-Banquet and Ball held by the Filipino Community of the City of New York

[Delivered at Waldorf-Astoria, July 4, 1947]

The anniversary we observe today is a two-fold one: it is in a manner of speaking, both a birthday and a wedding anniversary. The self-same hour that witnessed the glorious birth of the Republic of the Philippines witnessed also the solemn ritual of our people's indissoluble union with liberty.

This also is a double anniversary. It sheds its benign light with equal splendor on the American people and the Filipino people. It symbolizes their single victorious purpose in war as well as their resolute common purpose in peace. It holds for both the same joyous memory of fulfillment and the same inescapable challenge to vision and enterprise.

Anniversaries are for looking backward. They are for taking stock of the things we have done as well as of the things we have left undone, and we pause in our endeavors in order that we may measure our achievement by the yardstick of our original purpose.

But anniversaries are also for looking forward. They are for fixing the vision anew on the goal that lies ahead, and we pause in order that we may measure the distance we have to travel by the yardstick of our collective will.

I emphasize the sober mood of inventory far more than I do the inebriate sense of simple rejoicing and glory, and for a good reason. This, after all, is for the American people the one hundred and seventy-first anniversary of their independence, while it is only the first anniversary of our own. Americans can look back upon many long years of consistent and fruitful endeavor in freedom, and they can afford to rest, as it were, upon the laurels of wealth and power they have won. We, on the other hand, have many long years of travel ahead of us, and we can ill afford to be distracted from our labors by any emotional excursions empty of content.

In observing this Fourth of July, we Filipinos have this significant advantage: that for our generation independence is much more than a mere memory hallowed by tradition and custom; it is, instead, a precious experience which we have lived and shared, and therefore a powerful source of direct encouragement and inspiration. Not by rote nor by the testimony of historians do we know that this indeed was the hour of our freedom, but rather by the personal knowledge of the vision we have pursued, the sacrifice we have borne, and the suffering we have endured. For us "the rockets' red glare" and "the bombs bursting in air" are matters of first-hand experience denoting Bataan and Corregidor, Leyte and Lingayen; and when we sing of beholding the radiance and feeling the throb of "glorious liberty," we know that the words have reference to something our own eyes have seen and our own hearts have felt. The quickened pulsation of the blood tells us better than any twice-told story of heroism the true meaning of independence.

In the mood of inventory to which I have already referred, I propose now to examine the true meaning which independence should hold for our people. I would say, first of all, that independence has become for the Filipino people an opportunity rather than a privilege, and that it implies moral obligations more than it assures juridical rights. While independence may appear to be a privilege to those who do not possess it, it is an opportunity to those who do. And those who do possess it shall make nothing of it until they realize that independence has positive value not as an end in itself but as a source of imperative moral duty.

In its narrowest sense, independence means living by one's own effort. However, in the world as we know it, independence of this sort is neither possible nor desirable. It is not possible for any nation, however rich or powerful, to live by itself alone, nor is it desirable that it should be so even if it could. It is an ancient tenet of religion that all men are brothers; it is an equally self-evident truth of modern science that all nations are neighbors. Yet neither religious tenet nor scientific truth has cancelled the essential merit of the ideal of independence: that every nation, like every man, must strive for a certain measure of freedom by being self-sufficient in the primary essentials of life, secure in the conditions of peace and order which make life supportable, and rich in the attributes of respect and dignity which make life worth living.

Measured by these tests, our young Republic may be said to have made remarkable progress in the brief span of one year. Rising from the wreckage of a destructive war, our people have wrestled with the problems of political reorganization, economic reconstruction, and social regeneration with high resolve and enthusiasm. The Government of the Republic is functioning on a sound constitutional basis. The will of the people continues to be expressed in periodic elections as provided by law. The basic civil liberties which are guaranteed to the citizen by the Bill of Rights are meticulously respected by the agencies of the State and by the courts. Freedom of speech, of the press, and of assembly remains unimpaired and is in fact upheld by the government under conditions which might have induced a less enlightened leadership to establish restrictive regulations or even punitive measures in the ostensible interest of peace and order. For the first time in nearly two decades there is in the Philippines today a real party of the opposition whose existence is generally recognized to be essential to any genuine form of representative government.

In the field of economic reconstruction, the most encouraging sign is to be found in the upward trend of productive enterprise. An impending rice famine has been averted by increased production of this staple cereal supplemented by imports from Siam and the United States. The production of copra has risen to pre-war levels, while the production of abaca, or Manila hemp, is now sixty per cent of the pre-war output. Crop loans to private producers and government-owned corporations devoted to the encouragement of the production of cereals and of the principal export commodities, including sugar, are certain to bring about a more speedy restoration of the national economy than was at first anticipated.

American financial and material assistance has been assured and is now being extended in accordance with the Philippine Trade Act and the Philippine Rehabilitation Act. This has made possible the initiation of a large-scale program of public works construction, including public buildings, schools and hospitals, railways, roads and bridges, post and telegraph offices, harbors and air navigation facilities, our weather observation and lighthouse service. Furthermore, our Government is now ready to resume the program of light industrialization which was rudely interrupted and set back by the war, including the reopening and expansion of cement and textile factories, sugar and oil mills and refineries, lumber mills and fertilizer plants, and the development of water power. The acquisition of surplus property worth half a billion dollars has greatly facilitated the restoration of essential public services. In addition, the discussion of the Japanese reparations program has advanced to such a stage that the Philippines may soon confidently expect the transfer from Japan of a number of important industrial plants and equipment.

The entry of foreign investment capital, especially American capital, and the extension of American technological assistance are also assured under these enactments. At the same time, our Government, by establishing the Rehabilitation Finance Corporation and by assisting other banks and credit institutions, is giving every encouragement to Filipino citizens to apply their skills and talents to the exploitation of the country's natural resources.

The Philippine Government has secured budgetary loans from the United States which were needed to help tide the country over the current period of financial stringency. There are two things worth noting about these loans: first, that the state of utter economic prostration in which the Philippines found itself at the end of the war would have necessitated such loans whether the country were independent or not; and second, that the economic potentialities of the Philippines are such that these loans will be repaid as soon as the productive capacities of the nation can function normally and the system of tax collection is restored and reorganized. The United States has extended loans and outright gifts to various countries of the world, and I believe that Americans will agree with us when we say, quite candidly, that no country is better entitled to such assistance than the Philippines. At the same time, we also dare to affirm that few among these beneficiary states are in a better position to pay for every cent received than the Philippines. We wish to reassure the American people that these loans are gilt-edged investments guaranteed by collateral of the soundest character. The Filipino people, furthermore, consider them as investments in good will that will be repaid in full, with substantial interest, in kind. It is only necessary to add that the Philippines should be given sufficient time to settle these obligations—an extension of from three to five years, perhaps, to allow for the rehabilitation of productive enterprise.

The upward trend of the cost of living, which is a post-war economic malady not confined to severely devastated countries like the Philippines, has not only been arrested but shows encouraging signs of leveling down. Increased production will hasten this process. In the meantime, the Government has sought to relieve the tense agrarian situation by the enactment of a new Tenancy Law providing for the unprecedented 70–30 crop-sharing plan; that is, 70 per cent for the tenant and 30 per cent for the landlord. The Government has also launched a new attack on the agrarian problem by purchasing private landed estates for redistribution to the farmers and by reviving the pre-war program of establishing agricultural settlements in new areas. In the field of labor-management relations, the Government has prevented or cut short several major strikes through mediation and arbitration by the Court of Industrial Relations, while at the same time permitting the growth of a labor movement that is more extensive and more vigorous than any existing in the Philippines before the war.

Despite its difficult financial position, the Philippine Government has accomplished prodigious feats of social regeneration. It has provided schooling for a greater number of Filipino children than before the war. It has distributed relief to the needy from UNRRA supplies and other foreign sources as well as from voluntary domestic contributions. It has reopened hospitals and public dispensaries throughout the country. It has approved a Veterans Bill of Rights under which a Veterans Board has been created to administer pensions, educational benefits, and hospital facilities to veterans, war widows and orphans. By persistent and effective representations to the American people and government, the administration has secured appropriate recognition and reward for our valiant guerrilla fighters, and stands an excellent chance of obtaining similar concessions for Filipino veterans of the USAFFE.

In reciting the efforts and achievements of the Government of the Republic during the first year of its existence, it is not my intention to ignore the shortcomings and difficulties, the entire complex of the multitudinous problems which continue to plague our people and Government today. There are serious problems of criminality and gangsterism, of graft and black marketeering, of shortages and inflation, of unemployment and low wages, of disease and deteriorating public health, of agrarian unrest and military operations against armed dissidents, of slow-moving treason trials and of insufficient faith in government. Though I will not attempt to gloss over these matters, I feel bound to declare that most of these criticisms are made in deliberate disregard of the facts which condition the existing situation. Foreign critics, but especially American critics, speak of the situation in the Philippines as if the country was not twice ravaged and laid waste in the space of four years, as if the Filipino people were unscathed by the ruthless acts of a brutal occupation, indeed, as if the war that despoiled our country and people had been solely of our own making and responsibility. A sense of proportion would seem to dictate that conditions in the Philippines be viewed in the proper perspective and that the faults of government be considered against the background of the almost total collapse and disorganization of Philippine life as the result of war. Without condoning instances of corruption or incompetence, such an attitude would give praise or blame as the facts require. Judgment would be tempered by sympathetic understanding, and a sick nation, no more than a sick man, would not be required to give a performance equal to that of one which is hale and sound.

The inadequacies of Philippine life today are not peculiar to the Philippines. Most countries have them in a greater or lesser degree, including those that suffered no direct physical or moral damage from the war. There is hardly any criticism now being leveled at the Philippines which cannot, with equal justice, be leveled also at the City of Chicago or the States of Mississippi or Missouri or South Carolina, and this latter without the partial justification which exists in the case of the Philippines. Furthermore, our critics would most certainly have a much sounder basis for judging the conditions in the Philippines today if they were to read up on the history of other countries—like the United States, for instance, on July 4, 1777—one year after their independence. They will find that the picture was nowhere pretty at any time—certainly not of the United States where there also was great insecurity of life and property and where there was a movement supported by respectable people to replace the Republic with a monarchy and make George Washington a king.

It is not my purpose to excuse the faults of our Government by citing the faults of another. My purpose rather is to show that we Filipinos are ourselves sharply aware of these deficiencies, and that our frank recognition of their existence is in itself a beneficent act of conscience which constitutes the first step in the process of healing. We know these shortcomings to exist, we do not avert our eyes from them, nor do we wish to conceal them from the eyes of others. We are confident that the conscience of the nation, reacting to every evidence of negligence or incompetence, corruption or abuse, will fashion the necessary remedies in accordance with our laws and constitution, and in the interest of a more perfect democracy.

For the things that have been accomplished so far, the credit goes, in the first instance, to the recognized leader of the Filipino people, President Manuel Roxas. A man of solid achievement in Philippine public life, trained almost from young manhood for the responsibilities of leadership, he has sought to put our nation on its feet by methods of self-help supplemented by every available assistance from the United States of America. Faithful to our country and our people, loyal to our Constitution and our laws, he has held before his vision, in admiration and a guiding star, the liberal, humane, and democratic institutions of American life.

This faith in America, this admiration for American institutions, account in great part for the strong pro-American orientation of our foreign policy. In a score of public addresses since his induction into office, President Roxas has underscored the fact that the Republic is, in his own words, "committed to the cause and international program of the United States of America," whose friendship is the "greatest ornament of our independence and raises us far above the level of our intrinsic power and prestige." Such sentiments, one might add, come natural to a man who is one of the finest products of the American public school system in the Philippines, and who has served with courage and distinction under the American flag in defense of American ideals.

This spirit of intimate collaboration and alliance has already been enshrined in, and validated by a number of treaties and agreements. But over and above such written affirmations of common purpose are the sentiments of mutual faith, affection and gratitude which have outlived the moment of political separation and which are so deeply rooted in the minds and hearts of both our peoples that there shall be no need whatever of reducing them to the form of a polite diplomatic instrument. The Filipino people know, as the American people should know, that the independence of the Philippines was a historic act of mutual consent and consideration between two peoples, and that its ultimate success or failure will depend equally upon the capacity of the Filipinos and upon the willingness of the Americans to exhibit continuing evidences of their friendship and esteem.

Such evidences of improved relations between the Philippines and the United States have been of a most encouraging character. The relations between the American troops stationed in the Philippines and our civilian population have eased up considerably as a result of the sincere efforts of the authorities on both sides, specially Major General George F. Moore, to reduce or remove the causes of friction. Even more heartening are the new proofs of generous consideration which the United States Government has shown in giving heed to the claims and grievances of our Filipino guerrillas and veterans of the USAFFE. The cloud of misunderstanding and resentment arising from the failure to give appropriate satisfaction to these grievances is fast lifting, and we have every hope of resolving all remaining issues in an atmosphere of mutual regard and consideration.

The commitment of our young Republic to the cause and international program of the United States of America has a wider implication than is apparent at first glance. That policy commits us with equal force to the cause of the United Nations of which the United States was one of the principal organizers and of which the Philippines is a loyal member in good faith and in good standing. We have, since San Francisco, given to the organization our full and ungrudging allegiance. By express will of our people and Government, we are pledged to continue giving our loyal support to the United Nations. We shall do so, not merely because it is our desire to honor our signature on the Charter. We shall do so because in our hearts we know that in the United Nations lies the last great hope of mankind—for peace and justice, for prosperity and survival. More potent, in the end, than any aggregation of troops and armaments or system of fortifications or treaties of military alliance is the establishment of One World which shall stand as the bulwark of the security of all.

The independence of the Philippines has imposed another obligation of supreme importance upon the Filipinos. We were the first country in Asia to break through the wall of colonialism which had been built for centuries around that rich and populous region. We have a duty to lead the way, and to continue leading the way, until that wall is crumbled completely and all the oppressed and exploited nations are free. The President of the Philippines, realizing the historic responsibility of our people in this field, has expressed on various occasions his whole-hearted support of such a policy and has given me a special commission, in his official letter of instructions, to give it the most emphatic endorsement. Insofar as I personally shall have the opportunity and the power to give expression to this desire of our people, and to comply with the President's instructions, I shall endeavor by word and deed, in the councils of the United Nations or elsewhere, to support the legitimate aspirations of all peoples to freedom and independence. For I consider that it would be disgraceful for us Filipinos, having won our freedom, to remain silent or to stand apart in selfish isolation while the anguished voices of our less fortunate brethren in Asia cry out for liberty.

I said, in the beginning, that it was my purpose to speak to you on this occasion in a mood of sober reflection. The nature of the work we have done as well as of the work we have yet to do certainly requires an attitude of honest self-examination. The nature and magnitude of the problems that beset our young Republic compel us to gather our forces anew for a supreme exertion of heart and mind and muscle. There must be no relaxation of effort. While yet the injuries of a long and bloody battle remain, we must face the challenge of another equally arduous and exhausting.

Though our Republic is young, our people are old in the endurance of battle and in the experience of suffering. The centuries of our history have taught us lessons in patience, in courage, and in determination to which no exhortation can add one jot of meaning. The future can place no burden upon us more onerous than we have borne in the past. A generation that, like ours, has already borne the crucifixion of the Japanese occupation can bear any responsibilities which the future may bring. We know the measure of our strength as a people, and by this strength we shall measure the remaining tasks that await us in buttressing our independence and in establishing upon a more stable foundation the Republic of the Philippines.

Address of President Marcos at the presentation of the “Tawid” Awards for 1973, July 25, 1974

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the presentation of the “Tawid” Awards for 1973 by the Ilocano Heritage Foundation

[Delivered at the Cultural Center of the Philippines, July 25, 1974]

The Meaning of the “Tawid” Award

IT IS MY great pleasure to be associated with these ceremonies in honor of our ten outstanding brethren.

We pay tribute tonight to these exemplars whose achievements have ennobled both our life and the public service.

To them we offer not only the “Tawid” awards, but our lasting appreciation for the invaluable contribution they have made to society.

Our awardees constitute a distinguished roll of honor. Justice Fred Ruiz Castro, Dr. Andres V. Castillo, Dr. Salvador P. Lopez, Dr. Mauro Baradi, Commissioner Juan Agcaoili, Secretary Jose D. Aspiras, Don Santiago Fonacier, Dr. Santiago de la Cruz, Prof. Domingo Paguirigan and Prof. Nicolas Zafra — these are men who have brought honor both to the Ilocanos and to the Filipino race.

In honoring them, we ask our fellow countrymen to follow their examples. We do not ask of course that every citizen duplicate their deeds, but simply to match their qualities and values.

Achievement assumes different dimensions. There is the act of valor on the battlefield, the triumph of discovery in the laboratory, or the writing of an epic. But there are also acts of quiet achievement, such as the capacity to improve one’s self, the exercise of extra effort on a job, the passion to live the useful life, all of which may not seem dramatic but which nevertheless lead to self-fulfillment and contribute to the betterment of our fellow men.

The Ilocano is said to be the most frugal Filipino. He is reputed for his industry and pioneering spirit. We look around and we see that these and other virtues have become part of the national character. We have done away with the negative habits of the past to become a more purposeful and dynamic people.

This transformation is timely and necessary as we embark on a new era of nation-building. We have inaugurated a new season of development that reflects the authentic demands of our people rather than the interests of the axis of old society politicians and economic powers.

With the founding of the New Society, we have forged a new national will and purpose. We have reordered our priorities and mobilized all resources to support our urgent programs. But the key factors in our undertaking are not only natural resources and capital wealth. We have to strengthen our national character, firm up the collective backbone that is necessary to carry out the agenda for reforms.

There are many expressions of the transformation in our moral and spiritual infrastructure. The lives and deeds of our honorees are one. I think they encapsulate the new achieving spirit of the Filipino. Our honorees are a reflection of the new ethic.

We must go on perpetuating this ethic. We should sing and celebrate this temper in the same manner that we seek to preserve our beloved dallot, which is a dying tradition. I hope that the example set by the awardees will inspire our youth to lead lives of excellence and industry.

I am also pleased that tonight we shall again hear the dallot. I note mat the Ilocano Heritage Foundation, in addition to recognizing excellence in fields of specialization, is also interested in the promotion of art, culture, literature and history.

I commend the Foundation for its interest in these concerns, in preserving — in this instance — Ilocano folk art and traditions. Even as I call for national unity and concord, I have taken the position that our ethnic and cultural practices should be preserved and protected. I have sought, for example, the fullest promotion of Muslim art and culture. We can achieve brotherhood even in the diversity of our customs and traditions.

I believe, therefore, that the Foundation itself deserves an award. Perhaps we can extend this honor on another occasion. But speaking of the ‘Tawid’ awards, I would like to believe that we are giving these out tonight not only to the honorees themselves, but to the new breed of Filipinos who have made reforms and changes in our society possible. Beyond being individual awards, the ‘Tawid’ awards are a recognition of the finest and best in the Filipino.

Speech of President Marcos, A Homage to Heroes, August 25, 1974

of
His Excellency Ferdinand Marcos
President of the Philippines
A Homeage to Heroes

[Released on August 25, 1974]

Let me address myself this time to the young men of my generation, who, thirty-two years ago, exercised the ultimate freedom of choosing to die in battle rather than surrender.

It is to them that we owe the homage of remembrance, and they are, to begin with, part of the human constituency of the dead, the living and the yet-to-be-born that is the People.

I shall speak in personal terms, for although heroes belong to the collective memory— and conscience — of the race, we must yet regard them according to the individuality and wisdom of our singular experience.

Thus, to you, fallen and gallant comrades, I must speak within the context of the times, a time of anti-heroism and anti-heroes, a time when the heroic gesture is measured against the needs of, the moment. For three decades, we have transformed your glorious legacy into functional use, making of your gallant stand the inspiration of the given moment.

The essential meaning of your valor lies in the achievement of a dream that was unfulfilled in life. There was a time when many of us took your pledge to perish rather than to yield as the act of men who fought with former conquerors that we may not be conquered again.

Still, this was not enough. The eloquent rhetoric of the day placed Mt. Samat on the anvil of progress.

Thus, it had been said over and over again that you died that we might live in happiness, freedom and prosperity, that the purchase of your blood might be justified in terms of a growing GNP. You died, indeed, for a standard of living, low prices, abundance of commodities, and efficiency in the public service. And when all these did not transpire, there was a great temptation to say that you died in vain, without understanding that the question of your heroic meaning was meant to justify the existence of the living.

It is true that your valor, consecrated to the freedom and dignity of the race, was succeeded by an arrangement in which the community of the under-privileged many supported the society of the privileged few. The inequalities in privilege and opportunity, in comfort and convenience, between the few who were rich and the many who were poor have been all too evident three decades after your finest hour in Bataan.

This was a real outrage to the sensibility, for how could a race which spawned at least two generations of young heroes suffer the impoverishment of the poor, the luxuries of the rich, and the fluctuations of the world economy?

If this be your dream, as many orators have suggested, know then by a stroke of destiny, by the recognition of implacable necessity we are beginning under the new discipline, to see our workers more productive, our bankers count their coins, our factories operate with maximum efficiency, and our scenic spots overwhelmed by tourists and their dollars. We are counting the economic blessings brought about by the decrees of the New Society, for these blessings are, I understand, an integral part of the dream which made you shed your blood here in Mt. Samat.

And yet I am troubled, and, perhaps, I am not alone. Philosophers and thinkers, incisive observers of the human scene, tell us that no one revolts for a standard of living. They tell us that human beings are moved by moral sentiments such as justice, liberty and equality. They speak to us of gallant gestures and heroic acts, gratuitous in the real sense, so that courage goes without compensation, resolution without calculation, and sacrifice without remuneration. They say that these are qualities – “crisis qualities”—which place men above “dumb, driven cattle.”

And so while widows, sweethearts, relatives, friends, and compatriots, commemoratively mourn your physical death, I mourn your spiritual demise. Heroes in our time cast long shadows in the life of the living, inspiring them to the valorous deed for the sake of valor, for what is fine, exalted and selfless in man. Theirs was the discipline of living life according to the full exercise of one’s faculties, aspiring to the virtue that is characteristic of man.

No man should live in penury, no child should be born in the hovel, but we have somehow come to believe that penury and the hovel spell the destruction of human spirituality. Possessed with the materialism of the times, we would prefer the abundance of goods to the quality of our lives, and to a large extent, equate quality with affluence.

It has not been enough that we have liberated ourselves from the dependency of the past, that in claiming our destiny, we have the rare opportunity of turning the tide of mendicancy, helplessness, and passive expectancy. We have, by our own efforts, in daring to live dangerously for a purpose, averted the tragedy of a society awaiting passively the hand of its executioner. We would rather apply ourselves to the abundance of goods than to the efflorescence of faith, hope and confidence.

But to a certain measure, they should come together: the blessings of this earth and the resurgence of spiritual strength. I mourn, then, for your moral heritage, the defiance of fate, for that which is unpurchaseable in man: his freedom and his dignity.

I would that we shall bow no more. I would that we shall endow the gift of life with struggle, courage, and wisdom, rather than, pining for those creature comforts which could not be attained without strenuous effort. We should have understood by now that the authentic dimension of human development is man’s moral purpose on this earth.

Rest you, again, fallen comrades and heroic brothers. We shall yet be true to your exemplary gallantry. We shall yet learn that ultimately, what will make this nation stand is not so much the size and number of its factories but the height and strength of its people.

We shall try to match your stature...

My friends, thus do I address the silent judges of our enterprise, an enterprise conceived in danger and struggle, an enterprise worthy of our deepest commitment. If there are no heroes now, from whom will future generations derive their inspiration?

The generation that stands here now in Mt. Samat has done its part.

It is now up to us.

Extemporaneous Speech of President Marcos at the inauguration of the Philippine Heart Center for Asia, February 14, 1975

Extemporaneous Speech
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the inauguration of the Philippine Heart Center for Asia

[Delivered on February 14, 1975]

Like many of you today, I see the Philippine Heart Center for the first time. What I see is a surprise to me. And one of the great pleasures of living lies in being surprised. With Mrs. Marcos, I must confess that it has been one surprise after another. I am amazed at the magnitude, scope and sophistication of this Philippine Heart Center.

I therefore extend my congratulations to all those who have participated in establishing this Heart Center, to those who have inspired it, to those who labored on it, from the unskilled laborers to the scientists and technicians, from the planners and designers to the architects, from the great minds who have conceived of such an institute, from the Heart Foundation of the Philippines that started work on it two years ago, to the Organization led by Mrs. Marcos in bringing about the realization of a dream.

For and in behalf of the Republic of the Philippines and the people of the Philippines, I accept with gratitude this offering of the Heart.

Allow me also to articulate the gratitude of the 42 million people of the Philippines to our distinguished visitors all pioneers and outstanding men not only in cardiology but in medical science whose presence at the opening ceremonies have not only clothed these ceremonies with elegance and prestige but now opens a well spring of inspiration for those who will seek to follow in their footsteps in this Philippine Heart Center.

As We look at this Heart Center, different images and visions come to my mind. In my case, I see it as a long, torturous and difficult road that we have travelled from ten years back when I first became President of the Republic. In 1965, when I was first elected President, I ordered a medical survey of the Visayas and Mindanao and I discovered to my dismay that 60% of those who died in 1964 had never seen a doctor or nurse throughout their lives. And today, we have the most advanced and sophisticated medical center specializing on cardiovascular surgery. The impact of scientific technological discoveries on our every day lives is so staggering and mind-boggling that there have been suggestions from some quarters for a moratorium on the escalating advance of the natural and physical sciences. Biologists, for example, speak of the discovery of DNA, the principle of very life itself, of biological computers and robots, of cryonism and cloning, or the multiplication of human beings. The knowledge, about the universe is growing with precision. Even to specialists, I am told, these continuing discoveries of natural and physical science are formidable.

To us, therefore, the ordinary minds whose grasp of physical and natural sciences must of necessity be limited, these discoveries are radical and sweeping, and yet the world of common men accept them as a matter of fact.

What enters my mind today, therefore, is a sad fact that the calling to which I have dedicated myself, that of political leader or social engineer or political scientist, or as some would say statesman, is rather conservative, if not totally backward, compared to the radicalism that I see in natural and physical sciences.

The natural and physical sciences are millions of light years away from Aristotle, but the formulae of social scientists, even political scientists are still fundamentally an arms length from Plato and Aristotle.

This enters my mind as I realize that the political leadership in this country which I have the honor to lead had been compelled to perform radical heart surgery in the Philippines. We have had to replace the Old Society with all its evils, its deficiencies, anarchy, criminality, corruption, its viciousness which resulted in daily kidnappings, arson that burned among many others the International Airport Terminal Building, which resulted in the bombing of the Supreme Court Building, the City Hall of Manila and the City Hall of Quezon City and the attempted seizure of Malacañang Palace and the ambush of public officials, like the Secretary of National Defense, the kidnapping for ransom of such magnitude that they were no longer reported to the police, to the immobilization of the private sector and also the impotence of the Government. All these—had to be replaced with the NEW SOCIETY.

And you might call it radical surgery.

I cannot but express envy, therefore, that the people of the Western World have received your radical reforms in medical science with applause and accolade. While our radical reforms in our society which I intended not only to eliminate anarchy and save the life of the social patient but to eliminate and eradicate the causes of this illness should be met with suspicion, distrust if not outright antagonism not only by Western constitutionalists and libertarians from whose teachings we learned our knowledge of government, but perhaps also outright rejection by the common people of the Western World.

As I look at this prestigious assembly of surgeons, the question that comes to my mind, therefore, is whether the radical changes in the surgical and medical procedures have always been so welcome and accepted by the world. Or has it been accepted because of the success that followed the radical medical reforms?

And the questions that follow are, must my kind, my calling, the profession of lawyer or the constitutional list and legal thinkers, the political theorists—must they, always be conservative and reject radicalism no matter how peaceful, constitutional it may be.

Otherwise, how can the world face up to the complexities of modern problems.

For more than ten years ago, we had warned that the world was approaching a mass of such complexities that the ancient formula of the old economists and political teachers may no longer be relevant or even applicable to the situation.

The economic thinkers now are recasting and refashioning new rules in the game of affluence. The political thinkers are still in a state of shock and incapable of taking a step towards their survival.

Medical science perhaps appreciates the plaudits and accolade that is due the pioneers which are due principally to the resolution, confidence and natural talents.

Address of President Marcos at the commencement exercises of the Philippine Military Academy, March 1, 1977

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the commencement exercises of the Philippine Military Academy

[Delivered on March 1, 1977]

Beyond the Challenge of Our Times

IT IS A tradition firmly kept and followed every year for the President to come to this academy to offer words of welcome and congratulations to its new graduates. In the years of my presidency, I have seen many young men pass through the portals of this institution from the year 1965 to the present. I have seen these young men come out of the academy to serve the nation, and it has been my great experience as President to see them rise to heights of leadership in our armed forces and in the Republic.

It was said once that “the service of institutions of learning is not private, but public.” In the case of the Philippine Military Academy, this is both a commitment and a mission. No other institution maintains so fundamental and unshakeable a bond with the nation; none has been directed, by charter and design, to prepare young men for national service more than the Philippine Military Academy.

I congratulate you, honored graduates in today’s ceremonies, for your deliberate and voluntary choice of this noble career in the military. For your life work and profession will be that which is devoted in the way of sacrifice, perhaps of life, of all ambitions, of youth to the country and to our people. There can be no more noble profession than this.

And so I may say on this occasion of your commencement that I welcome you today as my colleagues and comrades-in-arms, and if there be any advice or counsel that I as commencement speaker might impart to you, it is the counsel and challenge of the times in which we live.

I remember a year ago when I came for the commencement of the graduates who preceded you; I spoke of the urgent problems we faced in the sphere of national security and the problems of pacification and rebellion that we continue to face in the southern regions of the country.

I sought the transfer of this ceremony from February 20th to March 1st because we have been occupied by a crisis which confronts our country, and that is, the crisis arising out of the effort to settle the fighting in the South peacefully. Last year, I spoke of the policies and measures of government and the military to bring peace to the South. I told the graduates then, and now you who are graduating this year, that a military solution is insufficient and inadequate to bring about complete peace in the South. That year, very sadly, we could only speak of the peace that we wanted and not of peace actually reigning in the troubled areas.

Now a year later, the situation has changed. For the first time since the start of the conflict, hostilities in Mindanao have stopped under the umbrella of a ceasefire, agreed upon in Tripoli last December 23, Libyan time, and December 24, Philippine time.

This agreement entered into after the first round of negotiations in Tripoli was started by the visit of the First Lady on November 15. You are well aware that for the past three years, we have been trying to negotiate some kind of settlement of the secessionist rebellion in the South. For more than three years, we had sought an invitation, or we had thought to invite the leadership of Libya, which had openly declared support for the secessionist, to either come to the Philippines or for us to be invited to Libya.

Suddenly after the great earthquake in the South on August 21, the minister representing Libya in the Quadripartite Islamic Committee that visited the Philippines upon our invitation, also went to the South — where I had brought my entire family to give succor and sympathy to the victims not only of that great earthquake but of the tsunami that killed more than 8,000 of our people. He joined us in Mindanao and suddenly we received an invitation to visit Libya.

Since I was also in the middle of many urgent matters, I indicated that I, perhaps, would not be able to go to Libya personally for the meantime, and asked that it be postponed for a month or two.

During the International Monetary Fund-World Bank Conference in October, we received the formal invitation from President Moammar Khaddafy, the Chairman of the Revolutionary Council of the Libyan Arab Republic for the President and the First Lady to visit Libya as state guests. And if the President could not go, for the First Lady to visit as the guest of President Moammar Khaddafy.

The First Lady was accompanied by the representatives of the National Defense Department including the major service commanders. I can mention the Commanding General of the Philippine Army, Major General Abat; the Commanding General of the Philippine Air Force, Rear Admiral Espaldon; the Chief of Intelligence and Security, Major General Ver; Metrocom Commander Brigadier General Olivas, and representatives of the Secretary Of National Defense, as well as Undersecretary of Foreign Affairs Collantes.

I repeat, we did not expect the ceasefire to arise out of this formal meeting for a state visit is usually such a ceremonial affair where you go through the usual ceremonies of toasts and expectations and the amenities of wishing each other good health and success but actually achieving nothing.

However, on November 17, 1976, while I was playing golf on the Malacañang golf course, I received an urgent call through the telephone — a call from across the seas, from Libya. The First Lady was on the telephone. To my surprise, when the First Lady recognized me on the telephone, she said, “Hold on, somebody wants to talk to you.” And I heard the voice that said, “This must be President Marcos.” And I said, “Yes, it is President Marcos. Who is this?” And he said, “This is Colonel Khaddafy.” I did not realize that he spoke English rather well, because we had sent French and Arab interpreters for the party of the First Lady.

As you are well aware, heads of state, heads of government don’t talk to each other over the telephone without being introduced, but here we were. Of course, the First lady had broken protocol and thank God she did. She told me later, “I did not break any protocol because I do not believe that such a protocol exists. After all, he wanted to talk to you, so I gave the telephone to him.”

And we exchanged amenities but later on, we discussed the Mindanao conflict. I realized then and there that it was a God-given opportunity for me to immediately open the subject of the Southern fighting. And one thing led to another, I asked him, “Why don’t you and the First Lady now look into this problem of the impasse about the agreement and how we should settle the Mindanao conflict? I said, yes, negotiations should be immediately called. And I called his attention to the fact that Minister Ali Al Treki, his Foreign Minister, had agreed that if it were possible, the negotiations should be held in Tripoli, Libya. I repeated this suggestion and this led to the negotiations in Tripoli.

I have been asked by a number of voices to reveal the truth about the situation in the South. Am I optimistic of a continuation of the ceasefire and a final peaceful settlement of this conflict? I am certain in the graduates will be interested to know exactly what are they graduating into. Are you graduating into a war in the South? Are you going to fight more battles? My answer is: I am optimistic that the ceasefire, temporary and transitory as it may be, will graduate into a final, peaceful settlement of the Mindanao conflict.

You are well aware that we have signed what is known as an agreement in principle on December 23, 1976. This agreement provides that there shall be a ceasefire. We will negotiate the organization of a regional government which shall be autonomous to a certain extent without violating the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of the Philippines. We also agreed that the constitutional processes and requirements of the Republic of the Philippines would be complied with. This is why we are now submitting to a plebiscite on March 17 the matter of what provinces will be included in the autonomous region to be organized in Mindanao.

This is the first step towards final resolution and reconciliation. Under the agreement of December 23, we must hold the second round of negotiations from February 5th to March 3rd. It is now March 1st. And the question has been asked: why has nothing come out of this second round of negotiations if it is true that you and President Khaddafy are both optimistic about the results of this second round of negotiations? My answer is: We have been exchanging communications. I have written to President Khaddafy through the Charge d' Affaires, Ambassador Mohammad Dreiza, explaining that the plebiscite was necessary. His cabled answer which I received the other day indicates that he is also optimistic about the results of this settlement. He informs me that whatever the obstacles, he is aware that both parties are sincere in seeking a just and peaceful solution. And what with the sincerity demonstrated by both parties, the government of the Republic of the Philippines and the National Liberation Front as well as the supervision by Libya and the Islamic Conference of the Moro National Liberation Front, there will be a settlement.

So the second round of negotiations is in progress in Tripoli. We believe in the good faith of President Khaddafy. We believe in the sincerity of the members of the Islamic Conference and also of the Quadripartite Committee composed of Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Senegal and Libya. We believe that the participation of the Quadripartite Committee which has been appointed supervisors of the ceasefire will bring about a sincere implementation of the agreements.

What are the difficulties and obstacles to a final settlement of the Southern front fighting? The present obstacle right now is: The Moro National Liberation Front has made some demands. We are all aware that we have insisted that the integrity and sovereignty of the Republic of the Philippines be maintained. However, they have insisted that I issue a decree organizing Palawan and the ten provinces of Regions IX and XII which are Tawi-Tawi, Sulu, Basilan, Zamboanga Norte, Zamboanga Sur, Lanao Norte, Lanao Sur, Maguindanao, Sultan Kudarat, Cotabato Norte, Cotabato Sur, and Davao Sur – thirteen provinces to be included in one single region.

I have said that under our Constitution, we must seek approval of such a region, a regional autonomous government, by the people themselves. And so I have called a plebiscite for this purpose.

I just received a cable from President Khaddafy indicating the position of the Moro National Liberation Front. The Moro National Liberation Front has stated to President Khaddafy, and President Khaddafy has transmitted this to me, that if the provinces of Palawan, Cotabato Sur, and Davao Sur were not included in the autonomous regional government, fighting might be resumed.

It is my opinion, however, that this is a position that has been adopted as a negotiating position. It is now necessary that the leadership of both the Philippines and Libya as well as the members of the Islamic Conference, demonstrate the highest form of statesmanship to bring about a scheme under which there may be a regional autonomy without violating the Constitution of the Republic of the Philippines.

This is the situation in which we are. This is one of the reasons why I could not come on February 20th. You are well aware also that on those particular days, we were going to call a plebiscite for February 21st, but on the petition of a great number of the residents and the voters in the Southern region, we have delayed the plebiscite to March 17 to give time for a proper information period.

During the past two weeks, we have endeavored to bring the issues to the people of Mindanao, in order to ensure that the plebiscite in the 13 provinces of Southern Philippines will fully reflect their mandate. All sectors in the South are now engaged in this particular effort, and the Commission on Elections has fully prepared for the orderly conduct of the voting.

Today, I come before you and announce that for purposes of this plebiscite—as of the day that I called the plebiscite, the effects of martial law are hereby declared lifted for the 13 provinces of Mindanao for purposes of the plebiscite. This will allow an open, free and honest ascertainment of the wishes of our people.

What will be the question that will be asked? Do you want your provinces to be included in a unified regional autonomous government in which shall belong the 13 provinces mentioned? And, if any possible solution to this impasse could be suggested by the voters, we will provide remarks sheets for the remarks of the voters.

Is there a plan for regional autonomy for the South? The answer is yes. What is this plan? This plan is embodied in a proposal by the Batasang Bayan which met last month on this particular subject. It provides for regional autonomy that in no way violates the national sovereignty or conflicts with the programs of government for development and administration. What does it provide for? It provides for the election of a least 21 members of a Sangguniang Pampook or regional assembly to be elected throughout the region.

This Sangguniang Pampook will recommend for presidential appointment the members of the Lupong Tagapagpaganap or the Executive Council that will run the affairs of the region. This has always been the plan not only for the South but also for the entire Philippines.

In all candor, I would like to go on record that I am fully in support of the plans for unification of Region 9 and 12 into a single autonomous region, provided that the leaders and the members of the Sangguniang Pampook as well as the Executive Council or the Lupong Tagapagpaganap shall be properly elected in accordance with law.

These two regions, of course, comprise ten provinces, five of which have extensive Muslim populations and the other five non-Muslim.

It is I believe, a necessary condition for the upliftment and development of our Muslim communities, so that their resources, knowhow, and initiative may be consolidated into a community of ideals and objectives consistent with the vision we also entertain for the rest of our country.

But my position on this matter is ever subordinate to the people's will. I have guaranteed the free expression of this will, I have lifted the effects of martial law in those 13 provinces. I have provided funds for an information campaign. I have ordered the local officials as well as those in the military engaged in information to see to it that all information necessary for the settlement of this issue is disseminated to the public. The Department of Public Information of our government is engaged in such a campaign.

When I look back upon the plight and wayward course of our rural communities, it is not so much the neglect of government or the predatory impact of migrant classes that has stifled development in these areas including Southern Mindanao. More revealing is the evident insufficiency of local leadership and initiative to make the necessary efforts of social transformation. Government has never willfully neglected the need to develop these areas. Government has provided funds for these areas. Unfortunately, some of these funds have found their way to the pockets of local leaders in the old society. Resources channeled to these communities simply did not bear fruit in the circumstances of our rural inhabitants.

Now these regions — and I refer not only to Southern Philippines but all of the rural areas throughout the Philippines — these regions are now the focus of many developments. It is important that these programs be supported by an active, dedicated leadership, by effort at grass-roots level, by the consciousness of local residents so that by their own efforts they can change the whole spectrum of realities and possibilities in their own communities.

Beyond ending the estrangement of many Muslims from the rest of the national polity, we must also end the estrangement of Muslim from Muslim, of communities from one another. The consolidation, therefore, of the two regions provides a framework for the unification of goals, and we are confident that given the institutional support by government, it will result in the common development of our Muslim communities.

All Filipino Muslims must see in this an opportunity to gather around the common cause of their development. If in the past, they have been divided—some firmly in support of the Republic and others seeking to secede from it—today they must all look upon reconciliation as the only effective road to the progress they desire.

From my viewpoint as President of the Republic, what must be provided for? I repeat, we cannot settle the Mindanao conflict by relying on the strength of the military alone. This is neither desirable nor wise. It will be necessary to grant some kind of autonomy, but such autonomy as will not destroy the Republic nor infringe upon the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Philippines. We must see to it that our people are reunited. We must see to it that those areas are never utilized again as a launching ground to undermine the Republic whether from within or from without.

Because of the intensive efforts exerted by government and the military for the rehabilitation and development of the troubled areas, we need not be detained too long by the work of reconstruction. As a whole there is now in the affected areas the material and institutional conditions that make for a good staging base for the development process. Development, rehabilitation, autonomy, unification, reconciliation—these are the answers to the problem of the fighting in the South, and these are your government's pledges to give not only to the Muslim and Christian inhabitants but to all the residents of Southern Philippines.

We must acknowledge, in this particular program, the signal role that the Armed Forces have played in this effort. For while the severity of conflict might have easily unleashed the might of arms, the military has shown restraint in dealing with an estranged segment of our society. And it has been fully involved in unification and reconciliation efforts. Besides the roster of lives lost by our Armed Forces — and there are many whom we have lost who came from the ranks of the graduates of the Philippines Military Academy, those brave and dedicated men who have gone to the life beyond in the service of their nation and their country during this prolonged strife — there is also another roster of men who aided in the work of reconstruction and reconciliation in projects to rebuild and create and in the plans to develop Mindanao.

This is not an isolated development occasioned merely by this peculiar urgent requirement and stresses of the conflict in the South. It gives expression to the overall broadening of the role of the military in our society, to the very evolution of the Filipino soldiery, in the tides of challenge and effort into which the nation has plunged itself.

Although it is an institution steeped in the ways of tradition, our military establishment has kept pace with the changing context and circumstances of international life, in undertaking its supreme mission of ensuring national peace and security.

Along strategic and theoretical lines, this derives from the awareness that the problem of maintaining security changes are the circumstances of life change. We see now that we must view and understand security problems in their total context—not only the military aspects, but also the social, political and economic ones. And in seeing them this way, we realize the need to adapt a total systems approach in resolving these problems.

In the resolution of this problem, there has been a deepening of the bond between the military and the government and other institutions of society, in the consolidation of once separate functions under a single program, in the harmonization of civilian and military roles in our society.

We may see it as a natural consequence of the common conviction that the system we have sought to foster in our country can only survive if it truly repairs to its real strengths—its capacity for innovation. Rigidly adhering to the forms of democratic life as we had been tutored by the West, we might have proven our fidelity to theory, but clearly we could not have survived the tempests of ferment and revolution, which so lately have bedevilled us.

We cannot narrowly conceive of the police powers of the state as a function detached from the stream of effort that goes into nation-building. It must be involved in the making of change. It must secure order and stability because these are the keys to national regeneration and progress.

And so my message to you today is exactly that. We are in a period of regeneration, of rehabilitation, and the theme is innovation, ingenuity, and the utilization of the mind more than perhaps of the body. As you go out into the field to fulfill your responsibility to yourselves, to your God, to your country, keep in mind that it is necessary for the Filipino to innovate in order to progress and prosper.

And thus the settlement of the Mindanao question and all the problems of peace and order has required innovation. In innovating, we have had to utilize the peculiar services of a woman representative like the First Lady. I forgot to tell you that she has agreed upon my insistence that if no other recourse were available in order to settle the Mindanao conflict, she would have to return to Libya on a second mission so that we may finally settle that problem.

The challenge of insurgency compels us to build from within, and to be vigilant and responsive to the needs of the society. More than ever we must be sensitive to the principle that no force, whether military or civil, can be viable and can succeed in the attainment of its objective without the support of the people. I repeat what I have said in the past: No matter how strong the Armed Forces may be, and no matter how stable the political institution, the moment the people withdraw their support from such armed forces and such political institution, they are bound to crumble and fail. Your ultimate objective should always be, therefore, to retain the strength that arises out of the support of the people.

The challenge of competition among the major powers in our part of the world compels us to work towards a viable equilibrium of forces and influence in Southeast Asia that will not attempt one nation to impose its will upon the region.

It can be achieved in concert with our partners in Southeast Asia and in efforts to cooperate with those nations who subscribe to a different social system and ideology. And it goes without saying that such collaboration is most effectively fostered when the fabric of cooperation involves as well the steadfast effort to develop together.

This problem certainly will not bend easily to solution. The road to self-reliance is difficult. And difficult, too, is the task of winning nations on the side of peace.

But we can do much on our side, as we are in fact doing for ourselves and our region.

I would hold up to the attention of this graduating class no higher ideal than the understanding of problems in their total context, and the outlook which it implies of balance, of flexibility, of dedication, and, I repeat, of innovation.

The moving history of our nation during this decade testifies to the growth and the efficacy of this ideal. And I know of no institution that has so commendably fostered this ideal more than the Academy itself which prepares new generations for national service each year.

From here have come men with a clear conception of duty to people and country, and men who in the school of experience have proved their mettle.

As you and I journey further into the future, let us respond with vigor to the changing needs of changing times, ever ready to cope with the complex as well as the simple. The history of the Academy tells us that the years ahead will be different from its earlier years, and new coping mechanisms will be needed to carry on the tradition of this institution. As elsewhere in Asia, we must in this academy keep running in order to stay still. For this reason I ask that we make sure that we derive the maximum advantage from military training in this academy by reviewing the process by which we train our officers, closing no possibilities for innovation where it is needed, even at the cost of certain time-honored practices and traditions like the fourth class system which I ask the cadets themselves to study in order that we can determine whether we should retain it or not. I ask that the Armed Forces of the Philippines now also undertake a reassessment of the entire training program of those who will ultimately join the Armed Forces of the Philippines to include this academy.

For the Philippine Military Academy must grow, and it must grow beyond the challenge of our times.

Before I forget, I would like to announce in your presence today, that I will sign a decree increasing the base pay of Philippine Military Academy cadets. This increases the base pay of cadets who at present receive P319.00 to P470.00 a month. It also increases the base pay of probationary second lieutenants.

In your presence, I, therefore, sign this decree. And I hand it over to Colonel Magsino.

Once again, I congratulate the graduates of Class '77 as well as the cadets who remain in the Academy, the members of the administrative organization, and the members of the faculty as well as the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

I am confident that the graduates will rise to the challenge of our times and will succeed not only in war but also in the peace that we would like to win.

Extemporaneous Speech of President Marcos at the 80th Foundation Anniversary of the Philippine Army, March 22, 1977

Extemporaneous Speech
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 80th Foundation Anniversary of the Philippine Army

[Delivered at Fort Bonifacio, March 22, 1977]

A History of Valor

HINDI KO INAKALANG mapapahalo ako sa tatanggap at sasabitan ng medalya sa gabing ito. Many of you don't know it, but I have always felt that Major General Abat came into the Army under fraudulent enlistment. This, of course, is a background. During the guerrilla days, if you remember, I was operating in eastern Pangasinan, Mountain Province, and Nueva Vizcaya. And one of my guides was a young man. Upon investigation, he turned out to be 17 years old. Yet, he had enlisted in the Armed Forces of the Philippines claiming to be an 18-year old. That young man is now the commanding general of the Philippine Army, Major General Abat.

I think that he wanted to turn the tables on me tonight. I have always ordered him around. He kept running back and forth between the units. I used him as a guide, a messenger, and a courier. Sometimes, he was my cook.

Now, he awards me this Kagitingan badge. I was looking at the other major service commanders during the presentation here. We, of course, were nostalgic about the beginnings of our military history. Of course, only the Philippine Army has a long history of 80 years. However, there is a footnote in Philippine history which says that the Philippine Navy was jointly organized with the Philippine Army. So the Philippine Navy should better watch out.

I don't know how many units the Philippine Navy had. Probably, it had two scows. I happened to know about this because the capitan-heneral of the Philippine Army was Artemio Ricarte whose nom de guerre was Vibora. He happens to be a relative from Batac, Ilocos Norte.

So I know, more or less, what happened during the organization of the Philippine Army. What did they call it? The "Foot Army" in 1897.

But let me come back to this Kagitingan badge. This is given me while I am wearing the barong. Am I to wear this with my perennial uniform, the barong?

I am indeed honored. I accept this award for and on behalf of all those men and women who have gone ahead of us, who have made it possible for us all to be here today to celebrate the 80th anniversary of the Philippine Army.

I go all the way back to the many years when our lives depended upon the friendship and loyalty of many unknown and unnamed Filipinos.

I see General Fred Santos. He and Colonel Fidel Cruz brought me out of Manila in the uniform of a Philippine Constabulary officer in August of 1944. Brigadier General Argawi was in command of the company in Bulacan. I and so many others hid in Bulacan. It is for these men — unsung and unknown — that this award has been given.

You referred to the medal of valor given to me. I think the only reason it was given to me was that there was nobody else left among those who fought beside me.

I am deeply honored especially in the presence of all these courageous warriors who have demonstrated the capability of Filipino soldiers.

I am indeed very happy to come on this occasion notwithstanding the very critical days ahead. I did not realize that Major General Abat had this presentation all prepared. Otherwise, I would have asked him to wait for the arrival of the First Lady. Certainly, this rivals the Kasaysayan ng Lahi.

I am certain that when the First Lady comes back, she will ask to be shown this presentation. I do hope that they have taken a video tape of all these proceeding.

This is, of course, the oldest major service in the Armed Forces of the Philippines. The problem is that when I look around me, I notice that most of us belong to the Philippine Army — Undersecretary Crisol, General Espino (although he occasionally flies now and then), and I.

So we must hold back our feelings whenever we see the troops of the Philippine Army making good. They have certainly made good in the past, and they continue to make good in the present.

Therefore, when we celebrate eight decades of the Philippine Army's history, we honor a tradition of valor in arms and we pay homage to the memory of a great number of our soldiers who are no longer with us — Ricarte, Bonifacio Aguinaldo and the heroes of Bataan and Corregidor. The men whose deeds are written in the annals of our nation and who made history before us. For the history of the Philippine Army has been the history of our nation.

In every period of that national history — from the revolution to the present time — this service has had to face many special challenges. To every challenge, it has returned the response required by the times — courage in the face of adversity and uncertainty; resourcefulness, flexibility, compassion in periods of relative quiet.

In the turmoil of revolution, our people sowed the beginnings of the service. We remember only dimly the character of our revolutionary army, the faces of officers and men who were very young when they joined. The quality of their arms was something which marked the need to make up with courage what they lacked in equipment. It is to the lasting glory of that band of soldiers that they established by valor the first national republic in all of Asia.

Denied the fruits of national sovereignty, they took to the field once more in a war against a new foe. And only the superior forces of the enemy, and ultimately the voices of those who sought peace instead of war, enabled silence to prevail in our countryside.

It took more than three decades for our people to be granted the right to maintain a new army. And when at last it was organized during the Commonwealth, it was swiftly drawn into battle once more — this time side by side with the Armed Forces of the United States against the forces that would invade our land. The early stages of the war, of course, inflicted tremendous losses on the defense forces, but the entire nation during the war lost a million men and women. Darkness enshrouded our country, but just the same, our loyal sons raised the flag of intransigence in many a hilltop, and the soldiers of long ago now had to repair once more to their revolutionary origin and resist the invader through guerrilla warfare. Resisting alone, with the allied forces engaged on other fronts in the Pacific and in Europe, our soldiers maintained the struggle, and it was not long afterwards that the country was liberated. It is a part of our history that throughout Southeast Asia, perhaps, it was the Philippines alone that maintained the continued resistance to the invading forces during the entire period of the Second World War. This is part of the history of the Philippine Army.

In more recent times, the Philippine Army has had to maintain its flexibility as an armed service. It was required to fight in Korea. It has undertaken civic action in Vietnam. It has put down a rebellion in Central Luzon. It has worked on developmental measures. It has the painful task of confronting our brothers engaged in secessionism in the South. It has been required to dismantle the apparatus of rebellion and secessionism and to join in nation-building.

In peace or in war, at home or abroad, in the North or in the South, under colonial auspices or conditions of national independence, the Philippine Army has maintained its creative tradition of coping with the changing challenges before the nation to fulfill its supreme and unchanging mission.

Today, we find the Philippine Army confronted once more by challenges as momentous as those that it had been confronted with throughout its eighty-year history. For the first time perhaps since the national Revolution of 1896, the country looks toward a time when its military capabilities will be sufficient to maintain national security regardless of the scale of assistance extended by other nations.

Today, I just granted the Presidential streamer to the 32nd Battalion. Its performance has been outstanding; it is perhaps the most decorated unit among all the operational units in the Philippine Army.

At the same time, I have awarded the Presidential Unit citation to the entire Philippine Army and the symbolic unit citation badge to its commanding of the Philippine Army, from this day forward, are entitled to wear this symbolic unit citation badge.

We are presently engaged in a task to reconcile and unite with our brothers in the South. You are well aware that we have had a little crisis because of the stalemate of the negotiations in Tripoli. You are well aware of the Tripoli agreement of December 23, 1976. I need not go into the antecedents of such an agreement. Suffice it to say that we have the generous intervention of the nations belonging to the Quadripartite Committee of the Islamic Conference — Egypt, Senegal, Somalia, and Saudi Arabia. We have also the generous intervention of President Khaddafy, the great leader of the People's Socialist Libyan Arab Republic.

We have been able to obtain an agreement as of December 23, 1976 and a ceasefire. There had been a stalemate and the negotiations were recessed. Undersecretary Barbero came here for consultations. There was no possibility of a resumption. There was a threat of the resumption instead of hostilities.

Intervention in the highest possible level became necessary. Inasmuch as I was unable to leave, we sent, as our ambassador, the First lady.

I would like to announce that the First Lady has just left Tripoli at 4:45 this afternoon. And I would also like to announce that by virtue of the generous intervention of the brilliant and great leader of Libya, we have come to a tentative solution for the peaceful settlement of the Mindanao conflict.

It is still subject to further determination of the various details But I received on the 18th of March a formal proposal from President Khaddafy of Libya by cable, which he confirmed that same day by telephone. He personally called me up to inform me that because of the intervention of the First Lady and because of his desire that there now be peace in a friendly country like the Philippines, he believed he should not allow those who would like to see us fighting once again to succeed. He, therefore, submitted a proposal which I am approved.

This, of course, will be subject to further negotiations with the rebel groups and with the Quadripartite Committee of the Islamic Conference. But I am certain that inasmuch as President Khaddafy has led in the negotiations for the peaceful settlement of the Mindanao conflict, we will finally be able to bring peace to Mindanao, Basilan, Sulu and Tawi-Tawi.

I have awarded these streamers because the men of the 32nd Battalion have fought well. It is my hope and prayer that there will be no need for men like you to continue fighting for the honor and integrity of our country. And that there will be unity in our land.

This is my news for you today. On the occasion of your 80th anniversary, it may no longer be necessary for you to fight in Mindanao.

May God grant that peace to continue.

Address of President Marcos at the 1977 UNICEF Executive Board Session and Special Meeting on the Situation of Children in Asia, May 17, 1977

The Best We Have to Give

IT IS PERHAPS unusual that so many of our children should be with us in this hall as we open this 1977 UNICEF Conference in Manila this morning. I do not know if they can grasp or they do grasp the complex and urgent agenda of this conference, but I have a feeling that they instinctively understand and sympathize with our efforts. If we cannot fully appreciate the decisions or recommendations that will be made in your deliberations, the future will take care of that.

But it is not for our children alone and millions more like them that we meet here today. It is for their future. It is as well as that we see them in the face, to recall one more the unique mission of the United Nations Children's Fund; to remind us of UNICEF's distinguished record of service, which in 1965 was deservedly honored with the Nobel Peace Prize; and to refresh us with the challenge that the young pose to us today — the question of what kind of society, and what kind of world, they will inherit from us, their elders.

Here in Asia, the challenge is written in all its awesome dimensions. In this — the largest of the continents — live more than two billion people, nearly half the world's population. Of this, about 40 percent are children most of whom have been born into conditions of poverty ignorance, and deprivation. Anyone who would wish therefore to understand the nature of the challenge facing the young should seek it here in Asia; and anyone who would raise their lot must of necessity begin here.

It is hardly surprising the UNICEF's largest programs are being carried out in Asia, and that as the only United Nations agency devoted exclusively to the well-being of children, UNICEF should in this meeting devote special attention to the situation of children in the region.

The urgency or timeliness of this conference does not derive from any new problems lately loosed upon the world. The problem is old, and we have looked at it, examined it, and debated it for such a long time now. But greater resolve is needed to now arrive at far-reaching solutions.

Children do not vote although in the Philippines 15-year olds are allowed to vote in referenda and plebiscites. And therefore in general children have no political constituency. Their problems usually rate a low priority in the pragmatic appraisal of national or international agenda. But we need every now and then to focus consciously on their situation, to "shock the globe," in the words of Gabriela Mistral, "(by) touching the child."

In 1974, UNICEF declared an international emergency for children. That declaration provoked worldwide concern, and there was substantial response to UNICEF's appeal for special contributions in behalf of mothers and children in the famine-stricken countries. But it has been much more difficult to attract sustained attention and elicit meaningful action to cope with what amounts to a permanent state of emergency in the poor countries of the developing world.

Because poverty is such a widespread and chronic phenomenon in these countries, its effects on children have generally failed to arouse the kind of urgent global concern that might stimulate more effective and meaningful efforts to improve their lot.

Yet the magnitude and seriousness of the situation in the developing world are dramatically underlined by the appalling statistics available to us. And they become even more alarming when set side by side with the situation of children in the developed world.

In the area of infant mortality, the death rate is eight times higher than in the developed countries. More than half of the total deaths in developing countries occurs among children in the 0-5 years age group. In some developing countries, one out of every four children dies before its fifth birthday.

Whereas in the advanced countries, the leading causes of child mortality — diarrhea, dysentery, pneumonia, malaria, measles and tuberculosis — have been considerably contained, in the developing countries, they come hand in hand with the poor living conditions of parents.

Almost two-thirds of the world's children live in the rural areas, where 80 percent of the population have no access to health services; 85 percent without adequate supplies of safe, clean water, or sanitary facilities for waste disposal.

United Nations estimates indicate that only one out of every 20 children in the developing countries has access to basic health and welfare services. Seven out of every ten infants in Asia are born without medical assistance or trained help, and less than one percent of them receive day care services during their childhood.

Malnutrition is the most significant cause of high death rate among children in the developing countries, because it makes them more vulnerable to infection and disease. Those who survive are usually unable to escape irreversible brain damage and physical impairment. Severe Vitamin A deficiency alone, a major cause of blindness in children, affects 100,000 of them annually.

The educational situation of children in the developing world is no less disturbing. In 1975, some 120 million children between the ages of 6 and 11 were out of school. Of this number, 80 million were in Asia. In the poorer countries of Asia and Africa, an average of only about 1/3 of the children are in primary school. Almost half the primary school age children in developing countries are not getting a minimum basic education.

In the rural areas only some 10% of children receive the minimum four year's primary education required to achieve and retain basic literacy. The situation for girls is even worse, since in some countries less than one out of ten girls of primary school age is in school. Consequently, the number of illiterates over 14 years of age, especially among girls, is growing.

Educational problems are compounded by a shortage of well-trained teachers and teaching materials, as well as irrelevant curricula, which abets the tendency of children to drop out from school. An estimated 375 million school-age children were out of school in 1975, as compared to 350 million who were in school; and the situation has continued to deteriorate.

The combined effect of all this has been to stunt both the physical and mental development of the child. Those who survive the harshness of their environment face only a future of further poverty and want.

What is saddening about these statistics is their seeming unreality not only to those living in affluent societies, but also to some privileged classes in the developing societies. There are formidable walls that spare us from knowing too much about their lot, and even in our compassion, we tend to protect ourselves from inquiring fully into their real conditions, the quality and prospect of their lives.

We marvel too much at the great advances being made in science and technology, at our growing capacity to create abundance and to prolong human life, but hardly do we ever wonder how distant these things remain from the reach of millions of children on the planet.

And the situation has not been helped by recent crisis. The onset of economic crisis at the beginning of the decade brought home to us the embattlement of the developing countries — their difficult struggle against inflation at home, and recession abroad. Children were among the hardest hit. Deterioration in the already precarious situation of over 500 million children, among others, prompted UNICEF to declare the international emergency in 1974. This is 1977, and yet this year, as we begin preparations for the observance of International Year of the Child, it is very clear that the emergency still persists.

Many will say that the situation is not as bad as I have painted it, that the problems are slowly yielding to effort. But we who live in the poor developing countries feel that something above has caved in and we are trapped underneath; we hear the distant sound of the rescue party but we are running short of breath.

In Asia today, we have sought to direct a significant part of our resources towards the care and development of our young; yet when the programs are weighed, we find that our investments lag far behind in relation to our needs. And however effective our programs, it remains a fact that the situation cannot be reversed by the work of a year or a decade, but by unflagging effort and increased application of resources.

Asia's children suffer from no permanent disabilities. They have no deficiency for which there is no cure. For as Bertrand Russell once said, human nature is at least nine-tenths nurture, only one-tenth genetics.

Clearly, more effective action is called for, and it is my earnest hope that the exchange of views and experiences in this conference will lead to that result.

Today, planning in the developing world seeks increasingly to complement economic goals and strategies with specific anti-poverty measures that would have real social as well as economic benefits. Urgent attention is addressed not just to the industrialization of our economies but to the necessary distribution of incomes, the improvement of living standards, the creation of a more equitable social structure, the promotion of employment and social opportunities, the rectification of our land problems and the mobilization of women for development. Measures toward these goals promote and foster a more favorable climate for the total development of the child.

What UNICEF has since formulated as "its strategy for the delivery of basic services," we in the developing countries of Asia are also embracing as our crucial strategy for development. There exists in our countries today a common awareness that economic growth does not automatically produce social equity or progress, that the fatter one becomes, one does not necessarily spread the succulence to the weaker members of our society. But social equity or progress must be systematically brought about by meaningful social policies. Only this makes sure that man will once again be restored at the center of our national development efforts, that he will once more become the end and the beginning of the development process, and consequently, we shall once more gain a firmer grip on his future and a much clearer view of the plight of the child.

Only upon this awareness of the human dimension of development can more effective action hopefully proceed.

We in the Philippines view national development in all its aspects — economic, social, cultural, political — as a single, unified, seamless process, concerned with all groups of the population and co-extensive with the totality of the nation's life.

We recognize in the situation of our children an indelible prism of our national condition — the weaknesses of our national economy, the inchoate character of our social life, the relative youth of our political culture, and the sense of our insecurity as a nation in a world dominated by the rich and the strong.

To every statistic we find concerning the situation of children in the developing nations, there is in our country a mirror that replicates it, perhaps not quite in its grimmest aspects, but grim nonetheless.

Filipino children and youth below 21 years constitute 56.80 percent of our population. As of the last census of 1975, one out of every 10 Filipino children dies before he reaches the age of five.

Only four out of ten children receive health, nutritional, educational and other social services, considered vital to the development of the child.

Of those who enter school during the compulsory period of elementary education, 43 percent attend for a few years, drop out and lapse into functional illiteracy. This incidence of dropouts is higher than the estimated 40 percent drop-out rate indicated by UN statistics on the developing world. Of course, in the last two or three years, we have sought to reverse this tendency.

The implications of these problems upon our national prospects, and the knowledge that the conditions of our children had not substantially improved despite heavy investments in social services, figured prominently in the design of our new national development plan for the years 1973-1977. In that plan, we ordained a new commitment to the status and welfare of children, expressed in the formulation of an entirely new philosophy and system of delivery of services.

Within that scheme, we proclaimed the Philippine Child and Youth welfare Code on Human Rights Day, the 10th of December 1974. Its first principle declares: "The child is one of the most important assets of the nation. Every effort should therefore be exerted to promote his welfare and enhance his opportunities for a useful and happy life."

Two years later, on the 10th of December 1976, we proclaimed the nationwide observance of the Decade of the Filipino Child for the years 1977 to 1987. The supporting activities, coordinated by the Council for the Welfare of Children, culminated in the launching of a comprehensive, integrated national plan of action for the development of children and youth for the decade.

The basic objective of this 10-year plan is to transform within that programmed period the status of Filipino children, taking into account the whole range of services and assistance necessary to their development. Its principal strategy is to institute an integrated system of services, incorporating old as well as new services.

This is the legal framework of our commitment to our children; to transform it into operational services and living realities for our millions of junior citizens, we have molded all public and private agencies into a coordinated network of change agents.

Where it was necessary to create new agencies and offices to undertake new services, we have not hesitated to create them. Thus a few days ago, we created the new Office of Undersecretary for Non-formal Education, to formulate and implement a program for our out-of-school-youth in the Philippines. Similarly, we have set up a nutrition center, a lung center, designed to meet the high incidence of lung diseases among children, presently to be complemented by a foundation for respiratory diseases for children. We have instituted a mental-feeding program about which you have been told. At the head of this movement, of course, is the First Lady and governor of Metro Manila. The mental-feeding program, we believe, is as vital as their need for health and nutrition care for the body. We have also launched a nationwide compulsory immunization program as part of our national plan of action for the decade of the Filipino child, and in order to serve the full count of our rural children.

In most of these projects, we have been favored with assistance from the international agencies, as well as from the private sector.

All this is a measure of our commitment to the well-being of our children, and I am certain that many of its features are also to be found in the various programs for children in the rest of the Asian region.

When taken all together, these varied efforts for the children of Asia may justly gauge the concern in which Asia holds her children. And this is the spirit in which we approach the observance of the International Year of the Child in 1979, the eve of the Third UN Development Decade.

To make such observance more meaningful to the developing countries of Asia, I urge this conference to give serious thought to the declaration of a Decade of the Child in Asia, to form part of the International Year of the Child. To provide support for such a plan, the Philippines is ready to offer its facilities to host a regional consultation among Asian nations preparatory to the declaration. In this regard, a National Steering Committee to be created for the purpose of undertaking preparations for the observance of the International Year of the Child in the Philippines will be directed to assess the situation not only of children in the country, but of all countries in the Asian region.

The thread of our concerns, the likenesses of our programs, and the common alarm with which we all view the prospects of our children make of our problems certainly much more susceptible to solution today than they were, say, a decade ago. In many ways, we are learning to cope through the example and experiences we are today able to share with each other.

Nonetheless we cannot mistake the challenge.

What we face is a challenge different from any we have had to cope with in this century, and finally greater than any we have known before, for it involves at heart the whole of the human prospectus.

The fact that more than 500 million children live in a state of continuing emergency in the developing countries is in itself an indictment of the social order now prevailing in the whole world. How to alter this tragic situation is the difficult agenda of the international community today. The dimensions of this task are vast, the needs immense, and the challenge inescapable, for inaction is unthinkable when the future of so large a portion of humanity is at stake.

It is in the nature of the problems posed by the situation of our children that we cannot afford to treat them simply as a special problem, but as a test requiring our best efforts in area of global affairs — in the making of peace, in the sharing of abundance, in the building of prosperity in the developing world.

The International Declaration of the Rights of the Child states correctly that “mankind owes to the child the best it has to give.” In its ultimate implications this declaration means that we have an obligation to provide children with a social environment in which they can realize their full potential as human beings; we owe them a new and humane society thriving in a just and peaceful world.

Address of President Marcos at the 23rd Annual Convention of the District and City Engineers League of the Philippines, May 18, 1977

The Highway to Development

THIS IS YOUR 23rd annual convention. It is our custom to get together in mutual consultation for I have always looked upon your community of engineers as important participants in the work of national development. The membership of this league totals 350 city and district engineers. You are indispensable partners in Government. Upon you rest some of the most vital activities in the total national development effort. For we cannot look forward to accelerated progress and national modernization without the active participation of the highway engineers.

I noted in the last survey conducted by the Bureau of Internal Revenue as well as the Department of Local Governments and Community Development that the highest number of percentage among the services that our people would like to spend their taxes on is highways. It has always been so. As soon as I became congressman a long while back, immediately after the war, I conducted a survey in my own district, the second district of Ilocos Norte, as to what our people wanted. And there was always a triumvirate of services that they demanded — roads, irrigation, schoolhouses. A close fourth was health facilities. I note however that today there has been a change in some areas. The second requirement in the Ilocos is water and irrigation because of the dryness of the place. The third would be schoolhouses. The same thing is true of other areas that feel a lack of rain. But throughout the Philippines the second preferred area of expenditure for taxes is the operational expenses of government. I presume that this means the increase in salaries of government officers and employees. But highways are the general demand all over the Philippines. Wherever you go, highways are what our people expect from government.

Whenever there is peace and order problem, our people insist not only in the sending of government troops but in the construction of highways. Whenever there is any marketing problem, highways are the answer. And now that we speak of pollution in the Laguna de Bay area, there is a proposal that we cut down the pollution rate by building a highway around Laguna de Bay. For this is the answer in some countries, especially China, where the construction of any residential or industrial buildings around waterways or catchment basins or lakes is prohibited.

Indeed, highways has acquired the highest priority in our infrastructure program. Modern highways and communication systems are vital not only to domestic economic growth but to the stability of our country. They are vital to productivity and exchange of ideas. They are vital to exchange of culture and advancement.

Thus, the national development program, at the start of my Presidency, involved three things— roads or highways, schoolhouses, irrigation systems. Lately, however, in view of the oil crisis, we have moved up one priority item which is power. I am alarmed by this new forecast to the effect that there may even be a war over oil supply in the 1980s, if we don't gradually move into other sources of energy. And so lately there are two programs vying for number one priority in the entire infrastructure program — highways and power. At one point power was the No. 1 program, after we constructed the basic trunklines of our roads, and as we move into hydro-electric, geothermal, and nuclear power sources of energy, we will try to develop our coal deposits. We are engaged right now in active drilling for oil as well as natural gas.

You are well aware that we have dug oil, but we do not know how big the deposits are. And we have hit natural gas, but we have not yet exactly determined the volume available for us. Drilling continues. Perhaps, we are spending more funds now on the power project than on highways. But it is touch and go. Actually, we cannot say that we are spending more for power than highways. The truth of the matter is that the momentum in the construction of roads has been such that even if we wanted to, we cannot decelerate in highway construction.

Being a developing country, we did not start with a dynamic system for rapid transport and commerce. And our infrastructure needs have always been enormously complicated by the fact that we are an archipelagic nation. And so we wanted to set up what is known as Japan-Philippines Friendship highways, portions of which are financed by our Japanese friends. All the way from the North, we are going to link through one continuous highway the different lands (with the exception perhaps of two ferry areas, between Sorsogon and Samar across San Bernardino Strait, and between the southern part of Leyte into the Surigao straits, where we expect to set up ferry boats). I took this up during my conference with Prime Minister Fukuda. And we agreed that while one of the big ferry boats would be constructed in Japan, the technology for their construction should be transferred to the Philippines. We also agreed that another ferry boat should be constructed in the Philippines with the help of Japanese experts.

Our position has always been that we will never borrow money for the ordinary operations of government. We will never borrow money for ordinary expenses. Our national budget is divided into two parts. One, the ordinary expenses. The other, capital funds. Actually, these are the long-range self-liquidating projects. For instance, you borrow money from Japan for the Japan-Philippines Friendship Highway; the amount is not included in the ordinary expenditures of government, although much of the money that we spend also comes from our taxes. When we borrow money, some of our people have the impression that the money that we borrow has no counterpart in domestically-generated local funds. That is not quite true. The dollar requirement for what are known as foreign-assisted projects may be only about 40 percent of actual requirement. Sixty percent of total expenditure comes from peso counterparts. Where does his peso counterpart come from? It comes from taxes paid by the people. And so even as we borrow, we must set aside 60 percent of the requirement from taxes paid by the people.

But, anyway, we borrow only for the long-range self-liquidating projects like power, highways, irrigation, and even schoolhouses which are now considered by all economists as a long-range investment capital fund. There are many other matters for which we borrow. We support, for instance, private industry. And we guarantee loans to private industry. For the small and medium scale or cottage industry, we borrow money from abroad and then lend it, through the Development Bank of the Philippines, to small or big entrepreneurs. And these are considered self-liquidating. They are not supported by the budget. They are self-liquidating in the sense that they will ultimately pay for themselves without any money from government.

If we review the record of the last 10 years, it will be obvious we have achieved more in terms of laying the base of our infrastructure than all administrations that preceded us in the last 30 years.

The record is more impressive if we now focus on the period of the crisis government. From 1972 to 1977, the national leadership has been pursuing the task of development. We injected rationality, efficiency, and the highest standards of incorruptibility into government. During the past 4½ years, we have built infrastructure facilities throughout our country and accomplished projects in record time. And the scale of commitments we have made to the total modernization of our infrastructure program has been unprecedented.

And when we claim these achievements, we claim them as unique achievements, resulting from the partnership between you and our people, between you and our government. For you work not for me, not for the Secretary, although sometimes your loyalty and support are personal. But you are working for our people. You undertake the vital task of implementing these projects. You are the direct implementors of the policy of our people. However, as we congratulate ourselves on our achievements, we must remember that although these achievements are remarkable and important, they are merely stepping stones. There are still larger tasks. To the growing network of roads, bridges, ports, and airports we have erected, we must yet add many more to fully meet the vital requirements of our national development program. Our attention must always turn to the more complex physical targets which are spawned by our own achievement. The second-generation problems are traffic congestion, congestion of population in our cities, creation of more arteries for the region, and construction of more modern facilities.

In short, we cannot stand still and rest on the highways we have already built. With every highway, we have linked communities to one another. There are other communities in great need of the same facilities. In every region, where our infrastructure development programs have succeeded in quickening the flow of commerce, there arise new needs that must be filled. For development generates its own dynamics and its own demands. That is the problem with achievement. It sets up its own standards. And setting up its own standards, it points out additional requirements.

Well, to these demands, what is our response? The response of the political leadership is a single-minded one. We shall continue the integrated development of our infrastructure facilities. We shall commit the resources required by these programs. And we shall undertake every measure to make every peso committed to these programs count to the full value of that peso.

We have succeeded in solving the old riddle of insufficient funds for infrastructure development. And you must remember that this was the classic answer to the absence of highways construction before I became President. Before I became President, the pork barrel system was pervasive. We allowed the political leaders to allocate funds. There was no National Economic Development Authority to set up the priorities. There was no rationality in planning. As soon as I became President, I inquired as to how much money had been spent for highways, for schoolhouses, for irrigation. And then I demanded a physical inventory of the achievements. And the achievements were awfully below the actual expenditures.

We have increased our revenues from the P5 billion collections in 1969 to the present P28 billion. That's a big jump. We have saved for development. Even our percentage in the expenditures for the military was reduced from 19 percent all the way down to 14 percent. This surprises many people because it has always been the belief that the defense establishment and the military eat up most of our funds. But we have insisted that expenditures for security must not exceed 20 percent of our budget. Education, of course, takes up the greatest portion of our budget.

But in addition to this, we have so established a reputation for probity, honesty, and dependability that we have a good international credit standing. We now have received assistance from many sources in foreign lands. Today, our financial position, though still strained by the economic crisis abroad, allows us to plan for even more ambitious projects in this areas.

However, having the right policy priority and having the right physical planning program are not enough. We must have a corps of workers and builders who will be able to translate our visions into concrete realities. And this is what I wanted to talk to you about today. Almost five years have elapsed since we instituted the New Society. We are now moving, we hope, into normalcy.

Occasionally, I wonder whether the principles and standards of the New Society have been deeply rooted in the hearts and minds of those who must demonstrate by example the principles and standards of the New Society.

Of course, you and I are well aware that we have improved the quality of our engineering and technology — the technological services as well as the building up of talent in the corps of engineers in highways, in public works, in power, and in all the fields so that we may truly serve the peculiar development needs of our country. I am very proud of the achievements of Filipino engineers, Filipino technicians, Filipino scientists. I am certain that we are seeing today the brilliant manager in which the Filipino mind has risen up to the challenge, for the times test the gifts of the Filipino whether he is an engineer, a scholar, a scientist, a farmer, and a laborer.

The creative ways in which we have demonstrated our capability to meet the various problems of development in a period of economic crisis can be pointed to as achievements peculiarly our own. Our road networks penetrate today even the once inaccessible swamps of the countryside. Bridges now span difficult straits separating our islands. The bridge between Samar and Leyte is an example.

Yesterday, I inaugurated at Pulilan the North Expressway Extension. And I was happy to note from the air and on the ground its long viaduct as well as the road that goes through the swamp areas of Bulacan and Pampanga. In Metro Manila, we have established the basis for a final solution to our perennial transport and flood problems, although we still have several years to go to attain our full objectives.

However, to this corps of talent and of ingenuity, we must, however, add the commitment to the ideals of the New Society. It is not enough that we have talent. We must also have the purpose. We must also have the dedication. We must also have the commitment to the standards of efficiency and of honesty in public service.

I am happy to note that you in this Department have taken steps to clean up your own ranks. However, I am often asked exactly how sincere the effort is at cleaning up. Of course, I must congratulate the competent managerial and staff support services that the Department has given. You will remember I have always said that errors and failures of the past were due to a disorganized and corrupt administration in highways as well as in public works. Conversely, the successes we have made proceeded from the corrective measures we instituted and the rising efficiency of development management.

As our programs grow more complex, there must be a complementary growth in our professional and institutional competence. But we must look beyond competence. Your Department is especially vulnerable to the charges of corruption, weakness, and temptation. I therefore ask you to take more than ordinary steps to eliminate all possibility of any doubts on this score.

To our community of engineers, to the Department of Public Highways, we must finally look for the human dimension that can truly turn programs into living realities.

I therefore hope that in the course of his conference you have called, there will emerge new and constructive ideas that will enhance the role of the engineer in the eyes not only of the Filipino people but in the eyes of his international counterpart. I also hope that you will develop the institutional and personal support for our infrastructure development program.

I expect that you will continue managing our projects with efficiency. It is our conviction that whatever we commit to infrastructure must pay off finally in terms of our industrial and technological growth.

Today, let us therefore make a common pledge. Let us act always according to the highest standards for public service in the pursuit of our highest objectives.

I call upon all the city and district engineers to undertake their own program of policing their own ranks. Let not this policing of your ranks start only from above. I would like to see it start from below, from the engineers themselves. There is another point on which I have always called the attention of the Secretary — the unusually large expenditure on machineries and maintenance. Up to now, the expenditure on equipment seem to be higher than those of other departments, including the Armed Forces of the Philippines. I would like to see this lowered.

I have asked the Budget Commissioner to now conduct an analysis of expenditures made by the various departments of the government— not on the basis of reports submitted by your Department, but on the basis of reports from the field. Some of my representatives will directly come to your districts to inquire into these matters. Institutional reforms should be initiated as soon as required.

It is quite obvious that the bulk of the major activities of the Department of Public Highways consists of projects fully or partially funded by foreign loans.

And so I hereby order the creation of separate offices which we shall specifically indicate, after consultation with the Reorganization Commission. The most important of the loan assisted projects are those assisted by the IBRD.

Anyway, I have ordered the creation of new offices which will handle this. I will attend to this as soon as the Reorganization Commission has cleared this matter.

And so I give my congratulations, but do not feel that we are not capable of improving our work. I think you and I should now move towards further improvement and greater effort. I congratulate you on this occasion. And on behalf of the First Lady, I thank you for these beautiful trophies you have given us that look like laurel leaves.

But I would like you to relate to our people. There is the tendency to merely attend to our work without improving relations with our people. I would like you to go out of your way now to explain to our people what we are doing since the people look to you for leadership. Inasmuch as you furnish them with what they need, you are in a position, better than I am perhaps, to explain to them the New Society and what it is doing for our people. And how the highways are a part of the general effort at modernization and improving the lot of the common man.

I would like to see a stronger emphasis on rural roads in the months and years to come. Yesterday, I ordered the release of the funds for farm-to-market-roads. Instead of proudly pointing to the highway projects, we should proudly point to the rural roads. The barangay roads will really serve the common man and the farmer. I trust that you and I will continue in this general effort. I am certain that we will achieve much with your help. I am confident that our people will continue to grant our government their confidence and their trust. the field. Some of my representatives will directly come to your districts to inquire into these matters. Institutional reforms should be initiated as soon as required.

Address of President Marcos at the Pacific-Asian Congress of Municipalities, May 26, 1977

The Management of Cities

IT IS INDEED a pleasure for me to be able to come and meet with the mayors of Asia and the Pacific.

It is doubly gratifying since you add to it the possibility of meeting with most of the mayors of the Philippines. This is beginning to look like a political meeting, what with the introduction, first, of the Secretary of Local Governments and Community Development. He forgot, however, to say that I did proclaim martial law in accordance with the mandate of the Constitution because nobody else has the power to proclaim martial law even in the face of rebellion and of anarchy. He also forgot to point out that as I proclaimed martial law, it is my hope and dream that I will be able to lift martial law as soon as possible.

If this invitation had come from a less friendly source, I would have suspected that someone was trying to sow dissension in my house. For after this conference was keynoted three days ago by the Governor of Metro Manila, who is incidentally my wife, Oriental prudence and wisdom dictate that I should now keep my peace. But evidently, someone here is determined that I should have the last word in the family. Never having been known for my timidity and being only President of the Republic of the Philippines, neither wise nor prudent, I have decided to come and meet with you, the real political leaders of the various countries represented in this Conference.

At the beginning of my political career, I was asked whether I wanted to be mayor or governor. But I managed to bring about some kind of a procedure by which we would choose who would run for governor and who would run for mayor, and eliminate myself from consideration. I know the burdens of Local executives. Having been used to the more free and uninhibited ways of a young practicing attorney as well as a bachelor, I did not think I was cut out to be a mayor or governor. You know, a mayor in the Philippines — I presume that this is true everywhere else — attends to the constituency 24 hours of the day. That was not for me. So I decided to become something else. I did not know that I would end up a glorified mayor, President of the Republic of the Philippines.

But levity aside, let me say that I appreciate the gesture very much.

It has been a great and exciting privilege for us to host this meeting of the Pacific-Asian Congress of Municipalities. I do not remember having seen so many of our local mayors in one place at the same time. I do remember, however, authorizing the mayors to come here on official time. And I guess they took advantage of that. This reminds me of the political campaigns from as far back immediately after the war. I see some of the leaders who were with me in the campaigns of 1959, 1965, 1969, and more recently in the referendum and plebiscite we held in 1973, 1975, 1976. We have really been through quite a few referendums and plebiscites, have we not? Well, we are not through yet. So I guess I should deliver a good speech for the benefit of the local mayors at least. I trust that the last few days have brought the delegates closer together and brought about a deeper understanding of the problems that confront local government executives.

To gather together under one roof the representative leaders of 81 cities in 17 countries in our part of the world is for us an achievement of sorts, and for you, a splendid testimony of the kind of interaction and esprit de corps that exists as a working international organization suggests its far-reaching importance and the quality of work it has the capacity to accomplish.

Those of us who serve the national governments of our respective countries look upon your community as our indispensable partners in the administration of government and in the building of national progress. It is as such a partner that I have come here today as you conclude your conference.

During this historic decade, attention has increasingly been focused on the need for international cooperation among the states in the resolution of problems affecting the nations and the world. It has risen beyond the once dominant objective of securing world peace, to touch many new and complex issues such as the reform of the international economic order, the repair of the global environment, the plight of the developing nations, the sharing of global resources, and the resolution of the population challenge in our time.

The nations have perhaps never been more aware of the basic interdependence on one another than they are today; neither have they been more conscious of the need for urgent cooperative action among themselves.

That this imperative to cooperate has now touched our cities and local governments, to my mind, significantly enhances the attainment of what were once considered distant goals. And I would venture to add that the initiative of this Congress makes even more compelling the prospect of cooperation across a wide expanse of heterogeneous rural and urban groupings today.

For in many ways, the problems that appear so ominous on the international front find their clearest expression in the character of our cities and localities. Whether they belong to the southern or northern parts of the world, our cities embody problems of a similar nature — the concentration of population, the decay of urban life, the contrasts between the poor and the affluent, the erosion and decline of the environment, and the challenge to the will of Government.

In the developing countries, these factors assume even more compelling dimension. For it is a crucial part of our experience that our primate cities tend to sharpen rather than close the culture of poverty and underdevelopment from which we need to liberate ourselves.

Thus if at the helm of our national governments, we need today dynamic leadership and vision, we need equally an activist leadership at the helm of our cities. And there is no resolving the unique pressures posed by our urban and rural sectors, unless we build stability in our metropolitan centers. Talking about leadership in the local level, I have noticed wherever I went— whether here in the Philippines or anywhere else — that one can determine the quality of the local leadership by a single glance at the state and quality of life as well as of the physical manifestations of progress within a municipality or a city.

In many ways, the problems that appear so ominous in the international front, as I have said, do suggest the character of those cities.

What we have to recognize at the outset is that our cities pose difficult paradoxes and problems in abundance. Ostensibly, they embody the highest levels of attainment in terms of our economic, political, cultural, and communications power.

Yet beneath this primacy, there exist also undeniable conditions suggestive of decay and deterioration. It is here where we find the most compelling image of deprivation and waste, as evidenced by the stark contrasts between slums and commercial districts, or the mansions of the rich, the disappearance of the natural environment, the terrible concentration and congestion of millions, and sometimes the unavoidable eruptions into violence, anarchy and disorder.

Many of these problems have long been identified by our local governments and city executives. You are well aware of them. Yet after years of trying to cope, with these problems, most of us have only found out the real limitations of our programs and the need for radical efforts at reform.

Mayor Fasi informs me that he is surprised at discovering a common denominator in all conferences of mayors. According to him, whether the conference is in the United States or in the Philippines, there is only one principal requirement for the cities — money. That reminds me of Napoleon who once was asked what he needed for a successful war. He said: “I need three things.

The first is money, the second is money, and the third is money.”

It would appear at first that some of the cities of the advanced countries have found real and lasting solutions to their problems: even cities like New York and Paris — long the centers of progress in the planet — totter critically today under difficult and heavy burdens.

It is clear that there is great need today for fresh visions to guide the administration of our local governments, for new approaches to inject new life into our programs.

And this I believe is the real service that your organization can introduce.

There is a great need today to look boldly at the malaise of metropolitan life, to seek out their roots and to start afresh.

For we have found out that simply increasing the quantity of services is no guarantee that the quality of life for our urban populations will improve. We have seen how the very growth of our metropolitan centers has thrust us into difficult problems, such as for instance the difficulties posed by the insufficiency of zoning during the period of growth.

Our own experience in the Philippines may have its own value to those who are similarly situated as we are.

Manila is one of the oldest cities in Asia and the Pacific, and it is, for the Philippines, the primate city. As such it has been the focus of great movements and developments in our country, so much so that in the interval of centuries it was practically transformed into a metropolitan center bursting at the seams. Wave upon wave of migrants from the rural areas flooded into Manila. For a while, up to the middle of this century, the city was able to absorb these millions. But by the onset of the Sixties, the problems faced by our city government became enormous. Slums and ghettos dotted the metropolis especially after the Second World War practically wiped out all of Manila. Garbage alone became a priority problem. Social services, no matter how expanded and extended seemed to fall short of the needs.

In approaching these problems, we saw the need for a new approach to city administration itself. Basically this has consisted of two main points of concern: the need to link under one management the various cities and municipalities constituting Metropolitan Manila: and second, the need to institute a unified approach for developing these areas and for resolving their problems.

In what has since come to be called the Metro Manila Commission, we have established a managerial type of local government that in effect tries to run the problems of urban administration as though it were a business enterprise. Without displacing altogether the traditional political structures of these cities and municipalities, we have introduced fresh approaches to city administration and to the extension of needed services. For we recognized that the problems of housing, slums, environmental decay, social services, health and sanitation were all common and interconnected: and had the constituent cities persisted to act singly, there would have been no hope of a real solution.

There is nothing novel in this approach when viewed in the context of the experience of the developed cities of the West, but what is very clear here is the fact that a solution begins to take shape from the will to radicalize government administration.

The experiences of the great cities — encouraging or saddening as the case may be — show us what we can do in resolving the problems.

There is undeniably something to be gained by the new and rising urban centers in the developing nations in having before them the problems of the old cities and governments. The Philippines, learning from the lessons of other countries and other cities is probably one of the first countries to organize and set up a really effective Human Settlements Commission that plans out and prepares the organization, if not the upgrading, of satellite towns and cities to decongest the primate cities. The Human Settlements Commission also participates in the solution of some of the primary problems of the various cities. For instance, it does participate in the planning of all the cities and principal towns of the Philippines. And thus the developing countries like the Philippines posted on such problems can plan with greater insight — and well ahead of time — on the problems that growth engenders; and they are able to find recourse to every corrective measure during their very march to growth and progress. In the Philippines again, if I may point out, we have discovered that one of the principal obstacles to low-cost housing for our lower classes is the high cost of realty, of land. The Government therefore has stepped in. It has now set aside and reserved certain lands close to Manila and close to other cities and big towns of the Philippines to be utilized for housing of the lower as well as the higher classes. There is a long-range plan under which we reserve such land in order that the prices would be manageable even five or 10 years from now on.

Here in this Conference you have, I hope, availed yourselves of the unique opportunity of sharing experiences and vital information that will greatly aid us in the tasks of local administration. Many local governments have had some success in the implementation of new programs, which if shared with other local governments are likely to be useful in their own case.

And beyond such exchange, I trust you have had the opportunity to explore the possibilities of coordinating research and study of the problems we share in common: in the development of new techniques in the administration of services; and in the organization of a pool of expertise and technological know-how.

There is practically no limit to the kind of cooperation that will prove useful to the management and administration of our cities and municipalities. For the problems we face are such that they continue to grow everyday, to ramify and radiate in various ways. Within the developing world, this is a crisis that is likely to prove more and more demanding.

Many economists have spoken of the Asia and Pacific Basin as the likely center of prodigious growth and development during the next ten years. They have spoken of our countries as forming a chain in which geographical position and the shape of recent developments are auguries of progress.

As the habitat of many of the poor peoples in this part of the world, our communities can benefit from a common view on what kind of rural and urban life they should develop, at what rate of growth they should develop, and how in general they should cope with problems of modernization.

We are linked together in this optimistic vision of the future. Yet just as likely, we shall continue to be linked together, as we are now linked, by the reality of shared problems.

The fulfillment of our goals during this decade will rest upon the degree of cooperation and interaction we are capable of carrying out among our countries. And such cooperation, I believe, must fully seep down to every sector of our societies, to the very level of local governments and municipalities if our actions are to match the problems and the prospects we face.

Once again, allow me to commend the initiative taken by this Congress, most especially its leader, Mayor Fasi. I also commend those who participated in the organization and holding of this Congress, especially Mayor Bagatsing, who I understand, has been chosen to take over the leadership. I am certainly happy that there is a conference that has been called on urban problems. Now, the city administrators do not necessarily have to run to the President every time they hit on obstacle. They can go and see Mayor Bagatsing. Of course, I took care of that at the start of my administration. I created the Department of Local Governments and Community Development and appointed its Secretary. He took over that headache, but he is an old politician. So he merely transfers all the headaches back to me.

But it is my hope that our guests from across the seas will find their stay in the Philippines both fulfilling and pleasant. I trust you leave Manila with pleasant memories of the last few days and better confidence in what your organization can do to meet the problems that confront our cities and municipalities.

To each and everyone of you, again, congratulations and Mabuhay.

Address of President Marcos at the GSIS 40th anniversary celebration, May 31, 1977

The Measure of Our Concern for Human Welfare

YOU KNOW THESE ceremonies are beginning not to look like the GSIS anniversary. They are beginning to look like a wedding anniversary with all those songs — Iyong-Iyo and that new melody by Professor Salas and the members of the GSIS choral group. This is also one of the few times that I have seen the PICC session hall filled to the rafters — standing room only. At nahahalata ko itong si Jun Cruz ay talagang marunong na manager, ano? Unang-una, ibinigay niya ang painting na gawa ni Alcuaz. Alam ninyo maganda ang painting ng First Lady. Wala tayong alinlangan sa bagay na ito. Pero kung pagagandahin mo ang Presidente — sabi ko nga kay Mr. Alcuaz: the painting of the First Lady is beautiful, but the painting of the President is a little idealized. But I think they are one of the best paintings ever made of the President and the First Lady. Congratulations, Mr. Alcuaz.

Now, if only we could make the person as young as the painting. This reminds me of Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. When he was 19 years old, he met a lovely young lady while walking down Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, D.C. And he said to himself: Ah, to be 70 years old all over again.

That painting, of course, makes me look like I was a guerrilla leader all over again. The painting has the posture of a bantam cock, confident and sure of himself. He looks imperishable. May it always be so.

I am always stunned by the fact that Government has 820,000 members. The General Manager has explained to you the operations of GSIS. He failed to explain to you that out of the P27.5 billion that we spend every year, almost one-half of it goes to you in the form of salaries. And that is why not a small part of the operation of government has to do with the Government Service Insurance System. No wonder GSIS has so much money.

But actually it has been handled so well and the investments so wisely made that some day the Government will be borrowing more from the GSIS. Actually, it has been borrowing occasionally in the past, not under my administration. We have put our foot down. We do not borrow for ordinary expenditures of Government. We borrow only for what is known as capital funding, the long-term and self-liquidating investments.

Well, this day has been a day of surprises. I must say that I was also surprised to note that the GSIS coverage now includes the Metro Aide, the favorite of the Governor of Metro Manila. She actually would not allow me to stand up until I promised that I would mention the Metro Aide in my speech. This coverage of the Metro Aide indicates the solicitude and compassion which Government has shown for all its workers. I am certain that if the Governor of Metropolitan Manila had been permitted to deliver a speech here, she would have said the same thing. And probably, she would have spent more time on the Metro Aide than I was prepared to do.

Every anniversary deserves some kind of ceremony, some kind of celebration, both sentimental and pragmatic, but there are many reasons for celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Government Service Insurance System. The first is the institution itself. You are the labor group on the part of the public sector. We celebrate May 1 as Labor Day. Today, it is perhaps Employees' Day for the entire Government framework and organization of the Republic of the Philippines. This is the first reason for celebrating. The second is the impact of this organization upon the social and economic life of our nation.

The GSIS is the third largest financial institution in the country, one of the largest in Southeast Asia, and one of the oldest social security and insurance agencies in this part of the world. It is one of the two major social security institutions in the Philippines, both of which embody the high commitment of our Government and of our people to the improvement of human welfare.

It has, as the General Manager pointed out in his report, historically played a dual role: that of a social security and insurance agency, and that of a development finance institution. In this, it has confirmed the link between economic development and social security.

As a social security agency, the GSIS has been an effective instrument for mobilizing savings and capital formation. Its funds have been invested indirectly through such institutions as the DBP, PNB, Central Bank and the productive projects in food manufacturing, drug manufacturing, housing, schools and hospitals, commercial real estate, tourism facilities and many others. These investments have been beneficial both to the nation and to the individual GSIS members, including the President. You know, I periodically receive all those dividends that are sent to me. Don't think that I don't take note of this, I do. I always take note of this because my salary as all the other benefits coming from the Government work goes into a fund for the scholarship of poor and deserving students. But the General Manager speaks of some of the benefits that we may be entitled to. Don't joke about it. We might just apply for a salary loan, you know.

From its very humble beginnings in 1937, the GSIS has since become a custodian of the Government employee's welfare and in this sense has been a valued participant in the effort to connect the distribution of equity among the entire Filipino people.

Assigned to perform a sensitive task, this institution has demonstrated its competence to interpret correctly its role in a changing social environment, and to help bring about change, to the advantage of the greater number of Filipinos. Through its mature and far-sighted policies, it has helped to validate the conviction and faith of the New Society that social security goes hand in hand with economic development, that unless these twin concerns are joined, an otherwise prosperous economy could produce impressive statistics on the one hand, only to be negated by a neglected and unhappy, perhaps restless, population on the other.

For it is no secret that there are some in our midst — in business, in academe, and even in Government — who maintain that social security must take a back seat to economic development, that there can be no simultaneous relationship between these two concerns. This is to suggest that economic development must reward people only when they are productive, and ignore them when their need temporarily or permanently offsets their capacity to produce.

The proposition is downright inhuman, and unacceptable to our administration and the New Society. It offends anyone who would consider society to be the sum total of the opportunities and hardships, of the various polarities of human existence, of all its members. No man who truly looks forward to living a full life in an environment where his needs will be met, and his wants reasonably satisfied, can think of enjoying himself at the expense of neglected needy members of the community; he must expect that his needs will be met and his wants reasonably satisfied only if there is something alive in the society that seeks to ensure the equitable distribution of the care and respect of that society. Without that, with each man to himself, the chord that links the individual to the society is forever frayed, if not altogether broken.

To be sure, economic development is one of the most compelling commitments of Government. For this reason, the New Society has placed top priority in increasing and rationalizing the Government's own direct capital expenditures program, and in redesigning its policies to make the entire economic climate more conducive to productive investments. In the last four years and so many months of the New Society, we have seen the combined effort of Government and the private sector to increase the country's productive capacity, with Government providing the policies to stimulate activity and the basic infrastructure support, and the private sector investing in the factories, in agricultural and industrial technology, and the related services that would ensure a balanced, integrated and highly productive Philippine economy.

Yet the bustle of economic life and the physical change in the landscape of our cities and countryside — even the impressive networks of roads and highways, hydroelectric plants and irrigation dams, whole industrial complexes that boast of the latest advances in industrial technology — are likely to be of little consequence, if they do not enhance the welfare of individual who stands at the very center of society. For as someone long ago has written, "with all our prejudices and passions, and all our 'business instinct', we have also a sense of what is dignified. On that we must build, if we wish to leave to those who come after us the foundation. ., if we wish to leave our successors in mood and heart to continue our work, so that. . years from now, human life may really be dignified and beautiful, not just a breathless, grudging, visionless scramble from birth to death.

It is our total concern for man that inspires, governs and finally validates our economic development programs. Our aim is to afford every man a gainful occupation to provide himself and his family a standard of living that is not only adequate but dignified. This will give him the basic necessities of life, as well as the sense and substance of participation as a genuinely free individual. This sense of freedom will come to him when he no longer has to contend every day with the problem of sheer survival, when at the end of the day he could come home to a family and a home and look forward to having his share of the pleasures of learning and of leisure, the civilizing effect of art and culture, and some inward growth as a human being.

But the beneficiaries of development should also be protected from its potential ravages. This is a principle we hold inviolate: that progress shall not be won at the cost of the fragile environment in which the human community lives. Any program that is mindless of the damage done on the environment will ultimately be self-destructive.

And if economic development cannot run roughshod over the natural environment, neither can it ignore the so-called social accidents that are an inevitable companion of progress and indeed of human life itself. While our goal is to give every man and woman an opportunity to work and provide for his or her own existence, there is no guarantee that any single person who is blessed with a job will find permanent security in it. There are a wide range of contingencies, choosing their victims at random, that strike and render people incapable, whether temporarily or permanently, of continuing to earn an income and supporting themselves and their dependents. These contingencies are part of the human condition and wear a variety of grim disguises: sickness, whether at work or out of it; disability or invalidity, which can be partial or total, temporary or permanent; old age; and even, death.

These contingencies are referred to as “social accidents” by academics in a futile effort to soften their grimness. But no matter how we try, they are grim nevertheless. They rob their victims — temporarily for those who are lucky, permanently for those who are not — of the capacity to stay in the productive ranks of society; to enjoy the fruits of employment which economic progress provides them; and to continue to earn the wherewithal with which to support their families. And if they fall out of the ranks of the productive, normal and healthy sectors of society — not by choice but as victims of these contingencies, as the casualties in an idealistic war for the defense and security of our people and our country — neither they nor their families should be left and abandoned by the wayside while the rest moves on. Their loss of income must somehow be compensated; and if the damage is not permanent, they must be helped to re-integrate themselves into the normal ranks of society; to reclaim their place among the healthy and the productive; and to continue contributing their efforts to the gross national welfare.

This is the task not only of social security. This is the task of the entire Government and all the policies that are dedicated to the ideals of the New Society. It is the task of social security, however, to provide them with an income while they are incapacitated, and to rehabilitate and reintegrate them as soon as possible into normal life.

In our country, the need for allocating some fruits of economic development is dictated not only by sound development policy but by our culture as a people and a race. The alluring call of progress induces an individual to leave the built-in protection of the Filipino extended-family system, and to join an urban, impersonal, and alien environment where his only means of defense is his individual earning capability. The security of a social unit—the family — is replaced by the security of an economic unit — the working place. With one vast difference. The family continues to care for its own sick and disabled and dependents. The working place does not, unless motivated by an enlightened company policy or compelled by social legislation from Government. As we industrialize, the protective role of the family recedes and social security must take its place. Social security, in a way, combines all employers and employees into one large family. It humanizes organized industry.

Thus the link between economic development and social security is a concern for man. Progress must benefit him, not run him over. It must be beneficent, not alienating. Those who wish to participate in the country's total productive efforts and earn an income should be given every opportunity to do so this is the goal of economic development. But those who drop out from the parade from either sickness, disability, old age or death or casualty and injury arising out of the performance of one's duty either as a soldier, a teacher, or employee must be provided with some help for themselves and for their dependents: this is the goal of social security. And it is the goal of the New Society. A society that single-mindedly pursues economic development but ignores the needs of its unwilling victims is a society that is programmed to self-destruct. It cannot be defended; in the end, it cannot be preserved.

We in the Philippines have reason to be proud that we have one of the most visionary, comprehensive and compassionate social security programs in existence within the developing world. It is a program that has grown steadily during the last half century, defying first of all the false notion that only the rich can afford to have a forward-looking social security for the future. We owe this to the consistency of our social legislation, and the determination of succeeding administrations to innovate and contribute something new to existing policy.

Our program had its modest beginnings, you will recall, in 1907. That year, a Constabulary Pension and Retirement Fund was created, followed by a Teacher's Retirement and Disability Fund in 1922, and a Health Pension and Retirement Fund in 1924. All of these were liquidated in 1936 when the Philippine Legislature enacted one of the most important pieces of social legislation in this country. This was Commonwealth Act No. 186, which had for its aim, the promotion of the efficiency and welfare of the employees of the Government of the Philippines. It was this Act that created the Government Service Insurance System, which started operations on May 31, 1937, 40 years ago to this day.

The GSIS started by administering a Life-insurance Program for all permanent Government employees. In 1951, Republic Act No. 660 expanded the GSIS's benefit programs to include retirement benefits and total and permanent disability benefits. I still remember participating in the framing of this legislation as a young member of Congress. In 1957, Congress passed Republic Act No. 1616 which provided for new optional retirement schemes. In 1967, Republic Act No. 4968 further increased retirement benefits, in pension or in gratuity, of government employees. All of these were amended and refined by other laws.

In the meantime, in 1954, to encompass not only government but also private employees within the scope of social security, another significant piece of legislation was passed: Republic Act No. 1161, creating the Social Security System and providing for sickness, retirement, disability, and death benefits for private employees. Republic Act No. 1972 signalled the actual implementation of Social Security Law in 1957.

But we cannot rest on past accomplishments. We must be sensitive to changing conditions and changing needs. We must move on. The greatness of the New Society lies, among others, in its ability to provide a dynamic response to change, and indeed to manage change itself.

Over the years, the cost of living has moved upwards, and profound developments in the Philippines as well as in the global economy have affected the lives and welfare of the working man. The economy, which has stood well the crisis and seen a period of impressive growth, must now perhaps allocate part of that growth to the care of our working people in their hour of need.

Accordingly, I would like to take this occasion to issue a number of decrees and proclaim a number of policies all designed to enhance the welfare of everyone working in the service of government.

The first is a major decree "amending, expanding, increasing, and integrating the social security and insurance benefits of government employees and facilitating the payment thereof under Commonwealth Act No. 186, Republic Act No. 6111, and Presidential Decree No. 442, all as amended, and for other purposes."

This decree will fundamentally amend the GSIS charter. In the light of existing economic conditions affecting the welfare of government employees, this decree will expand and improve the social security and insurance programs administered by the GSIS. Among others, the decree will increase pension benefits, expand disability benefits, increase medical-care benefits, introduce survivorships benefits, introduce sickness-income benefits, and provide for universal coverage of all government employees by these programs.

This decree shall increase the monthly pension of future retirees by 12 per cent on the average for those earning less than P1,000 a month and by 10 per cent on the average for those earning more. In other words, the lower-income members will enjoy proportionately larger increases in their pensions than higher-income members.

Under present laws, the five-year lump sum is available to employees or officers who retire at age 63 after completing at least 18 years of service, the last three years of which need not be continuous. I wish to emphasize that contrary to rumors, the lump sum benefits will not only stay but will be liberalized.

I also wish to emphasize that contrary to another rumor, the gratuity benefits under Republic Act No. 1616 will not be abolished.

Under present laws, upon the death of a pensioner, their survivors do not receive any income benefit. Under this decree, when the pensioner dies, the widow and the orphans will receive a pension under certain conditions. This survivorship benefit is also made available to the current pensioners of the Government Service Insurance System.

Under present laws, when a retirable member dies, the legal heirs are entitled to a five-year lump sum of the pension due the deceased and thereafter the heirs do not receive any other benefits. Under this new decree, when a member dies, the beneficiaries will not only be entitled to a five-year lump sum of the pension due the deceased but thereafter the widow and the orphans will also receive a pension under certain conditions.

Under present laws, when a non-retirable member dies, the heirs do not receive any income benefits. Under this new decree, when a non-retirable member dies, the heirs are entitled to a pension or cash payment under certain conditions.

Under present laws, government officers and employees are entitled to income benefits due to work-connected sickness or injury only. Under this decree, even non-work-connected sickness or injury will be compensable under certain conditions.

Under this decree, the medical-care benefits are significantly increased for members and their dependents, a major expansion of the present Medicare Program.

The benefits granted by this decree for work-connected disability are substantially increased compared with the benefits granted under present laws. Furthermore, they are payable for the duration of the contingency, whereas present laws limit them to a period of five years or P12,200 whichever comes first.

Under this decree, an employee with only three years of service who becomes disabled due to nonwork-connected sickness or injury will be entitled to a pension, whereas they are entitled to none under existing laws.

Under this decree, life insurance of all government employees is automatic without need of medical examination and regardless of employment status, thereby rectifying the odd situation under present laws where employees not covered by any life insurance leave their dependents helpless in case of death or accident.

Under present laws, only members of the GSIS may apply for Optional Life Insurance. Under this decree, Optional Life Insurance is made available to dependents of members, thus enabling them to take advantage of the low premium rates enjoyed only by GSIS members.

This decree will also increase funeral benefits and will provide for their expeditious payment.

Under this decree, government employees will have the option to choose which Retirement Law (old or new) to avail of, thereby preserving any vested rights. I also wish to emphasize that no existing benefits, rights, or privileges at present available to government employees will be repealed, modified, or reduced by this decree. All existing benefits are preserved and improved.

In your presence, therefore, I hereby sign this Presidential Decree which grants all these new benefits to GSIS members.

My attention has been called to the discrimination against some of the officers and employees of government. I refer more specifically to the members of the various Sanggunian, who have proven themselves to be strong pillars in the workings of the democratic process under the New Society. And yet, they have no insurance coverage,

I now therefore sign another decree extending to them the same insurance coverage now enjoyed by barangay officials and by the chairman of the Kabataang Barangay under Republic Act No. 4898. All members of the Sangguniang Bayan, Sangguniang Panlalawigan, and Sangguniang Pampook will now enjoy the insurance coverage of their barangay colleagues.

I sign this decree again in your presence.

I now turn to the living retirees receiving pensions from the GSIS. I am aware that the cost of living has been going up. This is why sometime ago, I issued Presidential Decree No. 712 converting the fixed monthly pension system administered by the GSIS into an index-linked pension system. Under that decree, adjustment of monthly pensions may be made in the light of changes in price levels if recommended by the General Manager of the GSIS and approved by the President of the Philippines. I now hereby approve the recommendation by the GSIS General Manager to increase retirees' monthly pensions by five percent effective January 1, 1977, and hereby direct the GSIS to release the retroactive increase immediately as soon as the amounts can be computed.

I understand there are still about 300 teachers and more than 100 other beneficiaries who are receiving pensions under Act No. 3050 passed in 1922, otherwise known as the Teachers' Pension and Disability Fund. This Fund was phased out when the GSIS was created, but there is still a small number of living beneficiaries of this fund. These are the full-time teachers, supervisors, inspectors, superintendents, and other officials who retired before World War II. As a tribute to these old unsung public school teachers and officials who are now in the twilight of their lives, I hereby sign this Presidential Decree that will increase their monthly pension by P100.00 for the pensioners and by P50.00 for the other beneficiaries.

I also hereby approve the recommendation of the General Manager of the GSIS to reorient the loans-and-investments policies of the System to make them directly supportive of its social-security and insurance operations. The GSIS has performed a pervasive role in the economic development of the country. It can now concentrate on its mission of providing social security and insurance benefits to its members and reduce its development-banking role. The GSIS can now de-emphasize its business loans, and devote its investments to service loans to members and to the purchase of Government and private securities from the capital market. This recommendation of the GSIS General Manager has been endorsed by the Monetary Board and the Secretary of Finance. Today in your presence, I approve it.

This does not mean that the GSIS will withdraw its financial resources from development projects completely. It will merely mean that it will insulate itself from developmental risks. One area that should not be adversely affected by the GSIS's reorientation of its loans and investments policies is housing. The magnitude of our housing requirements is such that the resources of the GSIS and the SSS are no longer sufficient to support the housing program and should therefore be augmented. This can be done by raising funds in the capital market here and abroad. What we need is a steady and reliable cash inflow for the Government's housing efforts.

Accordingly, in order to be able to tap the funds not only of the GSIS and the SSS but also those available in the local and foreign capital markets, I will now sign before you a decree establishing an Integrated Program for Home Mortgage Financing. It will create a National Home Mortgage Finance Corporation. It also establishes a package of sources from which this new Mortgage Corporation will draw a steady and reliable stream of cash inflow to support what will now be an unprecedented massive housing program throughout the entire Philippines.

Capital contributions to the new Corporation will come from the GSIS, the SSS, the DBP, the PNB, and the Land Bank. It will raise funds through the issuance, sale, and flotation of bonds which will carry features that will make them attractive for investments by banks and insurance companies. We will also call on the financial institutions, both Government and private, to recognize their social obligations to the community by devoting a certain portion of their portfolios to investments in these bonds.

The Mortgage Corporation is also empowered to negotiate for loans from all sources, local and foreign. To augment the housing fund further, the decree imposes an additional residence tax, as well as a tax on high-cost dwellings, in order that the rich will subsidize the housing needs of the poor. The government will from time to time appropriate funds to augment the resources of the Corporation.

The decree will also impose incremental SSS and GSIS premiums on their high-income members to constitute one of the regular sources of housing funds. These additional premiums are not a straight tax but will purchase additional social security benefits from these systems. However, the proceeds of these additional premiums shall be reserved by both systems for lending to the Mortgage Corporation either directly or through the purchase of its bonds.

The Mortgage Corporation can then use its vast assets for leverage purposes, to raise even more funds from the local and foreign capital markets.

These corporations will also assist in establishing a secondary-mortgage market in this country, one of the requirements of an effective program for financing home construction and ownership for an increasing number of Filipinos.

I would like to state that the two problems on housing have always been the high cost of lands, and the absence of end-user financing. The second problem I hope will be met by the second-mortgage financing set up by this mortgage corporation. On the high cost of lands, I have adopted a policy to reserve public lands and expropriate private lands for housing and other purposes wherein Government will advance the necessary funds and hold the land in trust for (1) the members of the GSIS and the SSS who up to now have no homes; (2) those who are not members of these systems who may want to own homes themselves. These two problems will therefore be met frontally by Government. The second problem we meet today. In your presence, I sign this all-important decree establishing an integrated program for home mortgage financing; creating a nationwide home-mortgage finance corporation, and defining its powers and functions, and providing funds therefore as well as for other purposes.

To complement this measure and to mobilize additional resources for the housing program, I propose the adoption of a system of voluntary savings by Government personnel. Accordingly, I hereby direct the General Manager to devise the mechanics of the system and to recommend immediately the incentives necessary to encourage members of the civil service to voluntarily set aside a portion of their salary, say, five per cent, for housing finance. It will be the duty and obligation of the GSIS, starting today, to survey all its members to find out who will voluntarily participate in this effort because they are in need of homes. I appeal to all those who still have no homes to now immediately come and enlist themselves in this effort to provide homes for all those who are in need of them.

Again, my congratulations to the Government Service Insurance System and to its General Manager. I think I have given enough gifts on your birthday. I would like to say that you have actually given me more not only on this day, but each day that you work for our people.

Address of President Marcos at the National Conference on Environmental Management in commemoration of World Environment Day, June 6, 1977

Progress and the Human Environment

MY PRESENCE HERE today is an official indication of the importance of the work of environmental control. I am the chairman of three councils. The first is the National Economic Development Authority, a constitutional body. It is the single national body engaged in economic planning. The second is the National Security Council. The General Military Council is a contributing body of the National Security Council, both of which I chair. These are the two councils in Government which I head. On April 18, as a part of the initial inter-agency committee on environmental protection, we organized the National Environmental Council of which I am also chairman. This emphasizes the need for the entire citizenry to participate in this effort.

I came here today to call the attention of the entire nation to the urgency of the task on this matter. Yesterday was supposed to be Environmental Day under the United Nations' resolution. We celebrate it today because today is Monday.

As we open this Conference this morning, on this international observance of World Environment Day, it is indeed gratifying to note that so many nations around the world are also holding their own commemoration of this important day, and so many among our countrymen are here to join in this observance.

This is a phenomenon suggestive of the worldwide concern that has followed the historic Stockholm Declaration in 1972 which for the first time noted the pervasive decay of the human environment and asserted the fundamental right of man to live in an environment worthy of his dignity and well-being. And if anything is truly new about the situation today, it is no doubt the fact that we are beginning to see the problem of environment as a whole, and many propitious initiatives are now being taken by the nations, separately and together, towards its full resolution.

We have grown, I think, not only in our anxiety about the problems; more important, we have grown in our understanding of them, and in our capacity to cope with them and to resolve them.

One measure of the change that has taken place is the spirit in which we respond to the so-called environmental crisis. At the time of the historic Stockholm Conference, it was fashionable to speak of the crisis as the inevitable result of a world gone berserk with technology and industry, and portents were everywhere sounded in advanced countries that progress had made of the earth a vast wasteland.

After five years, we know a little bit better than this. The decay of the global environment affects all the nations in common — those that have reached the very heights of technological progress, and those that have barely touched its slopes, in nation after nation, the symptoms of environmental decay have been revealed to us, and it is now no more possible for the developing country to imagine itself spared of the onslaughts of the crisis, than for the advanced country to imagine that the problem would disappear in the course of time.

And side by side with this perception, we now experience after five years a considerably more optimistic outlook about the situation to match the doomsday proclamations that greeted the crisis of the Sixties.

Incidentally, this doomsday attitude is still in the media. I would like to note that media, being as they are, tend to paint the darkest side of the picture. Our media here apparently are still in the Sixties on this particular subject. This is an objective appraisal of the situation, as the media are wont to say. They say they are objective about this, but you can see the tendency. They never print what we are doing but they print what is decaying and what is happening to our environment. However, it is our hope that after this conference they will know better. In nation after nation too, anxiety has been followed with earnest efforts to grasp the nature of the crisis. And from knowledge, have come the beginnings of resolution and of response.

One cannot emphasize enough the object lesson of this development in terms of the plight of the developing nations. At the very start, the environmental crisis seemed to pose one of the most perplexing predicaments to the developing nations. For what they had before them then was the example of the developed nation marshalling the will to produce abundance with the aid of modern technology, but loudly proclaiming at the same time their despair with their industrial technology — the same technology from which arose all their affluence and all their wealth. To make progress — which we desperately needed then and need now — we would have, it seemed then, to pay the inevitable costs of industrial progress, in terms of the pollution of our air, our rivers, our streams, our seas, our natural environment itself. And the example of the developed nations only served to magnify the grim dilemma. In our innocence, in our naivete, and in our ignorance, we appeared condemned to make an impossible choice. Today we know better.

We know now and we believe that we can make progress, without inflicting irreparable harm upon the environment.

We know now, and we believe, that industrial progress and environmental protection are complementary goals that reinforce rather than exclude each other.

And we know this to be a challenge we are fully capable of resolving, according to our special circumstances as a developing country with a will to achieve, and within the limits that our wisdom and our knowledge will allow.

For me, there is much to fear from a sentimental view of the natural environment and a distrusting attitude towards the possibilities of science and technology. If it be true that the science of abundance has indeed sired the malaise of the advanced societies in our time, then that same science, too, abetted by the will and wisdom of human institutions, can be the instrument whereby our struggling nations can bypass the experience of those who have developed ahead of us, and create the harmony between progress and the human environment, between social advancement and human welfare.

But this is not the measure of our commitment to the environment. For I must tell you that whenever there shall be any choice now or in the future between maintaining our environment and progress, I would rather that for the moment we maintain our environment. This is the measure of our commitment for the cause of environmental protection. This is the meaning of this First National Conference on Environmental Management.

We are a country justly famed for its vast and varied natural inheritance. Geography has endowed this nation the blessings of the resources of mountains, land masses, rivers and oceans, of a climate that allows for year-round agriculture, and of a homogeneity among its islands. For it to develop, we have to draw greatly from this vast capital of natural resources to support the modernization effort. We have to exploit our forests, mountains and seas for their wealth. And we must process them in order to derive the greatest benefits from this wealth.

But let me restate all over again that our objective will be to reach the point where we don't need to cut our trees in order to develop economically.

In such a great effort, it is no doubt inevitable that the natural environment will yield part of its pristine bounty and beauty. To turn vast tracts of idle land into farms, to dig for minerals in the mountains, to direct the flow of rivers towards human cultivation, to explore the seas for marine deposits — all these are timeless activities of man in order to live by the fruits of nature.

But if this push to create wealth is creative of tensions with the natural environment, that is not to say that such tensions cannot be managed and controlled. Except for a few resources, all natural resources can be replenished and even developed to confer more human benefits.

This is not a situation in which man is deemed to rape, and nature to perish. We start from this basic assumption.

The key is to strike the proper balance between the human need to harness and develop the bounty of the environment and his equally consuming need for natural beauty and sustenance. They are reinforcing needs, just as nature and man are meant to sustain each other, and this has always marked the human journey on the planet, captured vividly in the timeless image of man and nature being “the salt of the earth.”

To find and maintain this balance is the first and most fundamental task of national policy. It is your task and it is my task. This must be the cornerstone of such a wide-ranging effort as a national development program.

What then is our policy?

Basically, it narrows down to this: to create and develop those conditions under which man and nature can thrive in harmony; to fulfill the economic and other needs of generations of Filipinos; to attain an environment conducive to the dignity and well-being of our people; and to make of these harmonies a resource in itself that will serve both those who live today and posterity.

These goals, broadly conceived, find their life in practice in an entire series of programs, the central objective of which is the creation of wealth and the protection of the natural environment. There are innumerable routes open to a nation in its pursuit of progress; man alone defines and sets the boundaries for his quest. At an earlier time, he carved those boundaries pretty much at will, for in a sense he had the whole of world and of all nature to explore, and he was too infinitesimal to exhaust it. Today, he is not so puny, either in his numbers or in his means to master his environment.

The way of development must have today very clear guidelines for the harmonious balance that we speak of. In our case, we have defined those guidelines in these terms.

First, that development must be planned, with central emphasis placed on the particular endowments of the environment. Until the arrival of industrialization and advanced technology, there was in a sense natural guidance provided by the natural contours of land and sea to the quest of man for progress. Cities arose on the banks of rivers and the shores of embankments. Farm settlements emerged on the plains and slopes of mountains, naturally and instinctively.

But this ecological balance was made impossible by the very thrust of modern industry, as the cities spilled to the countryside, and the countryside itself began to emerge as urban communities.

To plan development according to these instruments for progress, a nation not only pays attention to the economic factor of labor, technology and capital, it must also plan out the physical shape of the emerging society. It cannot avoid zoning the landscape for effective land utilization and for creating livable communities out of what was once only vast spaces of land.

In this, the example of the developed nations and the early experiences with industrialization of the developing countries provide compelling lessons in planning. Modern industry, with its unique capacity for creating waste and for polluting the environment, sooner or later, rapes the environment and makes it impossible for man literally to live, when allowed to grow and develop at will without some kind of orientation and limitation.

Today, we cannot avoid, in short, planning specifically the shape of our cities and urban centers, not in the framework of years, but of decades, and perhaps of centuries. We have to imagine the shape of the human environment, making provisions for the forces of production, for the needs of communities for services, for the needs for housing and recreation, and for the needs for commerce and social life.

Our attention must be placed secondly on creating a proper balance between the exploitation and not merely the protection but regeneration of natural resources. The great lesson of the environmental crisis is that man must constantly restore to nature what he extracts, if he is to have something to claim at all tomorrow.

The so-called culture of poverty is precisely detrimental to the environment, because the very struggle against want, the very struggle for survival, sometimes dictates possession on any terms and by whatever means of the resources available. To the poor the most important is survival, not protection of the environment. It is dramatically illustrated in our case by the work of the kaingero, who ravages every patch of ground he can lay his hands on, to extract some food for his family. It may be uneconomic, but it is the only available source of life for him. Poverty does not provide any pattern for human fulfillment, except the monotony of want and misery and continuous destruction of the environment.

But precisely for this misery, a developing country must exert every effort to protect its resources against this natural tendency to pillage. Therefore, the first attack must be against poverty. For its wages are not only told in vanished resources, but also in terms of natural catastrophes— the catastrophe of floods, earthquakes, landslides and droughts. And so you see the sustenance and protection of the natural environment is a much faster task than you and I would care to meet. It is the very essence of social engineering. It is the task of the political leader as well as the natural scientist. And therefore, it is the task of the whole nation.

In the jargon of environmentalists and technocrats, this is fundamentally the problem of maintaining the ecosystem, whereby nature regenerates. As far back as the Thirties, our concern for this evolved into various forest and fishing laws. Today, it finds expression in crash programs of reforestation. But more important it has brought us into such unprecedented programs as the conservation of water resources, the zoning of the seas, the declaration of certain areas as prohibited for human habitation.

Indeed, if we measure our efforts against our problems, the total effort is wanting, and you have a feeling of frustration. In forestry alone, we are still engaged in a struggle to bring the level of forest renewal to the same level as forest denudation. While forest denudation today runs at the rate of 80,000 hectares per year, the renewal rate is only 30,000 hectares. Certainly the statistics are an improvement on the record of the previous years, but let us not delude ourselves into thinking that the problem is now solved just because the deficit is 50,000 and not 80,000.

Forest protection, to focus on one aspect of the problem, is still inadequate and nobody knows this more than I do, considering that in 1977, an area of 1,095 hectares was deforested due to fires which hit the 145,900 hectares of watersheds in Mountain Province. There have been reports from the military to the effect that there may be mischievous parties engaged in actual destruction. But that is neither here nor there. Fires occur at a frequency of one in every four days in this all important and critical watershed. And we have only one forest guard for every 20,000 hectares. Now, what can one forest guard do in 20,000 hectares? Do you expect him to run around the 20,000 hectares every 24 hours? Plainly, we must strive to increase the ratio, and this comes from the Secretary of Natural Resources. He says: "We must increase the ratio from 1:20,000 to 1: 3,000." Laudable, but what will one guard in 3,000 hectares be doing? The situation will be alleviated but certainly not solved. We are now engaged in alleviating similar disproportions in other aspects and other dimensions of our society. For instance, we are trying to increase the number of medical professionals in relation to the number of patients. And that same protection must surely extend to the problem of protecting our marine and riverine resources.

And this is why we are met today, and this is why we are engaged in this effort.

A third priority area of concern must be the development of appropriate technologies for resource utilization, and for improving environmental protection and resource regeneration.

This is the key problem area in our country, because we are poor precisely in the fact that our level of technology, has no strong indigenous ground to support it. Except in its rudimentary stages, our production technology is mostly imported from the developed world of the West, which means, among others, that it carries with it the potential for havoc and environmental degradation.

Development in the advanced nations along the lines of reducing pollutant effects of machines offer possibilities for similar technology transfer. But we must face the fact that this is an effort only now beginning in the world of modern science and technology.

We must exert every effort, yes, to bring in these new technological innovations, but we must also learn to develop our own environmental devices, particularly in those processing activities which are traditional or indigenous. We should have the vision to invest in Filipino ingenuity and capacity for invention and research.

The same importance must likewise be given to the development of technology for non-traditional resource utilization. This involves a diverse field of activities including the establishment of a pilot processing plant for euchema processing, the development of suitable processes of nitrogen for explosives, the utilization of sulphur by-products in the manufacture of fertilizer, the recovery of iron from nickel, tailings, and the processing of refractory bricks.

On the way here, I rode with Dr. Magno of the National Science Development Board. And of course, I have always been asking all who are engaged in science that we now utilize our own efforts, ingenuity, and inventiveness, in say, the coconut products. Immediately after I became President, I ordered that some kind of research be done on coconut products. Well, I have been President for sometime now, and they are still engaged in experimentation. Now, I would like to see this finally brought to at least a pilot stage so we can utilize our products instead of importing them or throwing away all these by-products of the coconut resulting in pollution.

Anyway, that is an example of what we are trying to do. I am due to meet with the scientists on Thursday this week.

The point here is that we must make optimum use of our natural resources. I am far from happy with the waste that results from the incomplete utilization of natural resources. For every tree that is cut, we throw away 60 percent and utilize only 40 percent. Did you know that? Now, why? I have asked this question since I became President. Why are we throwing away 60 percent of the tree? Some have come up with an answer: we don't have the technology. Well, let's have the technology. Of course, this is easier said than done.

I notice that Dr. Roque is here, and I am very glad to see that he is engaged in some of this experimentation. I visited the Technological Center during the inauguration of the department and I saw the solar-power-assisted ice plant.

Well, anyway, I was very proud to see that it was made possible by a team of Filipino scientists. You know, many of these traders come to me because they know I am interested in solar power. There is Ronnie there who is sometimes more interested in buying oil than in anything else. I don't blame him because he is criticized every time there is any danger of deficiency. But I have been told that several countries in the world are a little more advanced than the others on solar power. I am proud to say that this project on the solar power assisted ice plant is made possible by a team of Filipino scientists, both from the University of the Philippines and the Department. But I hope that the other universities will take note about these experiments. We encourage the participation of academe in all these efforts. I hope that we will now be able to apply this model all over the world, and that these ice plants will no longer make any demand on the PNOC. Someday it will provide at least 50 percent of the power required for these ice plants.

I also note the gains being made in the area of recycling technology being undertaken by a number of research centers in the country — bio-gas, etc. We are now in the process of organizing the recycling of lubrication oil and the like.

In each of these areas, we have moved with the requisite policy tools, programs, and laws to make the problems respond to effort. Taken all together, this action program constitutes an intensive effort to merge national development goals with environmental protection. And we take heart in the verdict handed by the United Nations Environmental Programme that we have today in the Philippines the most advanced environmental program among the developing nations.

I have kidded all the people engaged in this program. Yes, we have got a program, it's in writing. And I am going to announce a code today. I hope it doesn't just end up as a code.

In sum that verdict has commended the sophistication of our organizational structures, the quality of our expertise, and the relevance of our research program, laws and policies. I am encouraged to think that this is so because we have introduced into our environmental planning and protection program a positive philosophy about the development process itself. It is not a retreat from technology, but an affirmative effort to make industrial progress exist side by side with environmental conservation. Now this is a matter that is the dream of every visionary, I suppose. It is not inspired by fear of exploring our natural environment, but by the belief that knowledge and science are the means to master the dilemma posed by economic change.

The fluidity of the environmental situation in our country, under the stresses of change in our economic and social life, especially brought about by the New Society, poses however a problem to which these early initiatives will not be adequate in the near future. This is made evident by the fact that we are daily being exercised by new developments and problems that require us to act not just as change agents per se for the purpose of change but as environmentalists.

To cite an instance, the recent water shortage crisis besides being a formidable economic challenge was also in the final analysis a challenge to our environmental policies. Along with the actions we took to remedy the crisis and to plan for the future, we decided to write a new water code, unprecedented in our history and setting water as an invaluable water resource.

This highlights the importance of our decision to create the National Environmental Protection Council, which was charged with the task of making a continuous study of the environmental situation in the country, and of making policy and program recommendations to the President.

Incidentally, we have taken various steps in phases — the inter-agency groupings, the special committee created under the Department of Natural Resources, and now this Council. And, if after a while, we discover that there is need for the creation of a separate department for environmental control, I wish to announce now that it is my intention to create such a department as a separate department for the enforcement of such policies.

Today, I will sign this enabling decree for the purpose of raising the many strands of our concerns. This objective is on the level of national attention. We must secure for it the support that it deserves from everyone.

I will sign the enabling decrees for this purpose; first, a decree defining the national environmental policy, which sets as an inalienable right of generations of Filipinos the right to a healthy environment; and second, a decree establishing an Environment Code for the Philippines.

The first Decree gathers together into a single document the various policy approaches that underline our programs for environmental protection and planning. This is the first time in the Philippines that we have ever put a policy into a decree because policies are usually established as the preamble or the whereas of a decree. But now we have segregated this as a mechanism to emphasize the fact that this particular policy has the force of law and will be utilized as a basis for implementing laws. It defines in a law the measure of our commitment to this objective.

The same declaration of policy finds meaning and substance in the management policies and quality standards for every specific area of environmental concern in the Philippine Environment Code. The Code for the first time sets these standards and guidelines on all aspects of the national environment — air quality management, water quality management, land use management, natural resources management and conservation, conservation and utilization of surface and ground waters, waste management, and the maintenance of population-environment balance. In addition, the Code integrates environmental education into the school curriculum and encourages continuing research on environmental management, with provisions for tax incentives on the importation and manufacture of anti-pollution equipment.

The promulgation of these decrees will be followed immediately by various laws which will attack specific environmental problems. So in your presence, I hereby sign the Presidential Decree on environmental policy. It is actually embodied in only three pages of basic policy. I now sign in your presence the implementing code, the Philippine Environment Code. I cannot now go into the details of this Code which I have outlined to you. But I will ask that this be published in full because it is due to affect the life of every citizen in the Philippines.

There are some implementing laws. First, I would like to announce that as a basic policy the forest cover in the entire Philippines in its entire land area will not be less than 40 percent of such land area. Second, the present agricultural land shall by no means ever be converted into industrial or residential estates. Third, I hereby direct as a matter of policy that all governments — national, provincial, city and municipal — are empowered now to reserve with the participation of the corresponding government agency all public and private lands — and if private, subject to expropriation — required for future expansion of the municipality, province, or city. Guidelines for the expropriation of the land for ecological purposes such as parks, forest reserves, public beaches shall be that they fall under existing expropriation laws of the land. I hereby sign the Letter of Instructions which I consider of the utmost importance. As I said before, the weakness of our present efforts is the lack of an implementing agency. And even if I appoint more commissioners in the National Pollution Control Commission, as I intend to do, they may not have the means to enforce the policies.

I hereby, as of today, implement Residential Decree 984 commonly known as the Pollution Control Law, and hereby deputize all members of the Armed Forces of the Philippines and the various police law enforcement agencies under the Department of National Defense to extend assistance to the National Pollution Control Commission in the enforcement of environmental laws as well as the decisions and orders for this Commission. Reports will be made of the action they have taken to the National Environmental Protection Council as well as to the President directly.

In addition to the police, of course, we shall include the barangay leaders in the enforcement. And I sign this in your presence.

The executive director of the National Environmental Protection Council Secretariat under Dr. Roque is the Secretary. You can see he is a good executive. He transferred responsibility immediately to the secretariat. The secretariat is hereby ordered to establish an administrative system for the evaluation of the environmental impact of the projects being undertaken by government agencies. And the reports should be submitted to the Council as well as to me.

One, I hereby announce that within one year from today all cars, trucks, buses, and motor vehicles shall be compelled to utilize anti-pollutant devices or anti-emission devices. Otherwise, they will not be allowed for registration.

Two, I hereby give all factories situated in urban population centers, especially Metro Manila, to relocate themselves within ten years. And as an alternative, to utilize anti-pollution devices that shall be acceptable to the National Pollution Control Commission.

Now, on dynamite blast fishing. I understand there are still provinces infested with people using explosives, chemicals, electrical devices, and other illegal means. I hereby make responsible the barangay captains and barangay councils. If there is anyone caught in their respective barangays without their reporting it, they shall be immediately suspended from public office and the proper criminal action filed against them.

You know I have utilized almost every means, including the Constabulary, on this. But I understand that this is still continuing. Barely a few days ago, I went up to the North. They pointed out to me an area of coral reefs that have been destroyed. I am not a fashionable skin diver. I don't go very deep anymore, but I occasionally do. And I like to see the growth of underwater resources. Anybody who can go down, say, 10 feet or 20 feet can see the destruction. So I think we should be more strict about this. I sign this decree in your presence.

Now, the planting of trees. You know this has caused some consternation among some people. For instance, I was asked: how about us who live in condominiums? Where do we plant a tree? And I said: if you don't have enough ingenuity to look for land on which to plant a tree, you have no business living in the Philippines. You better look for another country in which to live. Of course, it was asked in levity, and I also answered in levity.

But anyway, I hereby approve the implementing rules as well as some amendments to this decree making the requirement much clearer. Yes, we found some loopholes in the original decree. And so I immediately amended it. Well, the director is responsible for the people under him. For instance, people under the Director of Mines are notorious in not planting trees. No, I'm kidding, of course. But you know that in this open pit mining, they just keep on raking in and raking in not just the soil but money. And they forget about the trees. Of course, some of these big miners keep repeating that if I would only give them the power, they will forest all the barren hills of the country. What power? I must give them the power so that these will become leases not only for 50 years but for 100 years. I said: Do you know what you are asking for? You are asking me to violate the Constitution. The Constitution is very clear. The leases are limited to 25 plus 25. How can we do that? Well, let's amend the Constitution.

Anyway, I think that this will clarify everything. I will order that this amendment be now printed in full for the information of everybody. And there will be no doubt as to the responsibilities of each one. The implementing regulations of this Presidential Decree require the planting of one tree every month for five consecutive years by every citizen in the Philippines. Probably, we will be remembered in other parts of the world only for this particular decree. I understand that some of the newspapers in Europe and the United States printed this decree in full, the only thing that they ever bothered to mention about the Philippines. Of course, with the exception of our problems with the MNLF. We will be known for the tree planting decree and the MNLF.

I think this is a good decree. And we smile and think that it's one of those brainstorm of the President. He will forget about it in a week. So let's go along with him. Well, I can tell you that there are some penalties that I have added to the decree. And I may forget about it. But the fellows who are enforcing it will not. And every month I am going to ask for a report. And if these people who are enforcing it do not see that it is enforced, they will get punished.

And so, I appeal to everybody to now participate in this general effort. Today, as we talk about environmental protection, even if we don't do anything except to convince people to plant trees, we will have done a lot to protect the environment. I know that all of you, especially the traders on anti-pollution devices, are listening to this speech because I think somebody leaked out the fact that I was going to compel every car owner to put in an anti-pollutant or anti-emission device. I would like to tell you that there is going to be no particular brand specified and any brand, any make, any device provided it is acceptable to the National Pollution Control Commission, not the Land Transportation Commission, will be allowed.

I therefore approve these rules and regulations.

Anyway, allow me to congratulate all those who are devoting their time, their talents, and their energies to this effort. This is an effort for which we probably will not be thanked today, but our children will know that at least there were a few men and women of foresight who thought of taking these steps now before the decay of our environment had advanced irreversibly. I pray that these deliberations will contribute counsel and assistance necessary for the fulfillment of these national initiatives. And I am certain that with the guidelines that we have established, we will be able to accomplish such objectives.

Again, to each and everyone of you, to the National Environmental Protection Council, to the secretariat headed by Dr. Roque, my congratulations on this day. And tomorrow I intend to make appointments to the National Pollution Control Commission who can start working on the specific cases of pollution of our environment.

Address of President Marcos at the 79th Independence Day celebration, June 12, 1977

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 79th Independence Day celebration

[Delivered on June 12, 1977]

One Nation, One Spirit

ON THIS OCCASION marking the 79th anniversary of our independence we join once again in thanksgiving and prayer for the continued vitality and strength of our republic.

Though many of you will probably find our observance today too simple and austere, there is nothing to dim our sense of pride and achievement as we enter our 80th year.

Seventy-nine years is but a brief interlude in the life of a nation. But for us, each of those years has mirrored much more than our trials, the courage; resourcefulness and indomitable spirit with which we have faced the most exacting challenge to the nation. With these qualities we have overcome the painful experience of colonization, the nightmare of war and occupation, the frustrations of post-war reconstruction.

It took all for Our government and our people to sense finally, in 1972, that the Society was beginning to break up as the political will had begun to breakdown. Our response to this peril was to arrest the drift to decay and anarchy. Regaining the political will, we launched our nation on a program of development and reform so unlike any program we ever had the means of the imagination to launch before. Today, we stand on the threshold of a new peril in our history, in which everything seems so different in quality from was once before.

After 79 years of dedicated labor, our sovereignty is no longer an illusion but a fact. Without forgetting our own limitations, our external relations today stretch across all the centers of power, communication, commerce and trade the globe, which means that we have begun to play the game of nation in a multipolar world, a fact that we must attribute to the increasing vigor of our domestic policy. For after an interval of a quarter century since the second world war, the complexion of global affairs profoundly changed and there came with it a new challenge to the nations of Asia and Africa — the challenge of self-reliance, the challenge to examine and nurse afresh the meaning of national independence as the guide towards the future.

On this principle of self-reliance, we anchored our bid for national regeneration.

From it has issued the will to transform our political system and to strengthen our government; to plan and set priorities for the national economy; to institute basic social and economic reform; and to change the entire pattern of our relations with the rest of the world.

Progress towards these goals for national transformation has been steady and continuing, and it finds its fullest measure in the tone and substance we have attained in our social life, the purpose and leadership of our government today, the new vigor and productivity of the national economy, and the thrust of our social and welfare programs. These internal changes are also reflected in the new ties of friendship we have built with all nations as witness our active role in the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, our new perspectives on the United States, Western Europe and Japan, our newly established ties with the socialist countries, and our vigorous participation in the policies and pursuits of the Third World.

Yet we cannot look upon these gains as having exhausted the limits of our capacities nor do they constitute a full response to the challenges and the perils that lie ahead.

It is imperative that we realize this, for the years ahead will continue to be years of crisis. There are too many uncertainties for over-confident projections.

For the dangers that confronted our country five years ago are still with us although their manifestations are less intense. And the economic energy and Environmental crisis are now urgent problems of survival to meet them adequately, the country needs the cooperation of every man, woman and child.

The continuing need to husband our resources harden our will and sharpen our competence to unite and endure in the face of varied problems still looming, large, urges us to be sober and austere in our celebration of independence day today.

In the area of security, for instance, there may clearly be no immediate danger of external aggression upon our country. But we continue to be beset by insurgency.

We must continue to seek effective arrangements to stabilize the work of individual governments and regional undertaking in Asia.

And we must persist in the intensive effort at maintaining the sovereignty and authority of the republic as well as assuring its territorial integrity. The coming year will be crucial to our survival.

Peace in our view can best be fostered by the development of closer relations among all nations regardless of ideology and social systems, and by the maintenance of a stable equilibrium of influence among the major powers of Asia.

It is in keeping with this view that we have sought to renegotiate our defense arrangements with the United States. The US decision to reduce its troops in Korea while maintaining its presence in Asia conforms fully with the new realities, and we foresee other adjustments being made in other parts of Asia. Whatever direction American policy finally takes in the area of regional security and defense, we are anxious that it does not find us too ill-prepared to assume our own burdens. And this is the time to prepare.

This is one of the big question marks of our future. But barring outright war among the great powers or massive infiltration into our country, we should be able to maintain our security.

The development of our ties with our Asian neighbors as well as with the communist countries and the rest of the Third World has an important bearing on our efforts for peace, just as much as it has on the future of economic cooperation.

In the last two years, our celebration of Independence Day coincided with the conclusion of major initiatives on our part to strengthen the pattern of our foreign relations. In June 1975, we established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China; and in June 1976, we formalized ties with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. This effort to build links with the communist countries has today been strengthened by the opening of ties with the new communist regime of mainland Southeast Asia.

These fully complement and enhance the high objectives of our ASEAN community, which in February 1976 in Bali issued a dramatic declaration for ASEAN cooperation. Both its recent landmark declarations and its map of cooperative projects that are on the way to implementation, make of ASEAN potentially the strongest force for stability and progress in Southeast Asia.

This is so because the ASEAN effort is directed at the principal source of tension and conflict in our region — the continued poverty and deprivation of Southeast Asian peoples.

On the domestic front, this outlook finds its clearest expression in the thrust of our development programs towards the rural areas. The case of Mindanao provides a vivid example because it provides both an instance of civil strife arising from social and economic causes, and an example of how effectively the problem of rebellion can be met by development programs.

It is also in Mindanao that the sense of unity, which is fundamental to survival and growth, is being tested and its value dramatized. The essentialness of our people, dimmed at times by circumstances and events in our history, must now be fully integrated into the national subconscious.

The rest of the nation must identify itself with our southern communities, so that our southern communities in turn will more easily now identify themselves with the rest. Towards this goal of lasting and deeply ingrained harmony, we have committed an unprecedented amount of resources to Mindanao, in a wide number of programs ranging from infrastructure to industrial development and social services.

Over the four-year period from 1972 to 1976, a total of P2.128 billion was committed to the development of infrastructure and utilities alone with yearly allocations substantially increasing every year.

More revealing than government expenditures in this sector is the extent of lending for Mindanao development. As of the end of 1976, total DBP loans amounted to P583.78 million and PNB loans reached P444.843 million.

Occupying similar priority in our national program are social services and community development; housing and resettlement; health care and education.

As important as peace in Mindanao is our second crucial domestic concern — energy, which has become today the most pivotal factor in the development effort of almost all countries.

As in other sectors of the national life, the motive force in our efforts to confront the energy problem is self-reliance.

Ninety-five percent of our total energy requirements is supplied by imported crude oil, while hydropower accounts for the balance of five percent. To pay for these imported resources, for the imported crude oil, we commit and pay 800 million to one billion US dollars of national funds annually.

Our present dependence on other countries in this field — the Middle East for 75 percent of our energy needs, and China, Indonesia, Malaysia and Brunei for the remaining 25 percent (probably we should add there Iran and Iraq) — will be aggravated day by day as our populations grows and our national development program is accelerated. By 1987, our total energy requirement is expected to reach 190.0 MMB, of oil, representing more than a two-fold increase over present levels.

Our response to this problem has been to develop a national energy program directed towards two main objectives: the reduction of national dependence on foreign sources of energy through the accelerated development of indigenous oil and non-oil energy resources, and second, the reduction of energy consumption through energy conservation measures.

The ten year program for the development of alternative energy sources projects that by 1987 we shall achieve a much needed redistribution of our energy supply structure cutting down the share of oil to only 69 percent with the balance of 31 percent being accounted for by hydropower, coal, geothermal nuclear and non-conventional resources.

This total effort to achieve national self-reliance is fully matched by an intensive energy conservation campaign. This campaign has effectively tempered growth in demand from a historical average of 7.5 percent to only 2.5 percent. Current actual consumption level of 194.6 thousand barrels per day of petroleum products represents 10,000 barrels less than forecast, a saving of $44 million dollars in foreign exchange for one whole year.

In line with this crucial national objective I announce today the creation of a Department of Energy to take charge of implementing and overseeing the national energy program.

Crucial to the success of our strivings to generate more power on the basis of self-reliance will be our ability to utilize all available water resources to produce power, or electric energy to control floods and serve the needs of irrigation, and potable water. Failure in this respect is not permissible, for the survival of our whole nation in the years to come will depend upon our ability, and the speed of our efforts to convert our water resources into electrical energy.

We must at the same time, with equal diligence and constancy of purpose strive to preserve and rehabilitate our portion of mankind's only habitat, the earth and its resources.

The drive to develop can, and must, harmonize with the requirements of a habitable natural environment. The program of modernization must be imbued with a sense of harmony and balance between the need to harness our vast natural resources in order to create wealth, and the need to protect and sustain our natural environment so that it will continue to nourish all forms of life including man.

It was the realization of this need that prompted, only recently, the passage of a number of major decrees. One of these defined as environmental policy built upon the fundamental right of our people to a healthy environment. Another, the Environment Code, promulgated quality standards and policy, guidelines for every area of environmental concern— from resources use and management to environmental education. To accelerate application of these standards upon day-to-day life, I also issued a letter of instruction requiring the installation of anti-pollution devices within three months in public utility and government vehicles as well as in factories and, within one year, in private, vehicles.

To oversee and manage this vastly expanded program of action, we shall soon create a Department of Environment.

To find these new program, as well as to meet the growing requirements of our national development program, we have embarked upon major reforms of the national tax system. Underlying this reform is the need to administer taxation more and more on the basis of the taxpayer's ability to pay. A number of the other new tax laws specifically raise certain taxes, while lowering others.

The new National International Revenue Code of 1977, which is the first codification of our tax laws since 1939, consolidates all new revenue laws, as well as amendatory laws and decrees, and harmonizes their provisions not only for the proper guidance of the taxpayer but also for the efficient administration of such revenue laws.

We have also written new tax decrees designed to increase government revenues, principally through the improvement of tax collection methods.

In the last few days since I announced the new tax measures, certain statements have been made in the business sector to me effect that the measures would be inflationary. There is now also some reported confusion as to the effectivity of certain measures. Particularly the tax on money market operations.

This tax on the money market is not inflationary because it taxes the high profits of idle capital. That is one. Two, it is not as high as the corporate income tax which could reach 40 percent. For the individual income tax, which at the level of an income of P32,000 to P36,000, is 36 percent, the individual pays 36 percent on a P32,000 to 36,000 income. And it could reach 70 percent, which is the highest percentage that is paid by an individual as income tax. Three, the law imposes the tax on the earnings of the money market because in the past, before June 3rd, very few of the people who made money on money market operations paid income tax on the income in the money market. We have a list of most of those who made money. But as a matter of compromise I decided that instead of filing criminal cases we imposed this compromise tax of 35 percent.

There is some fear that the tax on the money market operations will increase the interest on loans on the money market. This is not so because the interest that is paid includes the tax to be paid, and the amount of 35 percent which is merely withheld by the borrower from the interest that he would pay to the lender.

To obviate further confusion as to the effectivity of this law, I hereby announce that the law is effective as of the date I signed the decree which is June 3rd of this year.

Now to continue on revenue laws, none of our laws adds new burdens on the low-income families, whether in the form of direct or indirect taxes. Where the tax burden has been raised to conform to income — as in the case of the affluent — the increase has been reasonable.

We retain today the lowest tax ratio to gross national product in all of Southeast Asia. The per capita tax burden is likewise the lowest in the region.

At the other side of the ledger, national government expenditures have been definitely directed more and more to servicing the national economy. From a 33.3 percent share of total expenditures in 1972, expenditures for economic services had risen to 55.69 percent by 1975 or P10.22 billion. In 1976, it rose further, and this year, we expect the percentage share to rise to about 60 percent.

In the last five years, we have gained an increasing awareness of the interdependence of nations. Under present circumstances, this is perhaps truer in the economic field than in any other. Thus our economy, in the national perception of the world economy, continues to depend upon its alterations and changes on such a world economy. Consequently, we have come to sense the pessimism, the malaise of the world beyond our shores as well as its own interludes of hope and confidence.

For our part, our growth has been vigorous and unless there is a serious dislocation of our economy, we will attain our objectives.

However, we must now realize the erratic behavior of the present world economic order.

The heavy stress on economic development in the pattern of national expenditures is to be judged by the vigor of the national economy today.

From a gross national product of P56.4 billion in 1972, we attained a GNP of P72.6 billion in 1976. Measured at constant 1972 prices, this is an average growth rate of 7 percent annually. This year, the national product is expected to reach P77.7 billion.

It goes without saying that we must align our sights to higher targets. To attain these for this year and beyond, new policies and measures are required in addition to those that have already been enshrined in the national development.

Especially, we must fully attend to the crucial problems of Philippine transportation, which today is hardly able to keep up with the demands of the growing economy.

I intend to create a Department of Transportation and Communication, which shall implement our national transportation program.

Along with this, we are taking the following measures to provide incentives for public transportation companies to reduce operating costs:

First, we shall now require Petrophil and all Petron outlets to sell to public transportation companies that belong to cooperatives or the consortia that are being organized in the Metro Manila area, rubber tires and batteries at barely the cost of procurement abroad or locally.

Second, we are directing truck manufacturers to keep an inventory of spare parts and to sell such spare parts at lower costs, even as we ensure that they get reasonable profits.

Third, we shall ease financing burdens by requiring Petrophil to give a 180-day grace period for the payment of rubber tires and batteries and other products to transport companies that are members of the cooperative and consortia to be created among the bus operators of Metro Manila.

In the food sector, we must now turn our attention from production to the distribution system in the country. We have already begun a sweeping review of the entire marketing situation for producers' cooperatives, market cooperatives and the food terminal market itself.

It is the human person that is finally the object of all our efforts to achieve national development.

We have enshrined this principle in our laws and national policies, we must continue to reaffirm it in everything we do to improve the citizen's personal well-being, his opportunities for work, for education, for a life of dignity.

To be sure, we have not achieved for all of our citizens a life of comfort and abundance, but he who would judge our lives today must take into consideration his own personal and social circumstances of half a decade ago.

Today, we have the laws and the programs, and what is more the relentless purpose, to really make unrelenting war on human poverty and income inequalities. Never so total a commitment to the cause of human welfare. It was not until 1972 that we dared to storm the feudal land system in this country. It was not until 1972 that we dare to dismantle the network of privilege and exploitation in our society, And it was not until 1972 that we dared to undertake a nationwide program to improve the real living conditions of every depressed community in the country.

Accordingly, we have initiated the most forward-looking measures to improve the social and economic capability of the individual, particularly the farmer and the working man. In our effort to feed him better, we have given him title to his land; to clothe him and provide for the needs of his children, we have seen to a just and progressive increase of his wages and social security; and to shelter him against the elements and the blight of modern living, we have launched a program of low-cost Housing for the poor. This program has made some advances, but has equally been set back by the economics of housing; local producers of construction materials as well as importers and middlemen have progressively increased their prices, making it unduly difficult for government and even the private sector to proceed with their plans for low-cost housing.

Because of this, I intend to authorize the National Housing Authority to import directly all the construction materials and heavy equipment required to carry out the massive low-cost building program of the government. If necessary, a new procurement office will be organized solely for the purpose of importing heavy equipment as well as construction materials. We should ultimately liberalize the importation of such heavy equipment and construction materials, not only by private sector so as to be able to bring down costs.

Our sugar industry is threatened with annihilation by continued low prices of sugar in the world market. The efforts, in Geneva for an international sugar agreement have just failed notwithstanding the participation for the first time in such an international conference of the United States of America, Our government this year stands to lose about P700 million in the handling of sugar. Our government however, has continued to subsidize domestic sugar at prices below the cost of production. It is now necessary to reverse the policy and eliminate the subsidy, increase the price paid to the producer and reduce the tax paid to the government. This may save the sugar industry.

It is my intention to take these steps immediately.

In the area of political reform, it bears nothing that we have in four and a half years, laid the basis for citizens participating in political life, not merely in seasonal expression of opinion, but in the daily exercise of power and initiative.

We have enfranchised not only those who have been traditionally allowed the vote, but also the members of our rising young generations.

From organization at village and district level by means of the barangay, we have steadily pushed for more effective forms of organizing the power of the citizenry all the way up to the level of national life in our Batasang Bayan. These are the essential prerequisites of political order. We are moving decisively towards a genuine and effective representative democracy.

It is my intention to call elections for the Batasang Pambansa as soon as possible.

But as a further step to afford the citizenry greater control over their government, I intend to activate the Tanodbayan and the Sandiganbayan, both of which are provided for in our Constitution.

In keeping with the constitutional provisions, the Tanodbayan shall serve as an office to receive and investigate complaints relative to public office, including those in government-owned and-controlled corporations, and make appropriate recommendation for the filing and prosecution of the corresponding criminal civil or administrative cases before the proper courts or bodies.

The Sandiganbayan shall have jurisdiction over criminal and civil cases, involving graft and corrupt practices and other offenses committed by public officers and employees, including those in government corporations in relation to their office as may be determined by law.

The spirit behind the creation of these two bodies is that public office is a public trust. All public officials and employees must be finally accountable to the people.

In all these initiatives that we have taken — in foreign policy, in national security, in Mindanao, in energy, in the economy, in environmental protection, in fiscal reform, in human development, and in political reform — the real test is our ability to organize to provide leadership, and to act as one people, one nation.

In a sense we have never lacked ideals — native or borrowed alike.

What we have often lacked is the energy of will — the will to work steadfastly together, to bring a task from a united start to a shared end.

Chroniclers of important events in our history have remarked upon this sorrowful lack of unison among our people in their labors, in their pursuits.

To quote Casimiro Diaz once more, whose lament is inscribed on the title page of my history book Tadhana:

“Some of them could not unite with others, and, although all desired liberty, they did not work together to secure the means for attaining it, and therefore they experienced a heavier (yoke of) subjection.”

This disunity would recur in other periods of the nation's life through the era of Bonifacio and Aguinaldo, at the very height of national awakening, and afterwards in the death of Gen. Antonio Luna, throughout the American period when nationalists and pro-Americans battled for political ascendancy and on to the period after our independence was regained, when our national leaders quibbled on what had to be done to raise a war-stricken nation. So it has been in our own time, until we took the supreme decision of taking the road of crisis government.

Historians and anthropologists have traditionally explained this tendency of the Filipinos as deriving from a past that had always seen them as fragmented societies and communities. And our ancestors were always pictured as capable only of the most rudimentary type of political integration.

Fortunately for our own future new discoveries about our past may yet prove that assumption false. Only this year, megalithic structures have been verified in an area in Zamboanga del Sur that may suggest a clearer picture of our beginnings.

Preliminary findings in Canunan, Balungating, Pagadian, Zamboanga del Sur, date these megaliths or these stones prior, to the period of contact with the introduction of Islam into the Philippines. The nature of the stones, their great number and their distribution, suggest a large population concentrated in one area, and a tremendous effort at organization for construction.

Whatever be the final message of these stones, the meaning is clear that even in pre-history, the earliest figures on our landscape were capable of a complex and integrated type of organization. This is an image that reinforces our vision of the Filipino future, and strengthens our conviction that instances of factionalism and disunity in our history are lapses that are far from irremediable.

And today, at this celebration of the 79th year of national independence, let it be a pledge of our generation to mold, to balance and to integrate all the variant energies and aspirations of our communities into a single nation.

Marcos, F. E. (1979). Presidential speeches (Vol. 7). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Address of President Marcos on the 32nd anniversary of Bessang Pass, June 14, 1977

A Roll of Honor

I AM SORRY if the arrangements have kept me away from you. It would have been preferable for me if I had stayed closer to the audience. But unfortunately, the Philippine Air Force is used to operating higher than above ground level.

I greet General Sarmiento, Commanding General of the Philippine Air Force, and the officers and men of the Philippine Air Force. General Sarmiento Said at the beginning of his welcome speech that we should imagine that we are in the Philippine International Convention Center, which is centrally air-conditioned. Perhaps, we need a little imagination for that. I remember June was very rainy in Bessang Pass.

I notice that the noisiest group among the various regiments seems to be the smallest in number — the 66th Infantry, the host Infantry. I would like to say that the 66th Infantry has indeed prepared well for this year's gathering, and succeeded in inviting not only the local veterans but also the veterans from abroad.

We have here with us one of our most outstanding heroes of the North who lived to tell the tale, and who commanded the 15th Infantry, Lt. Col. Robert Arnold. Very few people remember that Bob was way ahead of the others in organizing resistance. He started resistance by massing together regular and irregular troops even before the organization for resistance of the units under Colonel Horan and later Colonel Noble and Colonel Moses, and the units of the 14th US under Colonel Nakar, and the irregular troops under Governor Ablan in Ilocos Norte and Governor Adduru in Cagayan.

We have given due recognition to some of the original organizers of the irregular troops. Before they were gathered into the unit known as USAFIP-NL, there were many guerrilla units organized in almost every province in the North. And perhaps, this year, on the occasion of the 32nd anniversary of the fall of Bessang Pass and in the presence of the representatives of all the units, we should remember these men who are seldom mentioned in the various histories. For many of them, if not all of them, disappeared and died before even the rosters could be organized after the American troops landed in Lingayen on January 1945.

The landing in Leyte occurred on October 20, 1944. And the orders were issued that only those men and women who were listed in the rosters as of January 9, 1945 were recognized. And thus, many of those who died before January 9, 1945 were never included in the rosters which were ultimately recognized by either the United States government or the Philippine government. I think that it is time for us and for the Philippine government at least — represented here by the highest ranking officers of the civilian and military organizations — to now give due credit and recognition to these men.

I would like to mention their names to you. This is not a complete list by all means. We may not have here the names of the young officers who died in battle and in combat. And it shall be our mission after this day to complete this list which I hereby start with the mention of their names in solemn recognition of their participation in the guerrilla organizations in the North.

This is in grateful recognition and appreciation of their outstanding leadership. They showed indomitable courage and exerted heroic efforts in organizing the resistance movement against the Japanese Imperial Forces in Northern Luzon. They bolstered the morale of the people during the early days of enemy occupation. And without waiting for orders from the headquarters of the USAFFE or the Philippine Army or any of their regular units, they organized other units and integrated them by all available communication into the United States Armed Forces in the Philippines.

It is one of the projects of USAFIP-NL to extend to all the heirs of these men certificates of appreciation and recognition. I shall mention some of them alphabetically.

But first, let me say that the order in which they are mentioned does not determine the order of prestige or honor that is granted to them.

We start out with Captain Vicente Abaya, Philippine Army, posthumous, 1941 to 1945, Ilocos provinces, Mountain Province, and Rizal. Next, Governor Roque P. Ablan, posthumous, 1941 to 1943, Ilocos Norte and Mountain Province. Next, Governor Marcelo Adduru, posthumous 1941 to 1945, Cagayan and Mountain Province. Of course, I have already mentioned the man who started out in the northernmost islands of Northern Luzon and was heard from on the ambush of Japanese troops in Candon on February 24, 1942, Lt. Col. Robert Arnold, US, Army, 1941 to 1945, Ilocos Provinces, Isabela, and Nueva Vizcaya. We also have the two Cushings. One, Major Walter Cushing, US Army, posthumous. It is said that he shot himself in Jones, Isabela when the destruction of his unit was imminent. He was the last to die, I understand. After being surrounded and seeing all his men killed in action, he shot himself with his last bullet. Two, Major Charles Cushing, US Army, also posthumous. He operated from a base in San Nicolas, Pangasinan and which base was reached by Colonel Arthur Noble and Martin Moses when escaping from Bataan and, ultimately, reaching Mountain Provinces to take over the various units left by the other officers.

I also wish to give credit to Colonel John P. Horan, US Army, posthumous. He died in 1952 after his capture in Mountain Province and after operations in the Ilocos provinces and Isabela.

And now we come to the organizer of the 14th Infantry, Lt. Col. Guillermo Nakar, posthumous. He was captured in Palanan, Isabela where Aguinaldo was captured earlier in 1902. He operated in the Mountain Provinces, Nueva Vizcaya, and Isabela. We also have here Captain William Peryam, posthumous. He operated in the Mountain Provinces and in the Ilocos provinces from 1941 to 1943. Major Ralph P. Fraeger, posthumous. He operated in Cagayan and the Mountain Provinces. He was also killed after his unit was surrounded in 1943, supposedly in Isabela. We have here with us one of the old miners. I should not say old for he looks young enough. He is still with us operating a copper mine in the Mountain Provinces and I refer to Major George T. Schulle, Sr. There are any number of original organizers like Madamba of Ilocos Norte and Gaerlan of La Union. And there are in Pangasinan any number of the original guerrilla leaders who might have been with some of the Lapham units and, later on, taken over by General Russell W. Volckmann who obtained command of all the operational units from Pangasinan and part of Nueva Ecija up to the northern provinces.

All these men are seldom heard and written about. But they are actually then men to whom we owe our present opportunities of peace and progress in the Philippines today. I also refer to the members of the bolo units of USAFIP-NL.

You will remember that when I first ran for public office, I started a project which would at least recognize the bolo men if their arrears in pay could not be obtained. Unfortunately, after the payment of some of the bolo men in Ilocos Norte, the project was terminated. The Philippine Government should do justice to the bolo men. You and I know that on many an attack when we could not send the armed men towards the enemy, the first men to be sent out allegedly on intelligence mission were the bolo men. To them, therefore, we owe a great debt of obligation. And the Philippine Government hereby recognizes and appreciates the services of all these bolo men.

I think this is long over due. So I hereby direct our men engaged in preparing these projects, especially Tiago Nuval here, to prepare some kind of a memorial for the bolo men of Northern Luzon. I think we should set aside one of the memorials that we are going to build for these men who have been instrumental for the victories of USAFIP-NL.

Now, it is 32 years since the fateful dawn at Bessang Pass when the only truth that mattered was that the Japanese defenses had fallen and that we could probably reclaim what had always been our own.

I would like to present to you the representatives of Japan whom we invited. We invited General Wachi, the military administrator. But I think he is too old to come here. But we have here with us Major Nagatomi of the staff of General Tomoyuki Yamashita. And we are happy that in accordance with our programs for "Reunion for Peace," we have a representative here of the Japanese Imperial Army. A representative of the Allied Forces, Colonel Lloyd, of the Australian Embassy is representing Australia.

You are aware that so much change has occurred within the life of our nation for the past 32 years. A new generation has been born and has since come to full manhood; a new generation too soon followed by younger successors, to whom we shall never be able to tell the stories of war and or resistance quite in the same voice in which they were told when we were their age, or when we were younger men in the thick of fighting.

This younger generation will probably be not interested in what we did in the last war. But this is not just change. This bears resemblance to one side of progress; one in which young men and women who endured nothing in war have no memory of it, except the general denunciation and distaste for it which every generation, especially the most blooded, shares.

But for us who fought in that battle, the drama of death and survival, of resistance and triumph lives on; and we meet every year to go over our memories. Perhaps, we do not flatter ourselves with the thought that we shall not need to embellish our dead, nor to apologize like this, to find the battle of Bessang Pass worthy of remembrance even long after we are gone and the last survivor of that battle may have passed the scene.

For a nation's memory is infinitely longer than that of her children. The individual personages that compose a nation may forget, but the nation we know will not forget that war that swept the country from 1941 to 1945. There will be no forgetting the trials that tested our spirit and physical endurance as a people.

Like other well-remembered names of that war — Bataan, Corregidor, Lingayen, Leyte, the Battle of the Philippine Sea, the Battle of Leyte Gulf — Bessang Pass is indelibly etched in the nation's past as part of our inheritance for it represents a decisive chapter in our history when the struggle for liberation finally proved triumphant and supreme.

Basically, the operation to capture Bessang Pass from the Japanese was conceived merely as a part of the overall liberation plan for Northern Luzon. On January 9, 1945 — D-Day in Luzon — all the guerrilla units operating from Pangasinan all the way up, including the units that had heretofore not recognized any overall superior, were placed under the umbrella of USAFIP, North Luzon, and under the commanding general of the U.S. Sixth Army General Krueger to coordinate all efforts of Fil-American troops in the liberation of Luzon.

Though plans were laid for the swift destruction of enemy resistance in Northern Luzon, the Japanese proved well-prepared. And thus, Bessang Pass is remembered as a symbol of all battles that were fought by all guerrilla units throughout Luzon, the Visayas, and Mindanao.

We have here with us some of the well-known guerrilla commanders. I can see two here from this point wherein I stand. We have, first of all, Marking Agustin, who commanded the Marking's Fil-American.

If we celebrate Bessang Pass, he also celebrates the fall of Ipo Dam, with the same type of memories that we have of Bessang Pass. Bessang Pass for us therefore is also a celebration of the victory of the Fil-American irregular troops under Marking Agustin in the Battle of Ipo Dam. The same thing is true with former Secretary of National Defense Alejo Santos who is here. He was in command of the Bulacan military area which was ordered attached to the USAFIP, North Luzon. And I remember that some of his units operated in Balete Pass, probably also with the 32nd US Army division. And some of them operated in Bessang Pass. I do remember meeting some of his men in the last few days of the operation.

When we celebrate Bessang Pass, we also celebrate the victories of the Bulacan military area and of General Santos who commanded that area. I repeat that Bessang Pass is memorable to us, not only to the troops, both regular and irregular of Northern Luzon, but to all the underground and resistance men of the entire Philippines whether in Luzon, the Visayas, or Mindanao.

I shall not go into the details of that battle for you are well aware of them. But I can only say that with the fall of Bessang Pass, the liberation of Luzon reached a pivotal stage leading ultimately to the capture of the inner defense and installations of General Tomoyuki Yamashita in the mountain surrounding Loo Valley. Bessang Pass was his back door. For all intents and purposes, the battle of Luzon was over, and with it the full liberation of the Philippines.

And this is why Bessang Pass is so well remembered.

It is quite true that we lost 1,441 men killed in action in the Battle of Bessang Pass, and that we were fighting not only under our flag but under the American flag. It is also true that while fighting for the American flag, we fought for our terrain, for our soil, and for our country. And as we remember Bessang Pass, perhaps, we should quote General Krueger, commanding general of the Sixth Army. In his after-battle assessment of Bessang Pass, he said: 'The capture of Bessang Pass was one whose magnitude and decisiveness far surpasses the US. Army's 25th and 32nd Infantry Division's battles for Villa Verde Trail and Balet Pass.' This is what Bessang Pass meant to all of us, especially to those in command of the American forces that were supposed to bring about the liberation of Luzon.

It was not just a strategic military victory. For the Filipino forces, which bore so much of the brunt and the terrible cost of the fighting, it was an important moral victory — the sign that they could bring to a conclusion a fight that had raged in the breast of everyone of their countrymen. And this to me is the lesson of Bessang Pass which has relevance to us today — that we can bring to a successful finish any project that you and I start together. For it symbolized the unity of the Filipino fighting men under one command. Before that the guerrilla troops in the North were on the run from the enemy because they were divided, because they could not submit themselves to a single commanding officer. When I asked the historians to go over the records in order to determine the rankings of the men who operated in the underground before the landings on January 9, 1945, we discovered to my dismay that many of the officers would not submit to other officers of higher rank, because they had organized their own units and they wanted their own kingdoms over which they would be supreme. This has been the perennial weakness in the Filipino character. And it has been true in the past and continues to be true today.

But Bessang Pass proves that above all, no matter how noble and worthy one's friends are, no matter what pledges they may make, no matter how ready they are to die for their own idea of freedom, liberation, or achievement, progress is a gift which a people procures with its own blood, with its own sacrifices — never with sacrifice or the blood of another country or another race. Bessang Pass therefore marked the turning point not only in the alteration of the character of the fighting but of the character of the Filipino. It also demonstrated that beside their allies, the Filipinos were not less than the best of their allies in battle.

History should never repeat itself, and it is best that neither the reasons nor the ordeal itself of Bessang Pass are ever again repeated. We have paid a high price for this.

The lives of comrades strewn across the Pass form part of such a price. The injured and fractured lives of many of those who survived form yet another part of that price. But the continuing price we pay lies in the effort which we as a nation make every day to make sure that every Filipino, no matter how different from his forebears, will grow up knowing and never forgetting that someone before him had shed his blood to pay for his freedom now his own.

Address of President Marcos before the National Convention of the Confederation of Philippine Exporters, June 16, 1977

The Government and Export Development

WHENEVER I SEE a gathering of businessmen who look unnaturally too pleased with themselves, I begin to worry a little about myself, especially when the awards include the giver of the awards. It sounds too much like whistling in the dark, you know. Of course, General Balao will forgive me this imposition on his dignity, but he and I are old friends, and we understand each other. I have never known him to tremble in the face of any crisis. So when he starts giving awards himself that means trouble. For by definition, businessmen tend to exaggerate their worries and their complaints, especially when they meet the President. You should note that they did not let me take dinner. The brought in all kinds of Decrees and Letters of Instructions hoping that they could, you know, confuse me into signing away the family store. It is not easy, even for a President, to divine the reason, in any given circumstances, why businessmen should suddenly look so cheerful and so confident. And that is exactly what I see here tonight. I see almost everybody. I don't see too many representatives of the sugar industry here, but I see some representatives of the textile and the garment industries. So other than sugar, everything must be working well. This means that I should stop speaking and say: "Well, I am glad to see that you are all happy. The government will extend to you all the help possible. We will see you again next year." But perhaps this cheerfulness is in anticipation of some announcements or some official concession from the government. I can only hope it is for services already rendered by government.

This is not the first time we have been brought together under the auspices of the Confederation of Philippine Exporters. For some years now, this has been for us a regular forum, expressing the increasing partnership between government and the national business community, and dictated even more by the current tide of pressing economic concerns in our country, and of crisis around the world.

Since the start of this dialogue, we have focused much of our attention, and our energies, on the need to sustain export development and contribute to its necessary expansion. We have since come to understand our problems more intimately over the last few years, and we have evolved coordinated policies and strategies — coping mechanisms — which recognize both our limitations and our possibilities. I cannot see an area more important other than perhaps food and power.

I understand the First Lady has arrived. I was wondering how I would apologize for her absence, but now I can see that I must apologize for not knowing her movements. Now, if I can recover your attention once again, a miracle under the circumstances since I myself now don't have my thoughts on this speech of mine.

All our policies, of course, have recognized our limitations and our possibilities. The problem of exports development is of the same weight as food and oil imports.

Because we are united today behind a common export program, we find many of our projects bearing fruit. But despite our modest successes, we remain embattled. No single factor is more critical to our continued stability and growth, in the area of trade, than our ability to promote and diversify our exports.

It is also axiomatic that our progress and modernization efforts, including the industrialization towards the objective of a balanced agro-industrial economy, will continue to be dependent upon the extent of our exports. And, of course, we are presently engaged in the reassessment of the various sectors of our economy. We just finished with sugar. We are now moving into the other sectors.

Now, let me move into export performance in retrospect and give you a few data which I have just acquired.

At the first National Convention of the Philippine Export Council in January of this year, we noted the year 1976 to have posted real and encouraging gains. Paradoxically, we entered 1977 with a tenuous, if not precarious trading position in the world market.

Today, in the middle of the year, we have reason to be optimistic about our exports performance for 1977. Earnings from leading Philippine exports for the first quarter of the year have reached more than $690 million, 38 percent over last year's first quarter figure of almost half a billion U.S. dollars. If the trend continues, depending principally on the recovery of the major industrial countries, we can expect the early figures for 1977 to follow a steady course for the rest of the year.

The Governor of the Central Bank, one hour before I came to this dinner, reported to me that for the first five months of the year, we have had a favorable balance, of payments position. We expected an unfavorable balance, a deficit of about $100 million for the first quarter. But, fortunately, the first quarter resulted in a favorable balance of about $70 million. And for the months of April and May, there was a favorable balance of $25 million. It is therefore expected that this year, the dire predictions that we ourselves had projected may not come about on the matter of export earnings as well as the balance of payments position.

A look at the longer history of our foreign trade bears out this favorable trend. Over the 26-year-period since we regained independence in 1946, the growth of our exports has steadily outpaced the growth of our Gross National Product, thus contributing a consistently increasing share in the total production of goods and services. In the 1960's for instance, the share of our exports in the aggregate national output average only 13.0 percent. This reached 18 percent during this decade.

Yet, more significant than what simple growth rates and percentage shares of GNP indicate are the changes in the very structure of exports. In 1960, industrial exports, consisting mainly of semi-processed and processed agricultural, forest and mineral products, accounted for only 50 percent of total exports. In 1976, their share increased to about 80 percent, outstripping the quantity of unprocessed export products.

But the single impressive performance is recorded in the area of non-traditional products. Within the last six years prior to 1977, the share of non-traditional export products in our total exports grew from 9.4 percent in 1970 to over 20 percent in 1976. For the first quarter of 1977, leading non-traditional export earned $102 million, representing a 56 percent increase over the $65 million earnings for the equivalent period in 1976.

It is noteworthy, though not altogether surprising, that the fastest growing non-traditional exports have been those classified as labor-intensive. For example, during the first quarter of 1977, garment exports amounted to $11.4 million compared to $5.6 million during the first quarter of 1976, representing a 105 percent increase; woodcraft exports likewise increased by 20 percent.

Other leading performers in the non-traditional export category include: coffee, which showed a 1,090 percent increase from last year's first quarter figures; bananas and plantains, 13 percent increase; nickel and nickel alloys, 85 percent increase; gold from copper ores and concentrates, 25 percent increase; and cement, 7.7 percent increase.

Hand in hand with the improvements in the composition of our export products, we have also achieved a certain measure of success in diversifying our export markets. During the past 10 years, 80 percent of our exports went to the United States and Japan. By 1975, 66 percent went to these two countries, but in 1976, their share went down to 59.6 percent. This was further reduced during the first quarter of 1977 to 51.7 percent.

On the other hand, exports to the European Economic Community have remained fairly stable at 13-15 percent, while those to the Socialist countries have increased significantly from 1.1 percent in 1975 to 4.8 percent in 1976 and then to a dramatic 15.8 percent during the first quarter of 1977.

Similarly our exports to developing countries have increased. In 1975, exports to our ASEAN partners were only 2.2 percent of our total exports. During the first quarter of this year, this doubled. Another good example is Korea. In 1975, Korea did not even count among the first 15 major trading partners of the Philippines. Today, Korea ranks No. 13.

These developments are remarkable for what they imply in terms of our capability to compete in the world market and in terms of the confidence we now enjoy with respect to our stability and our capacity to meet our commitments at a time when global economic crises have exerted their utmost pressures on the foreign trade of developing countries. In terms of rising prices for key imports and falling prices for their exports, we have managed to show substantial increases in our export trade.

Incidentally, we have been alarmed about a falling tendency in the price of coconut oil for the last five days. You know, it went up to 34, and then it stabilized at 31. In the last five days, it has been falling at one cent per day. It is now somewhere at 25.5. Anyway, that is a side piece of information. I hope it does not give you indigestion.

This is clear proof, if any is needed, not only that we have the capability to steer through crisis, but that we have an enormous potential for advancement and growth. As a newcomer in the field of exports, we enjoy a large base of natural resources which today remains considerably untapped, and which when fully exploited has the capacity to launch us on a well-balanced agro-industrial development.

By year 2000, exports will account for about one-fourth of our GNP. While we do not want to be dependent on exports, beyond this point, an overall favorable trade balance will become evident as our export earnings accelerate over a wider base. This will result from the rapid growth of export oriented, small, medium, and heavy industries which have comparative advantages in terms of our country's human and natural resources.

Eventually, the expansion and diversification of our exports should lead to greater self-reliance. We will then be able to finance our own development with our own resources, instead of mainly through foreign borrowing and export earnings. It should also be possible for us to plan a sustained moderate growth of seven percent annually, which is our target for the next several years.

For us to achieve this, it is necessary for our exports to grow by more than 10 percent annually — 25 percent for non-traditional exports.

One may consider our objectives ambitious, but they are nonetheless realistic. And they find their promise in a fundamentally sound approach to steady growth and development.

That approach is best reflected in our basic policy for the development of our export sector, whose four main strands I would like to re-state.

First, it is our policy to expand and diversify our total export product base.

Second, it is our policy to boost non-traditional exports, to increase the production, and strengthen the marketing of the same.

Third, it is our policy to develop existing markets, as well as to penetrate new ones, so that our products are less susceptible to abrupt, unfavorable and erratic developments in the world market.

Finally—and this is one of the later developments — it is now our policy to emphasize the support not only of Government but of the private sector to the development of export of services.

I need not elaborate on these, for each of them has become so much a part of our economic life. Considering the nature of the audience that I speak to, I am certain that you are well aware of the various aspects of these basic policies. It will be more helpful to review the efforts we have recently taken in pursuit of these objectives and policies, and to pinpoint weaknesses and inadequacies in the process.

Certainly, if our export expansion drive is to succeed, the private sector and Government must move in concert. It would be an illusion for either or both of them to believe that they could separately succeed. If we look around us, we see that the successful exporters of the world require the coordinated action of the public as well as the private sector.

It was precisely on this premise that the Government has since sought to build the support for export development. Among the numerous measures that have been passed, the first worthy of mention is Presidential Decree 930, which I issued last year, to simplify export procedures and documentation. This was in response to the almost unanimous complaint that the rules and regulations then discouraged more than they helped prospective exporters; that there were too many forms to fill, too many signatures to secure, in a word, too much bureaucratic red tape. With that Decree, we reduced the number of documents required to the barest minimum and cut down the time involved in processing export documents by at least 50 percent.

Of course, I am aware of the feet that according to some of you the 50 percent is still too much. And I am certain that the Export Council is working on this, and I expect to receive the recommendations very soon.

The rules and regulations implementing this Decree have now been released by the NEDA, but several amendments are, I understand being formulated. I ask the NEDA to work with the Export Council so that the benefits of this Decree can be more extensively felt. I also direct that a more systematic and vigorous dissemination of procedural information and data be carried out in order to familiarize exporters with the new procedures and documents.

More recently, I issued a Presidential Decree granting a set of incentives for agribusiness. Designed to streamline and accelerate not only our agriculture exports but also our food production campaign, this Decree incorporates all incentives under the Investments and Exports Incentives Acts as well as other incentives specifically geared towards the peculiarities and needs of agricultural undertakings. Accordingly, I have directed the BOI Chairman and the Secretary of Agriculture to come up with an agricultural priorities plan as soon as possible that would identify agribusiness priority areas to be granted incentives. I consider this a landmark Decree in our efforts to encourage and diversify the composition of our agribusiness exports.

Another measure I would like to mention is Central Bank Circular No. 555, which expands the rediscounting window, making it more attractive to both exporters and commercial banks. Subsequent to the promulgation of this Circular, total loans rediscounted from February to April 1977 reached P2.754 billion, of which P942 million or 34percent went to exports. About P567 million of the latter or 60 percent, represents the share of non-traditional exports, principally wearing apparel, textiles, and chemical elements and compounds. The monthly performance here has surpassed any of the corresponding figures for the last three years, and attests to the kind of impact produced by the Circular on the use by non-traditional exporters of the rediscounting window.

I am told, however, that procedures are still slightly cumbersome, and are being refined.

We can also mention that apart from the concessions made available to the export sector under the investment and Export Incentives Act, and those related to operations in the Export Processing Zone, which are many, the two principal tax laws of the Philippines — the Tariff and Customs Code, and the National Internal Revenue Code — have provided tax credits through drawback claims and exemptions from specific and sales taxes. With respect to the former, measures are being devised by the Bureau of Customs to facilitate refund. I hereby direct the Bureau of Customs to speed up the finalization and implementation of these measures.

Another area of support by Government to the private sector is in infrastructure. To facilitate the flow of export goods to and from ports and processing centers, we have continually given stress to the need to improve and expand existing highways, airports, and seaports. Recent reports concerning the poor maintenance of national and local roads in many parts of the country have prompted me to issue special directives to the Department of Public Highways and the local governments to give this matter top priority. There was some dislocation in the coordination between the Department of Public Highways and the local government. As you are aware, we have increased the maintenance cost that the national government hands over to the local government— from P8,000 per kilometer to P11,000 per kilometer. And if after we have released all these funds, there are still some complaints about the non-maintenance of roads then there is something wrong in the local government. Then it is my intention to see that this is immediately rectified. I appeal to the local government executives now to perform their tasks. In the event that the local government executives, including Metro Manila, do not perform their tasks — actually, the Governor of Metro Manila does not handle any funds. You know, the poor Governor really has no funds at her disposal because the mayors of the four cities and the 13 towns still handle the funds. She is some kind of a kapatas, you know. She is the best kapatas that I have seen operate.

You are now well aware of the fact that we are releasing funds for the maintenance of these roads. And if these roads are not maintained, I would have to assume that there was corruption and inefficiency in the performance of your duties. And I will take the corresponding action. Being the pater familias, I must act as a good pater familias by removing the inefficient and the dishonest.

I have already announced in my June 12 speech the creation of a new Department of Transportation and Communications. The work of such a new Department must support all our efforts to ensure a smooth flow of goods and services from the points of origin to the outside.

The highways program in particular has been a major activity in terms of the number of projects undertaken.

Now, talking about roads and the maintenance of roads, it seems that the local governments outside Metro Manila require some supervision. I have directed that the Department of Public Highways should enjoin their technicians and supervisors to participate and help in the maintenance of local roads. Among the major accomplishments here have been the completion of several primary trunkline road networks, linking together major urban and production centers. The most extensive of these projects, as you know, connect the markets and production points in Luzon, Visayas and Mindanao.

We have given equal stress to providing adequate power support for agriculture, industry, and rural development. The Philippine Nuclear Power Plant in Morong, Bataan, on the Pacific side of Bataan peninsula, is our most daring attempt to fill this need to date.

With respect to the country's portworks program, the main thrust has been the upgrading of the country's seaport facilities to meet existing and future demands. Major projects are in the pipeline for the expansion and modernization of the port of Manila and the ports of Davao, Cagayan de Oro and General Santos, among others. Incentives are also being packaged for shipping and shipbuilding.

Another development worth noting is the proposed creation of a shipping corporation under the auspices of the Philippine Shipper's Council (or Shippercon), in response to the continuing spiral of freight rates imposed by the shipping conferences. These high freight rates have made a deep dent on the price structure of export and import commodities, diminishing the proceeds that should otherwise go to producers and traders.

Shippercon has had several confrontations with the powerful shipping conferences, but the battle, to say the least, has been tough. Only about eight percent of our foreign, trade is carried by Philippine vessels. This must be substantially increased.

I am therefore happy to learn that a number of importers have bonded together to put up their own shipping line which will reduce freight rates, rationalize shipping schedules, and accept payment of freight rates in pesos, thus, reducing the outflow of dollars from the country. I trust that all these efforts are fully coordinated with the Export Council and the Maritime Industry Authority.

In the negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), our country has submitted requests for concessions on tropical products, involving products of major interest to us like desiccated coconut, coconut oil, pineapple products, tobacco, sugar, wood, and wood products. Thirty tariff lines, representing a trade value of over $84 million, have already been granted initial concessions. The concessions of the European Economic Community, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and the Nordic countries are now in force, while Australia is to implement her own by July 1977.

We are further pursuing various interests under the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) of many developed countries, including the expansion of their produce coverages and the removal of restrictive elements. We are proposing, in particular, the more favorable consideration of our major exports, as well as of processed fruits, garments, handicrafts and so on. There are many other forums in which we actively express these interests, in a bilateral negotiations, both with our traditional partners and the Socialist countries, in negotiations on textile quotas, and in trade expansion schemes among developing countries. We can also single out our support for the Integrated Programme for Commodities and its Common Fund, which will hopefully yield for us more stable commodity prices and foreign exchange earnings.

Perhaps, it is at this point that I should announce that in accordance with the recommendations of the Export Council and the various agencies of Government, the Department of Trade and the Department of Foreign Affairs should now jointly organize ad hoc negotiating panels for particular textiles and garments negotiations composed of representatives from both the private sector and Government. These panels have to be co-chaired by representatives of the Department of Trade and the Department of Foreign Affairs or by an official from another department of a rank not lower than Undersecretary or Ambassador. The Chairman of the Export Council permanent committee on textiles and garments, who comes from the private sector, should automatically be the Vice Chairman of the negotiating panel. And the duties and functions of the Textile Export Board, under Letter of Instructions No. 325, are expanded to include not only the implementation of the RP-US Textile Agreement, but also all other agreements entered into between the Republic of the Philippines and other countries. I therefore sign in your presence this Letter of Instructions creating these bodies and increasing the number of those who will participate in this general effort.

You will note that I have gone out of my way to attend to the textile and garment industry. As reported by the Export Council, this seems to be one of the industries that is meeting with difficulties today.

We have therefore laid down the basic policy directions, the orientation, and the means of implementation, and formulated the internal measures necessary to guide the development of our export sector.

Its continued growth, however, rests on unflagging endeavor. Various problems in our national export strategy have to be untangled as they arise and the area of further Government assistance must be looked into from time to time.

For instance, we should now consider the merits of giving financial support to a limited number of trading houses that can serve as important conduits for the flow of exports from domestic producers to points of consumption abroad. These companies are particularly helpful to small producers who are in no position to establish their own marketing connections abroad.

The success of many export-oriented economies in the world can also be attributed to a very dynamic private sector organizational mechanism typified by trading companies. We all know of the success of the Japanese sogo shosa (the big trading houses) which are present in almost all countries. This approach was followed by Korea whose export development has been quite phenomenal.

While these trading houses have now become big conglomerates, it must be remembered that many of them started small. It would be therefore desirable if we could come up with an approach that is suited to Philippine conditions, employing the principle of "selectivity," providing incentives for export performance, and making it attractive for the slower ones to work harder. In a sense we already have the beginnings of this kind of trading mechanism in the Philippine International Trading Corporation (PITC), and the Philippine Export Trading Corporation (PETCQR), the Philippine Chamber of Industries, and the Export Processing Zone Chamber of Exporters and Manufacturers. Once these corporations acquire the desired capability, they should be able to provide financing to small and medium-scale producers while they at the same time act as their marketing outlet.

I would prefer that this be studied further in order to encourage the establishment of responsive trading houses with the end in view of providing the necessary incentives based on performance. I hereby direct the Export Council to look into this and to submit to me its recommendations as soon as possible.

And I wish to announce that this is the new direction and orientation of Government. I hereby announce that it is the policy of the Philippine Government now to support financially the establishment of such trading houses that shall help the exporters of our country.

I am also directing the Export Council to complete as soon as possible its studies on specific export products to enable us to clearly pinpoint those offering the most promising export potential. Only on this basis can we approach this field with dynamic flexibility as required by the play of market forces throughout the world.

As we improve internal conditions for export production, we must likewise strive to improve and develop the pattern of our trading relations and markets.

Consequently, we must seek a restructuring of our existing trading arrangements with other countries to obtain fair and equitable treatment for our exports. This is our reason for our activity in the Third World effort at seeking a restructuring of the world economic order.

At the same time, we are renegotiating our treaties with our two principal trading partners, Japan and the United States. This must be supported whenever possible with long-term agreements with the rest of our trading partners. This has been one of the main reasons for our normalizing ties with all the Socialist countries and for our increased collaboration with our partners in the ASEAN, and with Western Europe as well as the Middle East.

Over and above all these, we must press for increasing concessions for our exports in various multilateral fronts.

Here at home, we ought to continue the establishment of additional industrial estates, not necessarily only for export processing. It is projected that within the next two to four years, the Bataan Export Processing Zone will have been saturated; planning therefore for new export processing zones will have to be made now — before that day arrives. Mactan has been cited as a possible new site; this is one area where regional diversification can also merge with our targets of expanding industrial exports as well as tourism. The industrial estates in Northern Mindanao and Davao also offer equally exciting prospects.

Finally, there is the area of service exports, specifically overseas labor contracts, an area in which Korea seems to have specialized in the last few years. I understand that Korea has been able to obtain about $3 billion worth of contracts. It is worth observing that some of our entrepreneurs have landed some lucrative although modest construction contracts in the Middle East, in Africa, and in some ASEAN countries. I look at this as a good start. And as I have in the re-statement of our basic policies, the support of Government for the export of services is assured. I have just made an amendment to the Philippine Export Guarantee and Loan Corporation charter which includes guarantee for contractors who sell their services abroad. I would like to announce that this new policy of Government includes the guarantee for such contracts entered into by Filipino contractors.

I assure all these contractors and all those allied with them that the government is determined to push the gains made in this field, through various measures and incentives to assist those who are blazing the trail in this particular aspect of our export drive.

And I ask all the parties interested in this matter to convey through the Export Council any request for support that they may need in government. I came here tonight to assure you that the Government will have a sympathetic ear to all the contractors of the Philippines who desire Government support.

At this point I would like to say that the field of exports is vast and complicated. But the opportunity is immense, and I hope none of you will lose heart.

At this point I would like to congratulate the Confederation of Philippine Exporters, under the leadership of General Balao, for successfully launching the Five-Year Export Development Drive to Japan, through our participation in the 12th Tokyo International Trade Fair. I visited the Philippine Pavilion with the First Lady and some members of the Cabinet during my state visit to Japan, and I can say I am not surprised that part of its immediate impact was in the form of more than $8 million worth of export contracts.

Of course, the First Lady being with me, I did not see much of the exhibits. The security almost panicked, I understand, because the mob who almost ran over me to get close to the First Lady had caused problems of security.

I certainly welcome continued selective participation in such fairs. But in addition to participating in fairs abroad, we should also be able to mount similar undertakings here in the Philippines. The Philcite which has been developed by the Governor of Metro Manila, the imaginative kapatas, permits us to hold export trade fairs according to international standards. But after this, the Philippine Export Council and the Department of Trade, together with COPE should now embark upon more imaginative undertakings that will have a decisive impact both on our people, who must develop a sense of pride in what they are able to produce, and on foreign visitors, who must be able to see for themselves the high quality of our products.

None of what we seek to achieve is possible unless we commit ourselves to greater endeavor; unless we assume for ourselves greater responsibilities. Without doubt, the last few years transformed both Government and the private sector in their estimation of their respective roles in carrying out a vigorous export trade drive. We have today less equivocal Government policies, and in the private sector, we have a more active entrepreneur class, better disposed to taking greater risks, better disposed to innovation and consequently able to produce a greater variety of higher quality products. All this spells a constancy of policy direction and thrust, the presence of a climate that should strengthen rather than weaken the partnership between the Government and the private sector, and more expeditiously promote our common advance. On the part of Government, we are committed to strengthening this partnership. But lest it be misconstrued that we believe progress will be attained without involving those who actually bear its social and human costs, we must even take care that our people are always involved in all undertakings of national magnitude.

It must then be our joint concern now — that of the Government and the private sector — to make sure that our people see themselves as truly benefiting from the gains that we attain especially from exports, and the progress we achieve is their progress, not just the progress of a few; that they see themselves fulfilled in both their needs and their wants and their lives; so that ultimately they will not only identify themselves with our gains, but also share our worries and bear the same anxieties that you and I must carry on our shoulders.

Address of President Marcos President before the Eighth Conference on the Law of the World, August 21, 1977

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
Before the Eighth Conference on the Law of the World

[Released on August 21, 1977]

The Challenge of Liberty

IT IS INDEED a pleasure and an honor for me to be able to speak before wise men who have dedicated their lives to the law.

It is with some trepidation of course that all of us approach this gathering. For as the cynics do say, when two lawyers get together one must immediately sense danger, but when three lawyers somehow arrange to meet, then one must start running away as fast as possible. However, when there are more than a hundred of them, then one had better just give up and give them whatever they ask for.

There is probably nothing I can say on law or on human rights that will not be said, and said better, by the legal luminaries assembled here but I am still too much of a lawyer, and still too much of a politician, to let an opportunity like this pass by without saying something.

This brings to mind the story of the Oriental observer watching an English trial. He found it an odd process in which one man was silent, another man talked all the time, and then 12 men condemned the man who had not said a word.

Although I do not expect this to be anybody's trial, I hope you understand if I feel I must contribute more than just my silence to this Conference.

In bestowing upon us the honor of hosting this Eighth Conference on the Law of the World, the World Peace Through Law Center brings this unique forum to a part of the world whose most sublime struggle in this century has been in the field of freedom, law and order, social justice, human dignity and human fulfillment.

Long after the oppressed classes had won their rights in the advanced nations of the West, entire peoples in Asia were yet only beginning to wage their own struggle. Our country preceded all of Asia in this struggle for freedom and though we won it only to lose it to the greatest empire that ever spread its wings across the nations of the globe, that struggle implanted in the Filipino psyche the seed that would become part of our permanent heritage.

From the dark shadows of colonial rule through the labyrinth of decolonization to self-rule and finally to our present program of national transformation, the history of the Filipino nation has been a consistent move towards expanding the limits of freedom.

I have come today to pledge anew that our new society which I have instituted is dedicated to the attainment of the true dignity and freedom of our people under a rule of law.

This is my passion, this is my life, as I know it is the passion and the life of the Filipino people. And as I have sworn allegiance to the Constitution and to our flag, so do I personally resolve and swear that neither time nor tide, neither men nor events shall swerve me from this purpose.

The subject of this Conference calls to mind the historic conflict of liberty and authority. The balancing of liberty and authority has been the object of the search of government since the beginning of time. Some call the resulting balance justice, others call it equity. It also comes under the generic term “public order.”

The Roman codifier has said that the two pillars of public order are law and authority. The unrestrained practice of individual liberty, so it is said, is anarchy. It is also the survival of the strongest irrespective of the claims and rights of the weak. In short, the law of the jungle prevails. The unlimited use of authority, on the other hand, results in tyranny the imposition of power by a few or by one over the many. In either case, force is its life and the degradation of the human being, its ultimate result. Thus, both must be avoided.

A government of laws is in between these two extremes. How far in between is the continuing puzzle of mankind. In every period of ferment and innovation, the question presents itself. All countries must confront it sooner or later, in one form or another. And all countries, all states, all people must formulate their own peculiar, unique answer.

The Philippines has been no exception, and we have given our answer. Rebellion, secessionism, private armies, the extremists of the Left and of the Right, criminal elements fishing in troubled waters, interventionists from foreign lands — corrupters and the corrupted — all these existed in the old society flouting both law and authority. This marked the period behind us before 1972, the proclamation of martial law. They brought about the loss of both political or civil and economic or social rights of the majority of our people. But democracy and the law are not impotent or defenseless organisms. For wisdom and foresight as well as precedent have provided their self-regeneration even after serious injury.

The Commander-in-Chief provision of our Constitution of 1935 as well as the Constitution of 1973 mandated a crisis government or a constitutional authoritarianism under such circumstances. The political leadership had the other option to discard the restraints of the Constitution and the law and to establish a completely new government — in short, a revolutionary government that would more expeditiously deal with opposition and criticism.

But I decided, even against the well-reasoned advice of some, that we needed the anchor of the law. There was need for a rule of conduct especially for the new rulers who had not known how to exercise authority before. We followed the Constitution. And we have never regretted it — this rule of law. What has brought about inquiry was not the exercise of this power to proclaim martial law but its utilization, not merely to return to the status quo which was its historical usage, but to bring about a radical restructuring of the entire society and the eradication of the causes of rebellion, whether economic, social or political. For the old society was an unjust and unbearable society, and under it the majority of our people had lost their most elemental rights, including the right to life, liberty, property, happiness and the right to participate in their government.

There was, therefore, the need to re-establish the balance between liberty and authority, and to return the government to the position in between, which had been lost somewhere along the way. The New Society has sought to bring about such a balance not on a temporary basis but on a permanent one. The institutionalization of radical reform shall always raise questions of law as well as of authority. This will be the eternal cycle not only in this part of the world but everywhere else as mankind seeks its perfect society. And no nation, no state, no group of men in whatever part of the world, or endowed with whatever talent, can claim to have reached such an ideal, that no one raises any question anymore.

In the Philippines, too, we have not been content with the law following after the footsteps of change and innovation. Rather the law has been utilized as the cutting edge of innovation and change.

Thus, land reform that restructured agrarian relations and land ownership throughout the country was not brought about by first establishing economic and social relations and then the law following to ratify and confirm. Rather the law mandated this change in such economic and social relations. At the same it made the change mandatory, sanctioned by the force available to the government. The same is true of the reform in labor as well as in monetary, tax, educational and other economic, social or political policies. In the latter, the organization of the barangays or the smallest political unit which is the village as well as the Sanggunian or the council in the villages and municipalities and provinces, the Sangguniang Pambok or Regional Assembly, were directed and ordered by law. The law did seek to revive an old tradition which used to be a part of Philippine culture now unknown to the new generations of the Philippines. Even the cooperatives, whether in irrigation or in farming, in production as well as in marketing, were brought about directly by law.

The radical transformation of our society has raised the question of the length and duration of martial law. I have no intention of leaving as a legacy to our people the institution of a command society.

There is an impression that no elections have been held under martial law. Nothing is further from the truth. There have been elections for the members of the Batasang Bayan or Legislative Council. We are moving irretrievably towards normalcy as we come closer to a solution of the southern secessionist movement as well as the leftist-rightist rebellion and the economic crisis.

I announce today, therefore, that there will be elections for local officials not later than next year, during which I hope to initiate an inquiry as to when we can hold the other elections for all other positions in the government. The effects of martial law itself will be lifted during the period of campaign and the elections.

I also wish to announce that as of yesterday, in celebration of World Peace Law Day, I have lifted the ban on international travel and terminated curfew. Lest I cause undue alarm among those who have advised me not to do so as yet, I hurry to announce that we will test the effects of these moves on our economy and our situation in the matter of peace and order.

Finally, I wish to announce that as of yesterday, I have issued a decree for the amnesty of those who have been guilty of subversion, which amnesty terminated last year, and which I revived, to extend for the next year. If there be any persons or detention prisoners who have not been tried by military tribunals and come under this decree, as of today, I order their release from detention.

I guess I should have made those announcements at the end of my speech, for these additional discussions may become anticlimactic. But let me proceed.

The world today is going through a new crucible of the spirit in which each nation must account for itself in the area of human rights.

No issue has attached itself so closely to the spirit of our times, and no issue will probably determine more how humanity will march out of this century into the next millennium.

Yet, however inescapable has been the outcry of this issue for universal recognition, consensus on it has not been easy to come by.

While we have made considerable progress in establishing the fundamental rights of humanity as a matter of primary international concern, mankind continues to witness some of the grossest violations of those rights, including certain acts that appear to be unique expressions of the problems of our contemporary world.

In an era that has brought forth undreamed-of advances in the human condition — the possibilities of longer life, the achievement of great wealth and abundance, the flowering of genius in the mastery of nature and the conquest of outer space — we continue to see grim reminders of adversity and suffering, compelling not only for their violence but also for the fact that they are often abetted by our very achievements in science and technology.

And this phenomenon is not easily summarized as a case of authority gone berserk and tyrannical; it is also many times the expression of liberties gone awry and anarchical. There are deplorable cases of state violence upon the citizenry, and there are also deplorable acts of terrorism by individuals and groups which in recent years have grown in brutality and horror. As some societies have struggled to maintain their stability, often to the extent of postponing the full enjoyment of certain rights, so also have there been societies overwhelmed by the tumult of revolution and political upheaval.

And overshadowing these problems in human affairs is the bitterness of the ideological conflict on the planet, which has already claimed the lives of millions — most of whom were not all protagonists or even in conflict but merely the tragic casualties of a world that insists on living on dogmas and doctrines.

Meanwhile, the economic gap between the developed and the developing nations has ripened into new forms of challenge to the security and well-being of mankind. We understand not at all the mounting crisis of rising populations and shortage of resources, if we do not see this as a fundamental denial of the rights of human beings to life, dignity, and individual fulfillment.

These are all symptoms of instability and decay in our contemporary world and we cannot, I think, resolve any of these problems with our eyes glued only to one aspect of the situation, indifferent to the others, or locked as the world appears to me now in a debate about virtues.

It is a situation that should rightly provoke a crisis of conscience, but an appeal to international morality alone will not suffice to deal with the problems we face. It must be matched by an equally dynamic response by the law of nations to deal with the problems and the issues of human rights.

This is why we cannot commend enough the efforts of this private association of men of the law from all over the world to promote the rule of law as a safeguard for the rights of men.

This is why this conference must lend itself to fresh approaches in the promotion and protection of those rights.

We are persuaded by the work that has preceded this conference that the way towards “the enthronement of human rights” in global affairs need not be an impossible goal, in spite of the great differences that divide the nations on its implementation.

From the time of the ancients to the present is a progression in the achievement of human freedom that has not been erased by even the most malignant instances of brutality and oppression in our world today.

Man’s idea of freedom has been decisively transformed by the epoch-making developments of the centuries; at each new turn in human affairs, there has always been an addition to the catalogue of rights that society and the world must win for the human individual.

The struggle for political liberty began as the struggle of subjects against their kings, and it ended in the unique declarations of the French and American revolutions which decisively changed the course of human history. The right of man to work and to the fruits of his labor, to a measure of well-being and social security, arose from the Industrial Revolution, and it changed radically the expectations of millions everywhere. The rights of peoples were won on the anvil of imperialism and colonialism and they continue to dominate the attention of men and nations in our time.

This is a heritage the likes of which no previous generation of men has known in its own time.

Most important, these are rights that have found recognition not only in human consciousness and aspiration but in a full body of laws in human society, not perhaps throughout the world as we would wish but in a good number of societies nonetheless.

Not for nothing will it be said that there is not a single country in the world today that does not swear by the ideals of “democracy” and “freedom.”

Substantial progress in the growth of human rights in international consciousness on the one hand is sometimes obscured by the denial of these rights in a number of societies on the other. This reflects to us what a great liberal spokesman of our time has called the “difficulty of the transition from nationalism to internationalism, and from unilateralism to multilateralism.”

It has been a difficult passage for the United Nations system of international cooperation; it has been more so, it would seem, for the international protection and promotion of human rights.

The international observance of human rights has its roots in a venerable number of treaties dating as far back as the Treaty of Augsburg of 1555, and all the way up to the critical period of the Second World War when the Grand Alliance made “the protection of human rights” one of its peace aims. These provisions in international agreements reflected a much more definitive development: the adoption of many European and American nations of the so-called “rights of man through Bills of Rights in their various constitutions and laws.

But the human rights movement in the modern context of protection on a global scale did not really begin until the signing of the United Nations Charter in 1946, which affirmed “faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small.”

Although the Charter enjoins member-states to observe a duty of joint and separate action in the field of human rights, the pertinent provision did not constitute a legal norm. What it did envision was a future international system of human rights, to be implemented by political means within the United Nations.

As conceived by the early signatories of the UN Charter, this system was to be embodied in an International Bill of Rights, to be stamped with the approval of the General Assembly by formal vote of its members.

Already, however, the non-inclusion of the Bill of Rights in the Charter was a reflection of some differences among the member-states concerning the issue. In developing a separate bill, the states would again encounter some differences, and this resulted in the decision to write an International Bill of Rights consisting of various parts: a Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and a Covenant on Social, Economic and Cultural Rights.

The Declaration passed easily enough the UN General Assembly in 1948, but it took another 18 years to draft the covenants and for the Assembly to adopt them in 1966. And for the covenants to take effect as a convention legally obligating state parties to the observance of their provisions, another ten years were to pass before a sufficient number of states finally ratified them.

Between the signing of the Universal Declaration and the ratification of the Covenants, new difficulties had plainly overtaken international consensus. In the passage of the Universal Declaration, almost total unanimity was achieved, with the Communist countries of Eastern Europe abstaining and not blocking the document. The Declaration, by and large, has represented a comprehensive listing of fundamental values, not only those that have enjoyed special attention and protection in the Western tradition but also those rights that have been the product of social and economic revolutions in this century.

The question of the Covenants and the machinery for implementation of human rights protection as a part of positive international law was another matter altogether. The member-states of the United Nations from the start already were divided as to which type of implementation would be desirable, and as to whether enforcement of the rights enumerated in the Declaration should even be attempted. There were those countries which, while accepting the Universal Declaration, thought that there should be no provision on international enforcement and that it should be left to the initiative of every state to raise itself to the full observance and promotion of human rights. And there were others which, while conceding the necessity for some measure of international control and protection, considered the procedures for enforcement laid down by the Covenants unsatisfactory and objectionable.

Many of these objections remain, and they are one reason why the majority of countries have not ratified the Covenants.

The Philippines, while ratifying the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights on July 6, 1974, has not ratified the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights as well as the Optional Protocol on Civil and Political Rights. While this has been interpreted as obtaining from the fact that the country is at present under martial law, it is in the records of the United Nations that in 1966 when the draft of the covenant was approved, the Philippines was not under martial law. The Philippine representative put on record during the deliberations in the Human Rights Commission its opposition to the means of implementation as constituting a derogation of national sovereignty inasmuch as it authorized other states to petition when the petitioner-state considers another state as not complying with the provisions of the covenant.

We entertain anxiety that this provision may result in the interference of the super powers in less-developed countries, without advancing the cause of human rights. This is the position adopted by most, if not all, of the developing countries.

We do subscribe to the rights enumerated in such covenant and the Optional Protocol on Civil and Political Rights, attaching special importance to the rights added to the covenant which are not specified in the declaration, particularly the rights of minorities.

The Philippines would prefer a regional approach to the problem of ensuring human rights protection.

But if the human rights movement has fallen short of creating positive international law to protect and defend rights all over the world, it has succeeded eminently in establishing the observance of human rights all at the forefront of world consciousness. While the Universal Declaration is not as binding as a convention, its moral and legal value cannot be gainsaid. As a development of the United Nations Charter, it brought human rights within the scope of positive international law. In point of fact, international agreements, new constitutions, and legislation in various parts of the world have referred to the Universal Declaration either specifically or by reference. In this manner, it has grown into "the final arbiter and standard of reference to which every new text on human rights must conform." There may be differences among the nations about the value of wisdom of the method for enforcement of the Covenants; there may be contentions about certain rights cited in the Universal Declaration; but there is no quibble today about the irreducible minimum of fundamental values, the violation of which must subject any nation to international censure and disapproval.

These fundamental standards draw for us the dividing line between nations that truly observe civility and those that do not. And they are worth restating: the prohibition of genocide and terrorism; the freedom from torture and cruel and barbarous punishment; the guarantee of due process of law to all who are accused; and the basic rights to life and security of person.

But the challenge of human rights does not merely require us to protect and promote these essential standards of civility and conscience; they require us also to promote and expand the larger freedom of man in society, and here the issue becomes very problematic because of differences in values, priorities and needs of different peoples and different nations.

Here we are face to face not with the irreducible minimum of fundamental freedoms but with a larger conception of human rights as the goal of human community.

As I perceive this aspect of the human rights issue, it is here where the campaign for human rights bitterly divides into a contention over ideology, rather than on realities; a competition for ascendancy in global affairs, rather than a genuine effort to advance the lot of men in the international community. And it is all the more confusing, because the debate is carried on with nations, and spokesmen using the same terms "democracy" and "freedom" as their yardstick, while attaching to these terms widely divergent concepts with varying emphasis.

On one side of the ideological spectrum, we are told by the apostles of communism that human rights are a "bourgeois illusion" until the social and economic emancipation of man is truly achieved by human societies. The cherished civil and political liberties of liberal democracy only serve to conceal from view the real enslavement of man in human society, because they appear to protect the human individual in his rights.

Now there is no question that both these conceptions of human freedom — of social and economic emancipation on the one hand, and political liberty on the other — have their claim on the agenda of every society. Recognition of both is well established in the United Nations program for human rights and in the very covenants that have sought to protect human rights in the world.

But are all impatient, and dogma insists and we are anxious to label that society which does not come up to the measure of either doctrine as either uncivilized or reactionary.

It is difficult enough that these doctrines should hold sway over the flux of global affairs it is regrettable that dogmatism has often resulted in the interventions of the strong in the affairs of the weak, to enforce an objective they consider universally-ordained.

From here have flowed the malignancies that have thrown mankind into war and its indescribable horror.

From here flowed the interventions on behalf of "freedom" that turned internal conflicts into unmitigated international tragedies; from here have flowed the conflicts that today rage in the ancient land of Africa and elsewhere.

And so we arrive at last at a full-bodied consideration of the status of human rights in the developing countries of the world — those countries which constitute so much of mankind today and whose experiences have not always conformed to cherished beliefs and assumptions in the field of human rights.

Most of these countries were at one time or another outposts of Western civilization, and so it has been a constant wonder why their long exposure to the West and its institutions did not suffice to prepare the soil on which Western democracy could grow and flourish.

It has been suggested elsewhere that of the more than 142 countries of the world today, only about 15 could be described as truly democratic in the Western tradition.

I do not commend this statistic to you with relish for it is certainly a fact that the Philippines has struggled long and hard to live by that tradition, to support its cherished institutions on Philippine soil; and when five years ago, we instituted crisis government, we became in short an apostate in the orthodoxy of liberal democracy.

Now what do these facts tell us?

The cynic will, of course, say that freedom and democracy are demanding ideals and that in the course of our histories, divisive forces simply overtook the will to sustain them and we marched forthwith into the bosom of tyranny, revolution and despotism.

But there is a deeper answer for those who would but consider the real experiences and hopes of the developing countries. Let me talk of the Philippine experience.

The choice of the democratic path at the dawn of independence for my country was not, even when we consider the evangelical fervor of American colonization, a choice dictated by outside interests but a genuine aspiration of our people. We wanted a government based on the consent of the governed; we wanted a political order that would allow for the free play of individual initiative and purpose; and we believed that this was the road that would lend us to a just, progressive, and humane society.

But it was a program that did not in the event prosper and realize itself. In the interval, our society far from attaining the established gains of Western democracy and far from developing the moorings of a democratic civilization, gradually passed into a state of profound decay and drift, in which the forms of democracy could no longer conceal the malignant inequalities, injustices, and tensions in the society.

It was a situation which in the view of the Left was ripe for revolution. Equally it was a situation, too, that was ripe for the intervention of Rightist reformers. We were resolved however — we who recognized the danger — that our democratic system would not submit to execution or consider its own suicide, that it would not surrender to either coup d'état or revolution. And so it was that we invoked the final measure enshrined in our constitution — the extraordinary protection of martial law.

We say that martial law has been proclaimed to protect the people and restore our true freedom.

But here, you might say, has been the rub. In our situation, we believed that martial law conceived simply as an interruption in democratic processes to meet the challenge of insurgency and reaction, would not suffice to stabilize political authority and order. For behind the forces that besieged the Republic, there were reasons rooted not in the fanaticism of revolutionaries alone but in the social and economic conditions of our people. Our democratic system had manifestly failed to reconcile its aspirations with national realities, and to make institutions and processes built on these aspirations effective to alter the conditions of our society.

This realization and the need to break out from the circle of futility, as has often happened in other societies, led us into the utilization of crisis rule itself as a means to effect vital and radical reforms in our society. It led us to a resolution that no less than a new society must be the outcome of this convulsion in our national life.

This is a process that can develop in several directions, as is well known to contemporary history. By choice, however, we have pledged that this must be a movement toward democracy and freedom, that this must be a period of building the infrastructure of a democratic society and then a process of constructing the full form of democratic government.

Now this is a claim which I am aware is often seen by foreign observers as merely a camouflage for authoritarian rule. There is anxiety that this interval of crisis rule may have resulted in a prolonged and prevalent suppression of human rights.

To this we can only commend a zealous examination of events and developments in the Philippines. And we stand by our record as a measure of how we protect and promote the fundamental rights of our people, and seek to expand the meaning of freedom for all.

And I will point out further that in this interval of emergency, we have not lost sight of our commitments to fundamental values and human rights. The Republic of the Philippines will rigorously adhere to the rule of law.

And though there have been to our lasting regret a number of violations of the rights of detainees, still it must be recognized that this is a society and this is a government that has not, does not, and will not tolerate the torture or maltreatment of prisoners, whatever charges they may face.

Periods of emergency in human affairs are usually the times when the lives and rights of individuals are at their greatest peril. It cannot be, it seems to me, an insignificant aspect of the Philippine experience that martial law in our country has never walked this edge of chaos and violence.

“No country, no people” said the United States Secretary of State at a meeting in Latin America last year, “for that matter no political systems, can claim a perfect record in the field of human rights.” The shortcomings are the issue of an imperfect world, dominated still by problems unrequited and prejudices aplenty. If so, we can only pledge our determination to do better, to work as sovereign societies towards those conditions in society that ensure human dignity and human community, and to work together towards the improvement of those structures of international protection and promotion of human rights all over the world.

We welcome this conference as we welcome all efforts to bring legal and political institutions in step with scientific and economic advances as well as the greater objectives of human freedom.

For the whole world is, and all states are, under pressure from a continually growing and more complex environment. All the social and political or legal institutions — and I mean all — created by man are now under questions, if not attack.

The natural scientist has been free in the secrecy of his laboratory to carry out his tests and experiments. For his studies can be safely cordoned and sealed off from directly affecting men and his world in general.

But the social and political scientist or engineer must of necessity find his laboratory and make his tests in the very center of life and use for his subjects men for whom he must hold deep and abiding emotions.

And the people on whom the legal, social or political innovations must be tested are keenly sensitive to any immediate prejudice to their lives. Since legal, social and political innovativeness must depend not only on popular tolerance but popular consent if not commitment, often the dim and distant long-term goals must be made palatable with immediate benefits.

The political leader may be unsure of his following or of the palatability of proposed innovations or he may be unable or unwilling to risk his political fortune or his good name and honor on a gamble based on incomplete knowledge, and therefore prefers the cautious and safe policy of the status quo following the principle of the legalist's stare decisis.

Natural science, too, is a realm whose terminology and activities are specialized in by its limited number of initiates. Observation and comment are necessarily left to the few wise men of that discipline who are not notorious for their loquaciousness or their obsession with publicity or popular approval.

The reverse is true of the legal or social and political science.

It is the concern of everyone, and everyone is an expert on the subject.

Woe to the legal or social and political innovator who cannot face up to and stand firm before the furious mob of advocates of the status quo, all completely convinced that the comfort of known and already appreciated danger is better than the glory of unknown and unfelt advantages and benefits.

Every legal, social or political concept is interpreted as a threat to human survival.

Certainly no premium is placed on the inquiring mind in this field. It is about time that as we grant incentives to the pioneering natural scientist and the economic entrepreneur, so too must we give incentives to the legal, social and political innovator.

Or face the bleak future of man's legal, social and political institutions ever remaining impotent or unequal to the demand of an ever growing complex world.

But what should concern all men of foresight, whether lawyer or not, is the state of international law and its enforcement.

National laws promulgated by competent authority are more or less uniformly drafted, formed along humanistic lines, and result in common observance and mutual benefit.

And national governments have authority of varying degrees and competence to enforce such national laws.

But in the realm of international relations, the general simplistic observation is that there is neither law nor authority.

The miracle is that the world has survived this long without either.

Sovereign states have succeeded in preventing the construction of the two pillars necessary for international public order.

And the conclusion cannot but follow that in the absence of law or authority there must prevail the law of the jungle — the survival of the strongest — short, anarchy.

The slow instinctive groping for a world order marks the graves of those lost in the wars and famines of nations caught in international disorder — in anarchy.

The last two world wars spawned the League of Nations and the United Nations.

The hope for an international order, however, remains an illusion.

The world government is a dream of the philosopher and visionary.

Except for the existence, erratic and disconnected though they may be, of some regional or tri-sectoral interdependence, the world's economic order is in disarray.

Free intercourse, the life of international trade, is on the retreat before the onslaught of national protectionism.

How many individual human beings will sleep hungry tonight because of the failure of our generation in this area of human activity?

How many desperate acts and decisions by nations and their leaders will be made, or lives lost by pressures brought about by such prosaic and common figures like deficits in trade or balance of payments? And all because the world's leaders cannot agree on the law and the new mechanisms to rule their economic conduct. Nor on the authority to enforce their decisions.

How many years have we been meeting on the law of the seas? And what have we accomplished other than to emphasize the variance and conflict of interests not only of ideology but of selfishness?

What about air space? The atmosphere or the stratosphere? And international terrorism? Or a hundred other items of the unfinished agenda?

There are any number of manifestations of international disorder or anarchy.

Some thinkers have well said that the third world war is not to come. It is here and now.

The proliferation of arms is unabated.

The prayers of all men go with the so far puny thrusts towards the limitation of weapons, especially of nuclear arms.

The big powers, so the apocalyptic prophets say, are being pushed by the logic of circumstances, that we do not even seek to deflect, towards the day they shall incinerate themselves and the world with them.

I fear that if the task to establish international law and authority is left alone to governments, it will remain undone.

Just as scientific discoveries and knowledge transcend national territorial boundaries, so too should the visions and hopes of the wise men like you who dream of world order.

It is a mission too noble to be abandoned to men of common clay. It is a calling for the devotee whose loyalty is not to race or nation but to man and his humanity.

We may not find them in leaders or would-be leaders of governments and states whose very survival and existence hang upon vociferous bigotry and demagoguery or demonstrated patriotic and nationalistic zeal.

But we may find our survival among men like you, the men whose dedication is not creed or race but the law as the embodiment of man's ideals and whose flag is not that of a nation but of the world.

The men of the law and of the mind shall be the arbitrators of the clash of national interests.

Moral sanctions are the only authority behind the law of nations, so they say. Let the integrity of the thinkers and the men of the law add prestige, add strength to that law. For they shall overleap boundaries and persuasions, overcome combative ideologies and conquer suspicion and distrust.

I look with hope to the day when philosophers will be kings and kings will be philosophers.

Address of President Marcos at the inauguration of the Oluho Cable System, August 26, 1977

Government and Business

I CONSIDER THIS double jeopardy. I have already delivered a statement, and now you want me to deliver a speech. However, I feel that the occasion is certainly important enough for two speeches by the President.

I am one of those aware of the critical contribution of communications to the progress of our world. The world in general is shrinking not only because of transportation but especially so because of communications. It is strange however that while man has demonstrated his capacity to communicate with fellow human beings on the moon, there are spots in the world that are still as backward as they were primitive since the beginning of time because of lack of communications.

One of the perennial complaints of political leaders of colonized states in the past was that it was easier for Manila to call up Washington than to call up Jakarta, easier for Jakarta to call up the Netherlands than to call up Bangkok. And you could continue these examples interminably.

At the same time, it has been said that no man is lonely or alone provided he can communicate with his fellow human beings. He may be physically isolated but communications eliminates the illusion of isolation. It has also been said that perhaps communications is the answer to the problem of perennial travel. And that it can supplant and replace this continued movement of people and population.

One of the areas that has suffered from lack of communications is Southeast Asia and the Pacific area on the rim of the Western Pacific.

The ASEAN countries in the last Summit Conference in Kuala Lumpur took note of this particular deficiency in the region, and acted immediately to rectify the errors in the past. You will note that the Okinawa-Luzon-Hongkong cable is merely a part of the general network of communications that is going to be set up in this western section of the Pacific.

I understand that there are on-going plans for the setting up of underwater cables from Singapore and Indonesia which are to be tied up with Thailand and Malaysia. In short, there will be an entire underwater cable system that will connect the various countries of this region.

I also wish to inform you that Singapore and the Philippines have entered into another cable agreement sometime back which I announced formally in Kuala Lumpur during the Summit Conference.

At the same time, an agreement has been entered into between the Indonesian and Philippine governments for the use of the domestic satellite of Indonesia for the Philippines. This replaces the original plans for the Philippines to utilize its own domestic satellite which would have been a costly matter. We were very happy to welcome the proposal of President Suharto and his men who came to the Philippines that we utilize the Indonesian domestic satellite instead of shooting domestic satellite for ourselves. I was very happy to be able to agree to such a proposal. I think that this farsighted and long-term view by President Suharto and the Indonesian government of the needs of communications in our region certainly will lead to further cooperation, and probably integration of the countries in this region.

I congratulate the corporations that are involved not only in establishing this link but in supplying the requirements. I understand that there are various suppliers of all the requirements of this communications system.

On the part of the Philippines, we have Eastern Telecommunications Philippines, headed by Mr. Manuel Nieto who has been the active leader in bringing about this link. Let us congratulate Mr. Nieto who is here.

On the part of the Japanese government, the DKK and KDD. You know, these initials and acronyms — there are so many of them — keep me worried. But I wish to congratulate the Japanese government for this participation. Japan plays a very crucial and critical role in the economy of Asia as well as of the world. As a matter of fact, European and American economists now seek Japan's participation in an effort to stabilize the world economy.

It can be properly said that without the participation of Japan there can be no solutions to economic problems. And I am very happy to note the cooperative attitude of the Japanese leaders headed by Prime Minister Takeo Fukuda who has just visited our country. Please extend, Mr. Ambassador to Prime Minister Fukuda my personal felicitations and congratulations on this particular matter. On the part of Hongkong, we have Cable & Wireless. I do not know if there are any representatives here of Cable & Wireless. But knowing the joint endeavor that has gone into this work, I am certain that Cable & Wireless is well represented here. The Ambassador from England is here, and I would like to congratulate Cable & Wireless and the British government for this participation. Let us congratulate our friends, England and Hongkong.

These efforts symbolize the continued and unremitting efforts of mortal man to extend himself beyond the boundaries of his constraints. Perhaps, 200 years from now, the people who will be using the cable will imagine that there were some men who thought beyond their times, beyond the 20th century. And I guess we will all be there since I see nothing but 20-30-year-olds here. This is our hope. And this is what keeps us moving, is it not?

Man will continue to strive beyond his time. I am always reminded by the thoughts of our great hero, Rizal. In one of his novels, an old man was asked why he kept on planting seeds when he was so old he would never be there to rest in the shade, taste the fruits, and smell the flowers of the trees. He smiled and said: Yes, I will be there. I will be there because my sons and daughters will be there to rest in the shade, taste the fruits, and smell the flowers of the trees. So 100 years from now, we will also be there, utilizing this cable to attain man's noblest ambition and bring about the unity of mankind.

Address of President Marcos at the closing ceremonies of the National Conference Workshop on the Joint Venture Housing Program, October 14, 1977

A National Program for Housing

FIRST OF ALL, allow me to say that I am indeed happy to be able to close this meeting of the National Conference Workshop on the Joint Venture Housing Program. From the opening remarks of General Tobias, I understand that this conference ended in conflict. When I came in, I noticed the almost sullen atmosphere in the Maharlika Hall. I immediately inquired from General Tobias if you had arrived at any agreements on rent and financing and on mortgage market and land availability — the principal problems of housing. Even before I asked the question, I knew you had not arrived at any conclusion.

I gathered that all of these subjects have stimulated much controversy. And these are the questions that determine the survival or success of not just the housing program but of those engaged in housing, housing development, and land development, like many of you.

However, I believe the fact that you are gathered indicates a renewal of interest not only in housing for profit but in the socialized housing program of our government. That actually is the problem. On the question of middle income or profitable housing projects, there should be easy solutions available to both the private sector and government. We start separating from each other the moment one speaks of socialized because there is no profit at all. And certainly most of us operate for profit. Let us admit it. Perhaps, there is some possibility of an understanding where government can step in and make up for the losses of profit at the least possible cost. That is the rub, the least possible cost to government.

Your conference represents one of the most concrete steps to bring the private sector and government under a common program. And we must congratulate all of you as well as the National Housing authority for bringing this about.

I feel that perhaps the conference should continue although in a different form. We should bring in the financing institutions of government. You speak of a second mortgage market. The Central Bank is not represented here. And without the Central Bank, you cannot speak of a second mortgage market.

The National Economic Development Authority has not made the decision on rent and rent control. And the NEDA is still pending with the various authorities. You know, I also inquired about subsidizing these efforts. And I have not heard from Jimmy Laya there whether he can afford it, especially now that he is confronted with financing some other operations in the South.

I am therefore in a way glad that we meet today if only to review the true magnitude of the problems with which we are confronted.

There is no need for me to emphasize in the agenda before the nation the high priority of housing services. We all know that the problems with respect to housing are pressing. It is now recognized worldwide that housing is a necessity as well as a good investment. McNamara of the World Bank has changed his bank's opinion. It had never considered loans for housing before, but now it does. For it realizes the role of housing now — as a social function of government and as a stimulant to the economy. It increases employment. It moves the business world at large. It is one of the most obvious economic indicators in the United States. Whenever anybody talks about crisis and the movement for ward, one talks of low-cost housing.

I have stated, and I repeat, that housing is second only in priority to food production. We have invested billions of pesos on rice and corn production. We are now moving into feed grains, sources of protein food, and blue or sea farming. We are moving into all areas of food production. We now must think in terms of housing in a more pervasive way. That priority remains. And in view of the success of the national food production program, it is perhaps time for us to place a heavier stress on the solution of our housing problems.

We therefore need a clear strategy on how to solve our housing problems. This must be responsive to the need of the greatest number.

Perhaps, I should outline to you the concept that seeks to meet this problem.

We created the National Housing Authority, through Presidential Decree No. 757, which integrated all government housing agencies and programs under one roof. The same decree laid down our national objective of providing “housing for the greatest number,” and the formulation of a national strategy to attain this objective.

To fit housing efforts within the total scheme of national development, government subsequently created the Human Settlements Commission in 1976. Before this, we already had a Task Force on Human Settlements But this was elevated to a Commission in 1976. The development of human settlements is a necessary complement to housing services, in view of the fact that housing requirements will obviously demand the development of new areas for housing. And such development must be fitted squarely into the larger framework of economic and social environment.

With the creation of the National Housing Authority and the Human Settlements Commission, we subsequently moved to implement a more coherent housing policy and strategy.

As a first step, we have endeavored to correct the various unscrupulous and fraudulent practices that have characterized land and housing development in our country for many years. So we have Presidential Decree No. 957 to regulate the sale of subdivision lots. And while this is designed principally to protect home and lot buyers from unscrupulous land developers, we envisioned it also as an encouragement and an incentive for legitimate developers to embark on more ambitious land development programs.

We also have a series of Letters of Instructions. Now, what are these Letters of Instructions? They define the thrust of the government’s housing efforts. LOI 509 directs the establishment of demonstration projects for a community of 500 families. LOI 557 enunciates the national policy of upgrading slum areas and other blighted communities. And LOI 555 adopts a nationwide program of slum improvement and resettlement. You remember, we borrowed money for the Tondo slum upgrading program. Instead of moving out the inhabitants in the area, the area is sought to be upgraded. I believe that you know the program perhaps better than I do. This has resulted in several housing projects for the poor in our country. I am very happy to note the experimentation on this score which is also going on in the private sector.

Thirdly, there has been a perceptible rise in housing projects in recent years consonant to the call of government. Investments of the Government Service Insurance System and the Development Bank of the Philippines have stepped up considerably. In 1974, I ordered the SSS and the GSIS to individually set aside P500 million a year for housing alone. Complementing their efforts is the support of private institutions to government’s call that they develop housing Programs for their employees. And the unions are also involved here. The unions were requested to exploit all possible resources so that they may participate in the effort to set up housing for their members. While undoubtedly there is this initiative on the part of the private sector as well as government, it is still well below the requirement. It is a start in the right direction. And it remains only for us to develop the right incentives and measures to spur further investments in housing by corporate institutions.

But it is obvious when we review the progress of the national housing program, in the light of housing needs, that results at this stage have touched only a single aspect of housing. There remain formidable problems that we must still face before there can be any substantial progress whatsoever. Now, these are the problems to which we must address ourselves now. One of the problems is the lack of suitable land. In round figures, land availability in the Philippines is divided into the areas that are arable, the areas that are wooded, and the areas in-between. We have sought to continue developing our agriculture in an extensive way. And now we are moving into intensive agricultural development — 13 million out of the total 30 million hectares. And at the same time, we are trying to keep the wooded areas at 42 percent which is the present area covered by our trees. These are declared as reserved forests and as commercial areas supposedly renewed by reforestation.

This problem of land has been the result of speculation, hoarding — a reflection of the widening gap between the rich and the poor in our country. Prime lands have been cornered and developed for high income housing, and what remain for the low-income group are those which are far from the fringes of the urban cores. In addition, a great number of suitable sites are idle and vacant lands, obviously the investments of land speculators.

We must now therefore deal squarely with this problem of idle lands for housing. And government itself must now move into what we would call “banking land for the future.” It is one of the policies under consideration by government to resort to expropriation of property. But the problem of land for low-income families can better be resolved if we encourage property owners to invest in housing projects. Alienable land is one problem. And the other is the spiralling of land development and construction cost. I am sure you know this more than I do.

The cost of housing today is virtually prohibitive for both the low-income and the middle-income families. One of the measures that must surely be considered high in our agenda is an earnest effort to match cost with what people can afford, especially those in the low-income group. And this is where government perhaps can step in. And this is where we will need a more sophisticated approach to the problem than what we are already planning. It will require further study. I noted that the National Housing Authority wants to be given the authority to lend out money or subsidize the housing schemes. Of course, we can trust the National Housing Authority on this. But this probably requires support not merely by the budget but also by the Central Bank. The discounting facilities of the Central Bank should be available to the extent that this will not increase inflationary pressures. And how to balance this is still a big problem.

I address this principally to the financial managers of government — Central Bank, Department of Finance, National Economic Development Authority. I am sure that they are listening in excitement about all of these, because any allocations now by government for any purpose not found in any of the priority projects that we have already listed down, will mean that some of the projects will not be funded for this year. And so the proposal of General Tobias to allow the National Housing Authority to extend financing for the housing scheme of the private sector is a good proposal. But it requires further study. I therefore order the National Economic Development Authority to call a conference on this, and ask the Budget Commissioner, the Secretary of Finance, the Secretary of Public Works, Transportation, and Communications, the Central Bank, and the financing institutions to participate. The National Housing Authority will be the proponent and will present this matter to the NEDA as soon as possible.

We have always spoken of lowering the standards for housing realistically. This will need the participation of the private sector so that we can meet the requirements of the low-income group. And I repeat that socialized housing will need the support of the private sector as well as government. And I believe that before the private sector can move into this type of housing, government will have to support it. I believe that this is the key to the low-income housing problem.

But I would like the conferees to know that government is aware of the need to tackle this problem forcefully and energetically. We want the recommendations of the private sector during these hearings. We would like to know whether government can, within its limited resources, afford such a scheme. And in what magnitude. To say that we are going to build houses all over the Philippines is not realistic. We know very well that we cannot do it right now. But we adopted a five-year or ten-year or even a long-range program in order that we can meet this problem. And I am here to tell you that it is my intention that we develop such a program which will provide a fair margin of profit for the private sector and at the same time entail the least cost to the government.

There is no need to repeat the fact that the housing requirements for low-income housing may run into billions of pesos. But, I repeat, perhaps, we can spread this over a period of years. It requires a tapping of other resources to complement what the government can invest. This is the underlying reason for the efforts of government to invite the private sector to participate in the implementation of our national housing program.

The development of the secondary mortgage market, which today is actually non-existent, is something that is addressed again to the financing sector. I suggest that this be included in the studies and the program that will be proposed by the National Housing Authority to the National Economic Development Authority.

There is this amendment to Presidential Decree No. 953 proposed by the National Housing Authority. I have here with me the proposal which does not alter the 30 percent requirement for open space, but redefines the term open space for subdivision. I brought some of these decrees to Bicolandia with me during my inspection trip.

I therefore sign in your presence a decree which defines open space as an area reserved exclusively for parks, playgrounds, recreational areas, schools, roads, places of worship, hospitals, health centers, barangay centers, and other similar facilities and amenities. It also provides that the owner, as a developer of a subdivision, shall provide adequate roads, alleys, sidewalks for subdivision projects one hectare or more. The owner or developer shall have 30 percent for open space. Its open space shall have the following standards allocated exclusively for parks, playgrounds, and recreational uses:

(a) 9 percent of gross area for high density or social housing, which means 66 to 100 family lots per gross hectare.

(b) 7 percent of gross area for medium density or economic housing, which means 31 to 65 family lots per gross hectare.

(c) 3.5 percent of gross area for low density or open market housing, which means 20 family lots and below per gross hectare, etc.

I presume that this should be of some help to you. I therefore have the pleasure to sign this in your presence.

There is a proposal on rent control. This seeks to amend the existing limits on rent control and the release of rent control over a period of five years. Rent control was met with undisguised opposition in your meetings, I understand.

Instead of now moving into a definite amendment, I now ask this conference to submit to the National Economic Development Authority, perhaps, through the National Housing Authority, a proposal to eliminate rent control over a period of five years.

Presidential Decree No. 745 grants tax incentives to corporations and partnerships, with 300 employees or more, engaged in employee housing. It is now my pleasure to sign an amendment to this decree which now extends such tax exemption and incentives to subdivision developers and owners. This means that those who engage in the development of housing for low-income families will now be included in these incentives. I sign this in your presence.

I am confident we will overcome the obstacles in the light of this policy as well as the proposed new policies and the bringing in of the Central Bank, the National Economic Development Authority, and the financing institutions into the picture for the development of the secondary mortgage market. We need a little more push and concentration of our energies and talents on this problem.

It is now necessary to see how the private sector will react to these offers. But may I request that the private sector be more alert in looking into these opportunities, that these dialogues you have started be continued.

I am certain that we have substantially discarded the old “niñgas cogon” vice of our race, and that we will persist and persevere in the solution of this problem.

I am impressed by the degree of support and participation the private sector has been able to give, notwithstanding the often erratic attitude of some of the original agencies engaged in housing. I look forward to further cooperation and coordination between the National Housing Authority and the financing and monetary authorities of our country. With the sectors working together with you, I have no doubt we will alleviate the housing situation in our country. And in so doing, we will contribute to the progress of our economy.

Once again, let me congratulate you for undertaking what to me is an almost impossible task. I repeat that this has now become manageable because of your cooperation and participation.

Once again, I assure you that I am aware of the problems of housing and land development. And our New Society, while engaged in improving the lot of the lower classes, has no intention of adopting the socialist answer to the economic problem — the elimination of property. As you are well aware, our economic system is based on free enterprise. And the principal agent of change shall be the private sector. This is true not only with respect to housing. Although, I repeat, on socialized housing, government may have to come in and grant subsidies. And this is where the Budget Commissioner will have to make very hard-headed decisions as to the magnitude of such subsidies.

But, I repeat, we will depend upon the private sector. We will set the atmosphere and grant incentives. We will give the assurance that government will look to the private sector for the development especially of low-income and upper-class types of housing.

I repeat that as long as I am President, this program will be supported.

It is my dream and hope that within the next several years, we will see the first steps that will bring about the solution of this perennial and nagging problem of housing in our country.

Address of President Marcos at the graduation exercises of the Junior Executive Training Program (JET) and the Supervisory Training for Effective Administrative Management (STEAM) of the Civil Service Commission, October 14, 1977

The Reform of the Bureaucracy

NOTHING IN THE agenda of our national government is more important in the long term than the continuing revitalization of our government bureaucracy. And nothing can truly insure the sustained implementation of our national development program except an effective governmental machinery.

We placed high priority on government reforms immediately after we established a crisis government. And it was for this reason that we continue and must continue with the effort to improve and enhance the operations of our government bureaucracy.

Here in these graduation exercises are represented the basic thrust of this program of governmental reform, the extent of its reach throughout the whole length and breadth of the bureaucracy, and the depth with which reform is being sought.

Today, we graduate 693 members of the service under the Junior Executive Training Program (JET) bringing to 1, 836 graduates the number of those who have benefited from this middle-management reorientation program of the Civil Service Commission.

In addition, we witness today the graduation of the first two batches of graduates under the Supervisory Training for Effective Administrative Management (STEAM), which has been designed as the managerial skills development program to complement the JET program. Under this later training scheme, 887 officials from 26 government agencies have benefited from the program.

Although these two program touch only a fraction of the more than 600,000 work force of the national government bureaucracy, their impact to my mind will be far-reaching and profound. For they are concerned basically with the training of those who hold key positions in the bureaucracy, those who man the middle-management layers of the government machinery, and who therefore lead and direct a critical aspect of governmental operations in our country. We have remarked many times in the past about the inefficiency and graft of the government service. We have been bewildered and appalled by the degree of waste and misuse of limited resources yearly being perpetrated in government.

But it is only now that we are really beginning to understand the true soil of inefficiency and corruption in the service, and more important, it is only now that we are beginning to really cope with it.

The basic problem had always been a question of where to begin such an effort at reform. Because the problem was too large, we tended merely to focus upon one aspect of the entire malaise — on the so-called ineffectiveness of government competitive examinations, on the presence of grafters in government, or on the selection of people for the higher-ranking cabinet positions.

But in fact, weeding out undesirables from the service was only a partial answer to the total problem. Improving the civil service selection process answered a part of it, but not the whole. And in spite of the growing technocracy of the official family, we have continued to confront very basic problems in the operations of our governmental setup.

All these have convince me that our fundamental concern must be laid squarely in building towards a total concept of governmental reform, based upon a practical and workable system that provides for stability, development and growth. We have to turn our thoughts to the total units first, and from there work out the ways and means to repair the malfunctioning parts, to eliminate the obsolete and ineffectual, and to harmonize operations under the total scheme.

And this is in fact what we have now begun to achieve.

Under this total scheme of governmental reform, we now have a governmental structure that has considerably eliminated the duplication of functions among agencies, and has attained a level of harmony and cooperative action unrivalled in previous years. This was the particular achievement of the Integrated Reorganization Plan which streamlined the flow of governmental work from national to regional to local level.

But this structural concept, while all-pervasive, was in fact only the starting point of reform. Our next focus, after streamlining responsibilities and functions, was a far more demanding task – that of galvanizing people and units within the bureaucracy so that its operations would fully reflect itself in the implementation of vital national programs.

This latter task was preeminently the responsibility of an effective Civil Service Commission, and it was in this light that the Commission was constituted by no less than the fundamental law, the New Constitution, as an independent constitutional office. In keeping with this Charter provision I ordered the reorganization of the Commission, and consequently issued a series of decrees, instructions and policy directiveness designed to aid and guide the agency in the accomplishment of its tasks.

That this latter responsibility is well-reposed in our Civil Service Commission is well-demonstrated by the various programs that it has launched, and the innovative spirit that has marked its efforts to adjust the long-standing policies of past commissions.

I am glad to note for instance that the Commission no longer forms a stumbling block to the operations of government agencies. Instead of being a medium of control over the bureaucracy — as it tended to be in the past— it has become a support and assistance arm of the departments and agencies of government. And this is best reflected in its post-audit policy regarding appointments.

It is also significant to note that we are finally moving out of the system of seniority for promotions within the service, towards a more dynamic concept of personnel enhancement that recognizes the need for a dynamic corps of government personnel and seeks to welcome the wave of technological change taking place in governmental administration.

Most of all, there is great significance in the attention being given by the Civil Service Commission to the training of management and the rank and file in the government bureaucracy, an aspect of its work which we see today at this commencement.

The training of people within and for the government service is necessarily a complex process, and I will be the first to say that it will fail if it does not recognize at once the complexity and vastness of the army of men and women we are trying to reform. Immediately there is the question: Whom will we train? Where shall we put our emphasis? How shall our training programs be designed to attain the greatest impact?

For the government bureaucracy is an institution of many layers — starting from the very top and stretching all the way down to the rank and file — and to the multiplicity of layers, there is the added problem of innumerable personnel. It is easy to say that we must improve every member of the government service — a fact we well recognize — but how do you begin such an effort to reform a veritable army of personnel?

The only effective way is to institute first a singular concept of government which would in short emphasize the unity of all government departments and agencies as a single bureaucracy. That is to say, that we must build a one-team concept from the multiplicity of functions that characterize the individual units and arteries of government. It is only on this basis that we can conceive of one functioning and harmonious bureaucracy, and it is from this team concept that the Civil Service Commission works towards the improvement of the whole machinery.

Secondly, when the idea of team effort is accepted wholly by the departments and agencies, it becomes possible to conceive of training officials and employees from different agencies under a common program. Regardless of the specialized functions of different agencies, there are a multitude of administrative tasks — from accounting, to supplies, to services, to budgetary functions, up to the simplest administrative functions — that are shared in common by these agencies. And it is really at this level where many of the bottlenecks of government administration occurs.

Finally, because the bureaucracy is of necessity a hierarchy of responsibilities and functions, the training of administrative skills cannot be the same for every member of the service. It is important therefore that personnel development evolve a system to develop skills and competencies proper to every level of the service.

There must be a personnel development program for the rank and file, and there must be also a development program for those who manage and direct the operations of government.

Traditionally, we have always been weak in the training of the people for sensitive middle management positions in our government bureaucracy. I have always been convinced that the real bottleneck in our government has been neither the top nor the bottom of the hierarchy, but the middle layer of management personnel. This is in part due to the fact that many of these attractive positions were captured by the politics of privilege and influence in the past, which by-passed the effective application of civil service rules and regulations.

And from incompetence at this level have flowed the gross corruption that visited our government bureaucracy, in addition to the malfunctioning of entire agencies and even departments.

While it is important therefore that we focus continuing concern on the recruitment of able men for the highest offices of government, as well as for the rank-and-file positions, there is urgency to the need to develop a corps of government managers at middle management level in the bureaucracy—that is to say, able managers to head and supervise divisions and services.

This is the significance that I attach to the Junior Executive Training Program and to the Supervisory Training for Effective Administrative Management.

In this first program, we have the necessary reorientation process needed to instill in government personnel the proper work attitudes and concepts within the total scheme of national effort. This is necessary because there is need more than ever for people in the service to understand the fundamental programs, thrusts and objectives of our New Society today, and to understand how managerial competence exercises its influence on the attainment of such objectives. Unless we involve our many supervisors and division chiefs in the total scheme of national effort, unless they understand and believe in what they are working for, I do not think that we can effect any appreciable change in the quality of management of the bureaucracy.

The second program — STEAM as the Civil Service Commission describes it — is a skills training program. It was designed as a follow-through of the Junior Executive Training Program, and it was specifically in response to my Letter of Instruction No. 518 which directed the Civil Service Commission ‘ ‘to establish and implement a supervisory training program for chiefs of divisions throughout the national government, which it shall make available to the different departments and agencies.” Such training program, the LOI further directed, “shall be geared towards the development of necessary skills in supervision, especially the training, development, and motivation of personnel.”

The basic rationale therefore of STEAM is the development of managerial insights and attitudinal reorientation fostered by the first program, the JET. It would translate concepts into practical work programs within the specific context of individual environments in the bureaucracy. Thus, STEAM was administered on a decentralized basis in order to imbue it with work-centered orientation.

It is gratifying to note that this latter program is already developing at this stage support and assistance from such institutions as the UP College of Public Administration and the Development Academy of the Philippines. This is only proper; for obviously, we must ever build towards a heightening of skills and a broadening of scope in our training programs.

It is of course too early to judge how the JET and the STEAM would affect our civil service, the entire national bureaucracy, for we must caution ourselves that it is a long-term effort. But it would seem to me that we have now at this stage effected already a new form of coordination and cooperation among our departments and agencies through our personnel development program. There is much less confusion today concerning how our governmental machinery works, and much less despair about getting things moving in government.

My confidence in the necessity and effectiveness of these programs lies in the fact that they have generated the full support of our government agencies, and more important, the interest and eager participation of those whom they seek to train.

At first, I was afraid that if the seminars were held during office hours, it might be considered by those participating as some kind of a vacation. But I gathered that you have seriously worked at the development of your talents, capabilities, and skills. And I am very happy to hear this. This further strengthens my trust and hope that the Filipino will rise up to the challenge if he knows what he is fighting for, if he knows what the stakes are, if he knows what the objectives are, and if he knows what the alternatives are. What is going to happen if we do not change, if we do not reform?

And from such small perhaps humble beginnings lofty goals will be attained.

For conceivably, the hundreds who have been graduated by these programs will move on from here to motivate and to spur the thousands who serve in our government service.

Today, therefore, I take this opportunity to commend you all upon your successful completion of these training programs. I wish you success in your work, and I ask you to continue to develop your skills within the service.

I commend also the Civil Service Commission for its painstaking efforts to develop and implement these training programs, and for its even more ambitious effort to promote personnel development in our national bureaucracy.

Of course, we must also thank those who have participated in this program — the Development Academy of the Philippines headed by no less than President O. D. Corpuz of the University of the Philippines; Dean Raul de Guzman of the UP College of Public Administration; Director Celerina G. de Veyra of the Junior Executive Training. We congratulate all of you. You are well aware that these are not the only training programs that are going on. We have the Career Executive Service Development Program which is being implemented by the Career Executive Board through the Development Academy of the Philippines. This is the training of the undersecretaries, assistant secretaries, bureau directors, assistant bureau directors, regional directors, assistant regional directors, department service chiefs, and other officials of equivalent rank.

The CESDP is administered by a board. The President of the Development Academy of the Philippines is the Chairman. The Chairman of the Civil Service Commission and the Chairman of the Presidential Reorganization Commission are members.

Then we go down to the JET which is the middle managers training program.

The follow-through program for teachers consists of distance training schemes in which learning packages on the New Society are mailed to teacher JET graduates for self-learning purposes. I launched this last year and all of the 15 073 who graduated from the first phase of the JET course are undertaking this program.

Now the training of the rank-and-file is conducted on a decentralized basis and it is concerned with orientation, reorientation, the development thrust of government, without precluding the inclusion of subject matters of special interest. How many employees in the rank-and-file have gone through this training? 47,952 employees.

In addition to these, we have the youth training program for leadership, the Buklod ng mga Kabataang Kawani, aged 30 and below. The Civil Service Commission leadership development program is for leaders of the future. These are the young men who are marked out to assume higher responsibilities in government. The National Defense College of the Philippines has a new program geared towards instilling in the youth the sense of pride in our heritage, and further exposing them to the development program and goals of the New Society. It is a five-week program which is going to start on October 17. The first class consists of 70 participants, including a group of regional directors, chosen on the basis of rigid screening by the Civil Service Commission. The Civil Service Commission has allocated at least five slots each for the 13 regions of the country. This was done to ensure that the regions shall have a fair share of trained young people.

Now, how about scholarship programs? You are an undergraduate. You want to get your degree. We have a scholarship program. I go through all these because I know that many people are listening to me now. And they might think that we have nothing but training programs for the middle management level. No.

What are these scholarship programs? We have the national scholarship for development which encourage those who have not completed undergraduate studies to do so on a study-now-pay-later scheme. However, they are required to pursue courses in areas considered by NEDA as priority areas for development.

Now, scholarships in public administration prepare the persons in government for the requirements of the higher executive levels through formal education. And I have instituted a scholarship program even in the Armed Forces. While you are in the service, you can go to college depending on your qualification and specialization. This program has just started under my administration. Quite a number have gone to college and obtained a basic bachelor's degree, a master's degree, even a doctorate degree.

What is the Balik-Barangay program? Well, at least, you spend 15 days in the barangay. And I wonder whether we have any feedback on how this is being implemented. But by and large, this interaction between the bureaucracy and our people will be for the good of everybody.

Now, the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission is now working out with heads of departments engaged in extension services a program to integrate and upgrade the extension services of government. An extension worker is an expert in a particular line of undertaking. He must likewise be able to carry out the other training programs of government. This is for reasons of economy. So you see, we have an entire new structure for training and revitalizing the bureaucracy.

I can only therefore express my satisfaction over these initiatives, but I wish to formalize the effort to train, retrain, reorient, motivate the civil service. And because of this, I would like to sign in your presence a decree which establishes the Civil Service Academy with the assurance by the Civil Service Commission that there is not going to be much additional funding. This will integrate and render more purposeful and systematic all these efforts. When this matter was presented me, my first question to the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission was: Can you see the same funds you are using now in the various departments for training, put them all together into an academy with the same personnel? And I have his assurance that this is so. I say this because I am sure Commissioner Laya is listening to this speech, and wondering how much more he is going to set aside for training. And with this assurance, I hereby sign in your presence this decree.

Now, you will come under a formal umbrella. I direct that all those who have graduated from these training programs — JET, STEAM— to come now under the umbrella of the Civil Service Academy. You are well aware how this will affect you personally because your rankings, your capability for promotion, your screening, will be based on these qualifying seminars and training programs and the attitudinal tests that will be a part of this course.

I therefore hope that these programs will continue as well as they have started. And so long as I am President, I assure you that they will receive the support of the Office of the President. For I am certain that this training program is the key to the efficiency and stability of the entire bureaucracy. And, perhaps, the fulfillment of many of our national programs.

So to each and everyone of you again, congratulations and good luck.

Address of President Marcos at the 78th founding anniversary of the United Methodist Church, October 22, 1977

The Grace of Our Lives

APART FROM THE high honor and privilege of joining you today for this anniversary celebration. I find it very appropriate that as President of our Republic I should come here with you to commemorate the 78th anniversary of the founding of the United Methodist Church.

As you observe today the 78th year of your Church, the Filipino nation also observes the 79th year of national independence. It is not at all irrelevant to point out that almost at the same time that the Filipino flag was being raised in the Philippines, the beginnings of your ministry was also being sown among our people.

Both events took place at a crucial period in the history of our people — a period of ferment when our people were forging for the first time the bond of national community, and when new influences from across the seas were entering the fabric of our lives.

It was a period of high expectation and of new discovery, when this land was bright with the promises of dreams to be fulfilled.

The way in which the course of Philippine Protestantism intertwined with the course of national life will be seen in the fact that many Filipinos who led in the propagation of the Protestant faiths were also active leaders of the nationalist cause. And many who joined the new churches at the turn of the century and in the early decades of the 20th century, were men in profound rebellion against tradition, seeking something new in their lives and in their human community.

By force of circumstance therefore, there has always been a manifest kinship between the Filipino nation and the church, the church that has come to be your faith all these many, many years.

And these affinities at birth were to continue over the decades making of this church and its members an essential part of the evolving national community.

It is only apt therefore that this year of celebration for the United Methodist Church should recall to us these beginnings, for in many ways the problems of the times we live in call us once more to deal with them together.

If there has been one distinctive change in the thrust of Christianity all over the world, and here, in our country, it has been the efforts of the Christians to recover the mainspring of the faith within the context of new problems confronting all of mankind.

After half-a-century of unparalleled material progress, men are once more concerned about their spiritual life, of how secular progress might be reconciled to the needs of the spirit. There is a yearning for a larger expression of human destiny, deeper than what science has so far given man.

This striving of the human person has also been paralleled by a new concern of the Churches to make themselves more relevant to the needs and the problems of men and their society. Within Christianity itself, we have witnessed it in the ecumenical spirit inaugurated by Pope John XXIII, and this has led into new commitments of all the Christian faiths to build a world of peace and of progress.

Here in our country, these developments in Christianity are of the greatest import, for it is here, in this kind of soil and climate, where we find projected before us the dramatic problems of poverty, misery and deprivation in the world. More and more, we have come to realize that the life of the faith cannot be divorced, as in the past, from the problems of the here and now. More and more, we have seen the very ministry of the Christian churches turned anxiously towards the uplift of the very poor and the needy.

It is in the manner the problems of societies draw us into a common quest for availing resources that we find today the bond between religious institutions and the rest of society. It is the way the work of one institution complements and enriches that of the other where we see the totality of our concerns as one seamless united whole.

Today, we find ourselves again in one of those critical periods of ferment in our history that parallels in many ways the era that saw the birth of the nation and of the Protestant church. For this is a time of challenge and opportunity in our country — a time of challenge because the problems of our society today are compelling, urgent and critical; and a time of opportunity because our situation fully confers upon our efforts the confidence that the future of our community will be better.

Never before since the revolution of 1896 have we needed more the strength of our solidarity and fraternity as a people; and never before have we had the opportunity to utilize our solidarity to make change and to make progress.

In our quest for national tranquility and progress, we shall find that the full sense of our national community cannot be realized without the transcendental acts of the spirit which acknowledges and confirms the brotherhood that we all share. We cannot accomplish the awesome burden of national development and transformation unless there is fundamentally a regeneration of the spiritual forces that truly bring us together. And we shall miss indeed the whole purpose of progress itself, if our work does not exalt the human person, in the manner that all religions do.

Mabini, the Sublime Paralytic of the Old Propaganda Period and the Revolution, saw this a long time ago when he called for what he termed the “inner revolution” among our people, as the real basis for the hope of the new Republic. Seventy-nine years later, we find the same call more compelling than ever,

What is so strong and dynamic about Christianity has always been its power to inspire man to reach for an ideal larger than himself. It is not by any means the power of dogma, or the power of organized action or religion, that has made the Christian way so compelling a force in human civilization. Rather it has been its unique celebration of the resources and possibilities of the human spirit.

Christianity in the final analysis is not a theory of the world to be set against the dogmas and isms of our time. It is an ethic for living. To be a Christian. Montaigne wrote a long, long time back, is to be just, Christian, charitable and kind, and therefore to live in fraternity with other men.

This call to human community is not finally different from the ideals that bring men together to form communities and nations. In both, there is an image for man and the same appeal to human brotherhood in the quest for better things.

One of the simplest and most succinct statements about the role of Christian churches was that made by the Protestant theologian Paul Tillich when he said: “Making men better, helping him to become actualizations of the Kingdom of God on earth — this is the function of the Church.”

For even as religion seeks to guide us to our spiritual destiny, all religions tell us that the way to attain it is through the kind of grace we make of our lives and of the temporal world.

In this way, I see the great relevance of religion to the drives and cares of a modernizing society such as ours.

On this the 78th anniversary of the founding of the United Methodist Church, it seems appropriate to restate these old truths, so that we may the better reaffirm and renew in our lives the resolves, the loyalties, and the ideals that make us Christians and Filipinos together.

Address of President Marcos at the observance of United Nations Day, October 24, 1977

Towards a World Community

IT IS INDEED meet and proper that this anniversary of the United Nations Charter, which is based on the age-old hope and longing of all mankind to bring about all men of all races, of all creeds, of all persuasions into one single family, should be celebrated principally by the young, the youth of our land. For if there is any group for which these long-standing principles on which the United Nations is based, are preached and followed and implemented, it is for the youth of all the countries of the world.

When I stepped into this forum, I looked around and happily discovered that the audience was going to be composed of young men and women— like me. I never underestimate the capability of the young to instinctively appreciate the basic idealism which inheres in any great movement. And the United Nations embodies one such movement.

I therefore welcome this opportunity to be with you. I congratulate the sponsoring organizations, especially the Philippine International Friendship Organization, which incidentally our government has encouraged by giving it free quarters. And I take note of the request of this organization that the quarters which are owned by the Government Service Insurance System be now especially assigned to the Philippine International Friendship Organization. I also take note of the request of the foreign students that those who come under Visa 9-F as well as their wives and children be exempted from the new travel tax. This request shall be granted. However, I impose this condition — that the children and wives be not permanent residents of the Philippines. I hereby declare them free from travel tax.

I gather that the United Nations Charter is a subject of study not only in the elementary school but also in the high school in the Philippines. I presume that this is true in all countries of the world. It is therefore proper that we discuss today the Charter of the United Nations

For this is an occasion for a renewal of commitment to the principles embodied in the United Nations Charter. It is an occasion for a reaffirmation of loyalty to the organization which it established, and for a re-dedication of ourselves to the all-encompassing quest for a true world community. On behalf of the Government and the people of the Philippines, I take great pride in expressing once again our full support for the principles, the organization, and the goals of the United Nations.

It is not merely to fulfill a ceremonial requirement for a commemorative occasion that I voice this fulsome expression of support. There have been of late voices heard expressing serious disenchantment over the world organization, disenchantment deriving from the old impatience with the lack of progress of the United Nations in some problem areas, and disenchantment arising from the emergence of a new voting majority in the General Assembly composed for the most part by the nations of the Third World. There are some who feel that the new solidarity of the developing nations is a threat to their position and influence in global affairs, and because the United Nations has been the principal soil of this new fraternity, they look upon the world body as having weakened. This disenchantment on the part of some has not by any means amounted to a crisis of confidence in the future of the world organization, but the situation calls for a renewal of faith in the present capacity, the adaptability, and the future growth of the United Nations. It calls once more for the unqualified and unequivocal support of every nation, rich or poor, developed or developing, communist or capitalist.

It should be useful to remember that our United Nations was never conceived as the preserve of any single nation or groups of nations. We set up bravely precisely because we were such a plural world, and we wanted to make it safe for diversity. We expected no easy building of consensus among the nations and in the even we were not gifted with miracles.

But the record of the United Nations in its three decades of existence amply demonstrates to us how necessary, how vital, and how irreplaceable is this world organization. It is a record of accomplishment which appears the more remarkable when viewed against the difficult and desperate circumstances which surrounded the efforts and activities of the United Nations

For the United Nations has had in the past thirty years to establish its role during some of the most turbulent years of man's modern history. First there was the cold war which divided the world and the membership of the United Nations into conflicting ideological blocs and hostile military alliances. Second, there was the great upheaval caused by the collapse of Empire and the agonizing birth of the new nation-states which today constitute the majority of the world's independent countries and which have enlarged the membership of the United Nations from 46 to the present membership of 149. Finally, as the cold war receded and the plight of the new nations spawned the rebellion of the poor of the world, the membership of the United Nations, after dividing into communist and non-communist camps, often dividing into former colonialists and former colonials, began dividing into the rich and the poor nations, into the developed North and the developing South.

In the midst of these tensions, conflicts and divisions, the United Nations, despite all predictions of an early demise, has not only survived these severities but has established itself as the only visible framework within which the various nations of the world, while yet contending and while yet unreconciled on many issues and on many points, can begin to live in mutual tolerance and sometimes even to cooperate in joint endeavors.

The United Nations, in spite of all odds, has become the institutional expression of the human solidarity possible on this planet in our time — in all of its imperfections but also in all of its possibilities.

Its forum for debate, for expression of opinion, for the passage of resolutions has sometimes been merely a tower of Babel of so many tongues and so much confusion. But in supreme moments of crisis, this forum has sometimes served as a serviceable instrument for mobilizing the moral force of all of mankind to help stay the Gadarene rush to the abyss.

Its peaceful procedures of persuasion, of conciliation and of negotiations, of decision by compromise and voting, and of action by voluntary effort have sometimes been ineffectual to prevent conflict or to restore peace once it is broken. But over the years these peaceful procedures have accumulated their patient victories, large and small, which have established the international habit of appealing in the first instance to these procedures for the peaceful settlement of disputes.

Whenever there is any conflict that involves nations or even factions within nations, there is at the back of the minds of each and every protagonist a hope to appeal to the United Nations.

The specialized agencies and the facilities for international cooperations and assistance of the United Nations have nowhere and at no time ever had nearly all the resources that they required or deserved. But they have been able to promote the not inconsiderable changes in many parts of the world necessary for coping against hunger, disease, ignorance, and underdevelopment. More than this, they have made possible sustained international cooperation in areas of agreement even while the nations of the world remain divided on areas of disagreement.

I do not mean to suggest in the natural euphoria of this commemorative occasion that we should adopt a sense of complacency which is satisfied with what the United Nations has achieved or with what it has become. On the contrary, I am suggesting that a clear-eyed assessment of the United Nations today should provide us with a realistic spur for striving to enhance the feasible role of the United Nations in the construction of a true world community. In the history of our world, the notion of a world community has many times been pursued by the visionary, by the dreamer, as well as by the statesmen and the realist. But it was pursued in vain because the instruments were inadequate or inappropriate. It was pursued by ecumenical empires as the idealized expression of quite naked expansion through force of arms. This was as of old. Later it was pursued as the temporal expression of universalist religions or philosophies in a world stubbornly insisting on its cultural diversity.

The United Nations represents the third way to this elusive world community. It is an approach based on the twin recognition of the compelling claims of nationalism and of internationalism. It recognizes the nation-state as the high object of loyalty by the various peoples of the world and the focus of their organized political and economic life. At the same time it recognizes that the technology of war and communications, the economics of trade and interdependence, and the interventionism of political rivalries have made the world one and require it to become a community capable of common action and cooperation. And that the alternative is annihilation.

As a former Secretary-General of the United Nations once said, “The United Nations is an expression of our will to find a synthesis between the nation and the world. It is an attempt to provide us with a framework inside which it is possible to serve the world by serving our nation, and to serve our nation by serving the world. Whatever may be the past shortcomings of this experiment in world organization, it gives sense and direction to the effort of all men who are striving toward a better world.”

And as I look at the young faces before me today, it is my dream and hope that the United Nations will at last usher in the dream and hope of all mankind — a true world community.

Address of President Marcos at the third annual meeting of the ASEAN Council on Petroleum, October, 28, 1977

Regional Self-reliance on Energy

FIRST OF ALL, I came here notwithstanding the innumerable number of urgent problems with which the political leadership of our country is confronted. I postponed certain meetings of the Legislative Council which meets in private caucus this morning in order to lend the proper perspective to the energy problem to which ASCOPE and the distinguished representatives here present have devoted their time, talent, and energy. For this problem is the primary problem of most governments today.

It is therefore a great privilege for the Philippines to be able once again to play host to this third annual meeting of the ASEAN Council on Petroleum. This is a welcome opportunity for us to demonstrate the brotherhood that exists in the Association of Southeast Asian Nations.

You meet here in Manila at the close of yet another eventful year of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations — a year in which we have seen our peoples and our nations undertake many new initiatives and programs for regional cooperation, a year in which communal endeavors have expanded in scale and scope, a year in which our regional association has attained a new level of organization and a fresh mandate from the member governments and a year where finally ASEAN is accepted by the world as a worthy regional aggrupation of states.

I see this Council as one of the most tangible manifestations of the growth of our ASEAN community over the past two years, and I see its work to be as vital as ever to the attainment of regional goals.

Since it was first organized in 1975, following the historic agreements forged by the ASEAN heads of governments in Bali, the Council has evolved into one of ASEAN's, most important mechanisms for effective regional cooperation. Although not formally a committee within ASEAN, because of the specific technical and operational nature of its objectives, the Council has functioned in directions parallel to the thrust of the Association, and in specific service of its goals. It has embodied, in common with the committees of the ASEAN and the various regional entities that have emerged to supplement ASEAN activities, the spirit of ASEAN solidarity. This is the kind of solidarity and cooperation that we seek and I believe is emerging throughout the region today.

How deeply and how significantly this Council reflects the new developments in the ASEAN region may be seen in the progress that it has made during the past two years of operation.

First, it has succeeded in laying the foundation for cooperation on oil supplies among the member countries by developing a forum for the coordination of policies, plans and programs in the area, and for the formulation of the programs.

Second, it has identified the priority problems of the region in the matter of petroleum and supplies, and identified the areas that require immediate attention.

Third, it has forged an agreement among the member countries for the adoption of a Petroleum Emergency Sharing Scheme in circumstances of shortage and oversupply, as an occasion for the five member nations to assist one another.

And today, as the Council meets for its third annual meeting, it will pass upon the precise formula and working mechanism for effecting the Petroleum Emergency Sharing Scheme.

The fact that the ASEAN community can now consider in the brief span of two years the full implementation of the petroleum cooperation plan is suggestive on the whole of the speed with which the Council has acted on the needs of the community. It is also to my mind suggestive of the broader forms of cooperation that we can attain, if we will it, in the matter of energy.

Under the Emergency Sharing Scheme, the region has attained at last a program whereby the member countries of ASEAN can assist one another in providing for each country's petroleum needs in period of scarcity, and in according priority to the oil exports of any member state in times of oversupply.

As such it is a scheme that goes very far in relieving one of the crucial anxieties of some countries of the ASEAN region and, of course, for our country, the Philippines, in particular, which imports, most, if not all, of its petroleum at present. This is an agreement that is of far-reaching importance.

But great as this achievement is, it is only the beginning of a wider form of cooperation among our countries on the matter of petroleum supplies. I note with great interest the other items that have been identified by the Council as areas for priority action and implementation: the formulation of energy conservation policies and programs; the standardization of petroleum products specifications; cooperation in research and development facilities; possible utilization of waste energy; cooperation in training and educational facilities; cooperation in crude and product marketing; and other such matters vital to the efficient utilization of petroleum supplies.

By and large, the Council's activities during the past two years highlight for us a theme close to the hearts of the members of the ASEAN community: the idea of sharing — the sharing of experience, the sharing of acquired technology, the sharing of plans and programs, the sharing of scarce talents and human resources, and most vital of all, the sharing of common burdens.

Projected forward, the on-going work of this Council will no doubt correct many of the uncertainties that inhere within the region today, and develop availing remedies to various problems.

But it seems to me that if we are to truly answer the full magnitude of the energy problem confronting the region, and the world for that matter, action on the wider field of energy must be taken by us in common. And we must use the warming experience of collaboration we see within this Council to expand our efforts now to cover a wider format for cooperation in the energy field.

While we must place our emphasis today on the mechanics of sharing petroleum resources and for developing our capacities for oil exploration and effective utilization, we ought to match now this priority with the will to develop alternative sources of energy within the region.

For it is in this sphere, where action if fruitful will ensure ASEAN self-reliance in energy.

We believe this principle to be well-recognized by all the member countries of ASEAN, of both oil-producing members and the non-oil producing communities. Conceivably, all our countries ought to be able to tap petroleum deposits in the region, but even if this were to be realized, there will remain questions about their sufficiency, the sufficiency of oil supplies within the region to meet the energy needs of a growing region.

I note with interest the various conferences that have been held in Indonesia pointing to the fact that unless we increase oil production within the region, the region will be a deficit region in no time and will be unable to export any of its oil in a few years.

This, to me, is a call upon all the ASEAN members to now engage in a parallel effort to develop other energy resources.

The ASEAN region, as a whole, is blessed with a wide range of indigenous energy resources other than petroleum. Just to cite a few, there is extensive potential for geothermal, coal and other forms of energy development. Indonesia and Malaysia are significantly ahead of some of us in the harnessing and development of petroleum resources. In a tentative way the Philippines has had some lead time in the development of our geothermal resources.

There is much room for the sharing of experiences so as to profit from some of the learning that we have each had to do on our own in the development of these resources. We may thus be able to surmount the energy crisis even within the region of ASEAN alone, and formulate a comprehensive energy policy by learning from the shared problems of one another and thus provide new frontiers for cooperation once more among the member states.

Most of us in ASEAN have embarked on accelerated programs for energy resources development. The Philippines, our country, for instance, has initiated various geothermal projects since 1973, of which the first 55-mega-watt project is coming on-stream next year.

Of course, there will be the harnessing of about 330 megawatts by the end of 1979. We have eight big generators ready for delivery and set up. But we consider this tentative step on geothermal development as merely the beginning. While we may be ahead of other countries, all of us are in the same first step towards development of non-conventional sources of energy.

We are currently engaged in another cycle of oil exploration the first positive results of which are now beginning to tell.

The advent of our first commercial oil production was announced by Secretary of Energy Velasco, but which I will believe only when I see the oil come out of the ground. I have no reason, of course, to doubt the assessment made by the oil explorers especially since our oil exploration has been helped by Indonesia, one of our member countries in ASEAN.

I take this occasion to publicly acknowledge the indebtedness of the Philippines to Indonesia, under the leadership of President Suharto. Let us give our thanks to Indonesia.

It is not that we doubt the word of the foreign explorers, but we have sought the aid of Indonesian experts on oil exploration. And they have come and participated in the assessment of the drilling that is going on.

It is our hope that we will be able to establish another oil province here in the Philippines. But whatever is the final outcome of these explorations, the Philippines, like all the other ASEAN countries, still has to look for sources of energy other than oil. This is the reality of the situation. And we intend to do just that. I do not refer to the Philippines alone but to all of ASEAN.

All the ASEAN countries are presently engaged in the undertaking of a survey of their coal and uranium deposits. And just like the Philippines, everybody is looking into hydroelectric and geothermal capabilities. We cannot ignore the promise of eventually harnessing all non-conventional sources of energy. We are all aware of the potentiality of solar energy. Direct solar energy wind-energy conversion, and bio-conversion to fuels are the areas considered to have specific rural-based applications. They have been introduced in the area where I come from, where our people burn plenty of wood fuel, and where our people have started to cut even trees badly needed to hold back the waters from floods.

I have ordered that we now experiment with solar flue-curing barns. The same thing is true with respect to the fishing areas. It is our hope we will be able to put up soon some models of solar refrigeration. The effects of all of these efforts on non-electrified localities is certainly far-reaching, especially on the living conditions of our rural folk.

Our energy problems cohere in many ways around the issue of energy self-reliance, as I have said. Our programs radiate in similar directions.

The question therefore is whether we can extend these national energy development projects on a regional scale. And I hasten to add that the answer to me is in the positive. Certainly, we can. There is no doubt that petroleum will continue to be the region's primary source of energy. Yet, we cannot but recognize that the supply of this fossil fuel is certainly limited. We hear all of these warnings from all over the world. And looking to the long-term realities, it is sound that a parallel collaborative effort in the development of alternative resources should now become a major part of our concerns.

If I raise these thoughts before this Council today, it is because it is the one organization we have within the region today that has focused attention on our energy problems, and started us on the road of collaboration in the field. And it alone can take the measure of the region's capacity for energy self-reliance, and spearhead a region-wide effort to fulfill this aspiration.

It is meet that as the Council takes this week the crucial decisions embodying ASEAN cooperation on the sharing and effective utilization of petroleum supplies, we take stock also of the larger perspective of the energy problem, and see where our continued collaboration may be possibly directed.

Let me then in closing commend the initiative and the probity with which the Council has undertaken its work during the last two years.

To each and everyone of those participating, go the congratulations not only of your friend and the people of the Philippines but, I am sure, all the peoples of the region.

Let me now express once more the continued support and commitment of the people and the government of the Philippines to the work of the Council.

And May I express the prayer and the hope that your meeting in Manila will be both fruitful as well as pleasant.

Address of President Marcos at the opening of the special session of the Batasang Bayan, October 29, 1977

For a New Mandate

AFTER THE VARIOUS caucuses yesterday and this morning, we are gathered for this extraordinary session of this legislative council because of developments in the last several months which require the urgent action of this body.

You will recall that it was our agreement that, after the public hearings conducted by the committee on revision of laws pertaining to elections and related matters which I had announced should be called as soon as possible, the Batasang Bayan would meet in order to receive the report of this committee and to act on such a report.

The onrush of events in the last several months has convinced me that we must also study the question of elections or referendum, or the non-holding or postponement thereof, on the matter of the highest political leadership submitting itself to our people for a continuing mandate or a determination thereof.

There are also new and volatile developments in the South of our country. The Mindanao situation requires a continuing assessment. And since the political leadership may be called upon to make decisions swiftly and perhaps implement such decisions without the possibility of consultation with the people at large, it is necessary that the Batasang Bayan and the entire political leadership anticipate every possible eventuality and now prepare for them.

I shall have more to say on this matter in the latter part of this opening statement.

But let me say now that the situation in Mindanao calls for a new, a clear, and a simple expression of support of the people for the present political leadership.

This is necessary if we wish the government to continue to act with complete confidence in the face of a renewed crisis and if we wish to demonstrate to ourselves and to any possible adversaries in unmistakable terms the national solidarity with which we shall confront any new crisis.

But we are not concerned with any new crisis alone and we are not legislating for ourselves alone.

We are concerned with the long and distant future of our national policy. We are concerned with setting precedents which other generations of Filipinos still unborn may look to for guidance.

In the future, our people will look to our time for examples of conduct to chart their course through any dangerous currents of crisis. This would be especially true should the occasion in the future arise again for the proclamation of martial law by any other future leader of our country.

Every decision that I have made as President has been undertaken by me with a long soul-searching as well as a prayer and with a deliberate avoidance of anger and of spite. For no one is more aware of the awesome immensity of the power entrusted to a President, especially a President under martial law.

A President utilizing these powers to deliberately bring about such circumstances as to perpetuate himself in power indefinitely and utilizing such power in an evil-minded way, in a vengeful, petty, or mischievous manner, and given the absence of any recourse by our people to a periodic assessment of his administration through the ballot — such abusive or oppressive conduct of such a President or Prime Minister in the future could trigger the chaos, the bloodshed and the disunity of a civil war.

We must prepare for such an eventuality and establish the precedent which I wish to establish and place on record as being established now by us — that even under martial law the head of government or chief of state must ever be ready to submit himself to the judgment of our people.

It is for this reason that I have repeatedly stated that the political leadership of this country is ever ready to submit itself to the assessment and judgment of our people regularly and periodically.

In my own case, I was elected President in 1965, reelected in 1969, extended in my tenure by the referendum in July of 1973, and again in 1975, and, as some opine, by the plebiscite which amended our 1973 Constitution in October 1976.

Since it has always been my desire that we establish this precedent I deliberately brought this to the attention of our people by announcing that if it was the will and desire of our people, I was ready to submit myself to an election for President, although there were legal opinions which indicate that this was not constitutionally feasible. And then I indicated that this was one of the questions that would be brought before you; the Batasang Bayan would decide this matter for me and for our people.

When the Interim Batasang Pambansa was created by the amendments to the Constitution of October 1976 to replace the original interim National Assembly under the original 1973 transitory provisions of the Constitution, it was provided in this amendment, specifically Amendment No. 3 of October 1976, that the incumbent President would automatically become Prime Minister and would exercise the powers not only of the Prime Minister but also of the President under the 1935 and 1973 Constitutions.

It is very clear under this amendment that the incumbent President was directly voted upon by the people to assume the position of Prime Minister but with the powers of a President, and that such a vote took place even before the election of the members of the interim Batasang Pambansa. But at the same time there was to be no vote taken by the interim Batasang Pambansa members who, under ordinary circumstances, would have been left to choose and elect their own Prime Minister. Under this amendment the interim Batasang Pambansa would not elect the Prime Minister. Under this amendment the Prime Minister would not exercise merely legislative leadership, he would be the chief executive of the Republic of the Philippines.

There has been much discussion about the form of government that we should adopt. The terms “presidential” and “parliamentary” have been utilized. Indicated were the 1935 Constitution establishing a presidential form of government and the 1973 Constitution establishing a parliamentary government.

But by the amendments of 1976 our people created a marriage, a mixture of both presidential and parliamentary forms, for the parliamentary leader, the Prime Minister, would also be the President. The leader therefore would exercise executive powers and at the same time exercise legislative powers.

And thus, under the amendments to our Constitution, we have established a new form of government.

Because the amendments to the Constitution present a novel form of government and create a new office, that of Prime Minister and President in one person, the person of Ferdinand E. Marcos, I deem it wise and necessary that we inform the people accordingly.

This is why I provoked the debate, the national debate on the question of the mandate for the President.

The people should be informed that we are creating a new form of government with the organization of the interim Batasang Pambansa and the choice made in 1976 of a Prime Minister exercising not merely the powers of a Prime Minister but also the powers of a President under the 1935 and 1973 constitutions. This office may well last for several years, for the Constitution does not provide for the period or the tenure of office of such a Prime Minister with the powers of a President.

It is, therefore, incumbent upon all of us that in establishing the precedent that every leader of our country must submit himself to the judgment of our people periodically and regularly, that this procedure be institutionalized.

The debate going on leads to only one conclusion and that is: the President as well as the Batasang Bayan must decide whether we shall call an election or a referendum or both if that is possible.

I have announced that if there is a referendum or an election and the negative votes should predominate, I would immediately resign as President and return to my district and run as an ordinary member of the interim Batasang Pambansa.

I would immediately organize the interim Batasang Pambansa. Whatever be the result of any consultation with our people, it is also my intention that the interim Batasang Pambansa be immediately called by election of the members thereof as soon as possible.

I had originally planned that the elections for the interim Batasang Pambansa be called in the early part of 1977.

But the Mindanao situation and the negotiations in Tripoli as well as in Manila for the termination of the fighting in the South suspended all of this.

I have also announced that if the people in any referendum or any consultation should support the Presidency with a mandate, then the new office would be considered having been created and the interim Batasang Pambansa will be called after an election and I shall then follow the provisions of the amendments to the Constitution of October 1976.

Let us, therefore, now proceed to establish this precedent by the official act of the Batasang Bayan and the President. Let us always make the appeal for a mandate of the people available to anyone who would aspire to lead our country and our people, so that no one in the future may conveniently disregard or nullify the sovereign wishes of our people.

As I have said, I would have preferred an election as we ordinarily know it, but the legal experts advise me that is not constitutionally feasible. At the same time, there is a strong body of opinion to the effect that even a referendum is not necessary and is, in fact, derogatory to the mandate already granted under the plebiscite of October 1976 which amended our present Constitution.

I, therefore, would like to submit this matter to the Batasang Bayan and request that the Batasang Bayan decide on this today or tomorrow. Do we call an election or a referendum or are they both unnecessary or illegal? Do we consider the referendum of 1975 and the plebiscite of 1976 as sufficient mandates? And if we do, when do we submit the matter of the leadership of the incumbent President to the people for another consultation?

This is the subject which is now before the Batasang Bayan.

I ask that the proper committee, which in this particular case is the Committee on Revision of Laws, take jurisdiction of this matter and to call upon all the members to participate in this deliberation and decide the matter not later than tomorrow.

There are also many other questions that should be decided upon on the matter of elections, and they are: When do we hold the elections for the interim Batasang Pambansa? Will it be through a vote by region or by district? If so how many regions? How do we apportion the districts? Will there be block voting? Will there be proportional representation? What will be the qualifications of the candidates? How will they be nominated?

These are questions that are now pending before you.

At previous sessions of this body, it was my privilege to report to you on the steps that we had taken to restore peace in Mindanao and the success of some of these actions in bringing the hostilities to a halt by virtue of a ceasefire.

We implemented the ceasefire agreement which is one of the principal items covered by the Tripoli agreement.

Subsequent to the implementation of the ceasefire, the second round of talks between the government panel and the rebel representatives convened in Tripoli last February, if you will remember. The talks broke down. We need not go into the causes thereof.

Nevertheless, the pursuit of a settlement via negotiations was continued. To break the impasse in the talks, we asked the First Lady to proceed to Tripoli a second time. As a result of her mission, I was able to confer directly by phone with President Khaddafy, and we forthwith agreed on a formula for resolving the impasse. Agreement was reached on the holding of a referendum in the thirteen provinces proposed for inclusion in the autonomous regional government, on the basis of which referendum the form of government was going to be determined.

The referendum was held on April 17, and the results are well known to all of us. The voice of the electorate was overwhelmingly in favor of the position that the rebel leadership should not be permitted to take over the local government or the government of the autonomous regions. And that the region should be divided into the two actual autonomous regions.

We, therefore, proceeded to organize the provisional government even before the referendum of April 17 and the chairmanship of the provisional government was offered to the head of the rebels. The majority membership of the commission of the provisional government was also offered to the rebels. Up to this time, no answer has been received.

In the talks that followed in Manila between rebel representatives with the Libyan government as well as the Islam Conference represented as observers, the rebels wanted unconditional control of the provisional government for the proposed region. The talks became the occasion for the reiteration of rebel demands, such as for the autonomous government or government to be allowed to maintain its own army to be paid for and trained by the Armed Forces of the Philippines but without any supervisory control by the AFP or the Republic of the Philippines; and they wanted their own flag, their own seal, their own auditor, and their own separate government. The concessions that they sought amounted to a de facto secession, a secession with the consent of the Republic of the Philippines. We rejected the demands outright, and for this reason the Manila talks broke down.

In spite of the breakdown, however, both sides professed continued adherence to the ceasefire, and over and above that pushed through the various programs for the normalization of the situation in Mindanao and the economic, social and political development of the entire region. The ceasefire became the occasion for new projects in order to inject new life and stability in the ravaged areas.

We have pursued vigorously our policy of reconciliation. We have granted amnesty to the rebels. There is a comprehensive program for the rehabilitation not only of the region but of the persons living there.

Despite the uneasy truce in the South, there was comparative peace.

But today it is my sad and regrettable duty to report to this body and to our people that peace in the South has once more been disrupted, and in a manner that requires urgent and decisive action by the national leadership.

The treacherous massacre of government troops led by Brigadier General Teodulfo Bautista, the Division Commanding General of the First Infantry Division of the Armed Forces of the Philippines in Danag, Patikul last Oct. 10, has justifiably shocked the conscience of the nation, and it is only one instance among many violations of the ceasefire agreement by rebel groups in the south.

Since the implementation of the ceasefire agreement in January, a total of 636 violations of the ceasefire have been committed by various rebel groups. And during the last month, these violations have ripened to a new state of hostility.

All of you are aware, because the Armed Forces of the Philippines has released all available information on this violation of the ceasefire, of the incident for instance in Basilan where civilian workers were killed without provocation and subsequent to that, the killing by land mines of civilian workers; the extortion or attempt to extort and blackmail the civilians in the area; then the attack on a coast guard station, an internationally accepted and designated point that is protected or maintained by our Republic, where three of a small detachment of coast guard men were killed. The assault on Balut island, which with Saranggani island constitutes the southernmost portion of the Republic of the Philippines in the Celebes Sea, was relieved only by the participation of civilian home defense forces coming all the way after a six-hour boat trip from the mainland of Cotabato. At the same time, there have been attacks on our troops. The land mine incident, again, in Looc, the taking over of a government rubber experimental station in Maridagao, Cotabato, the attack on civilian fishermen in southern Looc, continued fighting in Basilan, then subsequent to this the threats against some cities including Zamboanga, and continued attacks on the outpost at Anungan, Kawit-Kawit, Tictapul on the Zamboanga peninsula.

Were these violations merely isolated incidents of renewed conflict between combatants in the area, they might perhaps be regarded as the result of an uneasy truce, a misunderstanding. But the fact is that the nature of these incidents, of these violations, reveal to us a deliberate pattern that cannot but be a challenge to the civil order, that all told has changed the complexion of the situation in the South.

We are preparing a white paper on this and they should be in the process of being distributed to the members of the Batasang Bayan, detailing the specific incidents. I would rather, however, direct the attention of this body to the salient features of these incidents and the manner they have transformed the situation in Mindanao.

First, we must note the upsurge of attacks on civilians and non-combatants by rebel groups in Basilan, Sulu, the Zamboanga peninsula, Balut Island, and the shorelines of Southern Cotabato.

Second, the increasing employment of treachery by the rebel bands against both government troops and villages.

Brigadier General Teodulfo Bautista and other high-ranking officers of the Armed Forces of the Philippines were enticed to a peace conference at the market place at Danag, Patikul, Sulu. After alighting from his jeep and shaking hands with the leader of this rebel band, he was shot from behind and all of the members of his party were also shot mostly from behind.

Third, the installation of new rebel camps in the area, set up under the cover of the ceasefire agreement.

Fourth, the increasing incidence of robbery, blackmail, extortion and arson committed by rebel bands on plantation owners and entire communities in the area.

The last case of arson was the burning of Tictapul on the Zamboanga Peninsula

Fifth, the predatory activities of liquidation squads that have for their targets local political leaders, civic leaders, as well as military officers.

The members of a liquidation group in Zamboanga City were arrested, and the evidence is conclusive.

Sixth the amassing of arms and ammunition by rebel bands as revealed by the discovery of an arms cache in Zamboanga City recently.

Not just once, but several times.

Seventh, the burning of entire settlements not only on the Zamboanga Peninsula but also the housing settlements that were so patiently built by our government for the displaced persons — the Muslims in the South.

The character of these activities increasingly indicate to us the deterioration of the entire rebellion into a campaign of terrorism, and of the so-called secessionist movement into terrorist groups and predatory bands. Civilians, government forces and entire communities are under harassment. There is no other word that can aptly describe these acts of plunder, of intimidation by these rebel bands, other than the word ‘ ‘terrorism.’ And it is naked terrorism that we must deal with in Mindanao.

This is further reinforced by evidence that we are not dealing with a coordinated campaign being undertaken under a single command, but with scattered bands over which the rebel leadership has apparently lost control. No less than the rebel representatives in the ceasefire panel have admitted that they are no longer in control of their commanders. And the man who claims to be the leader of the entire rebellion has himself admitted in an interview in the Middle East, that it will not be possible to put an end to the war and maintain the ceasefire. He has also refused to come to the Philippines to negotiate or to enter into conversations with the government of the Philippines.

What then is our best response to this new challenge?

Here, as in the past, it is our collective duty to apply the proper response demanded by the situation, in such manner that our actions, while designed to restore peace and civil order, do not foreclose the possibility of a full and amicable settlement. We must be resolute in our actions that this wave of terrorism is checked, and checked swiftly, but we must also take care that the venues of settlement are firmly kept open.

The steps which we have taken in Southwestern Mindanao and Sulu is in keeping with this need, and we have no cause to fear that the situation will get out of hand.

Military action on our part is essentially punitive and defensive. And I emphasize the two words: punitive, that is to punish those who are now branded as criminals, and defensive in that we must insure the safety of communities and the security of our military outposts at all times. Our actions Will not extend beyond what is demanded, but you can be sure that these terrorist bands will answer for their restraint and the utmost regard for the safety of non-combatants, but we shall be unrelenting in dealing with these terrorists.

In these actions, we shall have the great need as always of the support of the population in the affected areas that have borne the brunt of the acts of terrorism and banditry. And I am pleased to report to you that the Muslim leadership and the Muslim communities have fully expressed their support for our campaign against the new wave of terrorism, both in the form the government and in their determination to defend themselves against terrorist attacks.

I am certain that you have read in this morning's papers that the island of Pata was recovered from terrorist hads by civilian groups even before the arrival of the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

But I will stress before this body that as we take these actions against the terrorist, it will continue to be our policy to respect the cease fire agreement. We take the occasion to assure the nation that we will abide by that agreement and take action only against those who have violated the agreement. We make special mention of those rebel groups that have fully returned to the fold of the law and have respected the ceasefire. We extend to them again our full assurance that we will maintain the truce. And to those who helped in maintaining the peace and order of that region and of any territory of the Philippines goes the complete trust and confidence of the Republic of the Philippines and its political leadership.

And beyond respecting the ceasefire, the government is firm in its determination to obey the expressed will of the population of Southwestern Mindanao and Sulu areas regarding the creation of autonomous regional governments. In line with this, we will continue to organize the regional governments in the areas — two regional governments — a process that has been disrupted by the ceasefire violations. This political restructuring will prepare the ground for an unprecedented national effort to develop the entire Southern region of the country.

We believe that these steps, taken in response to the situation in Mindanao today, fully conform with the agreements and the covenants we have written and the pledges we have made to other countries, particularly the Islamic countries that have expressed concern over our Muslim brothers.

We take the occasion also to invite once again the assistance of these countries in bringing about a peaceful settlement of the Mindanao crisis, in the context of the territorial integrity and the sovereignty of the Republic of the Philippines.

Nothing that we do in response to the terrorism in the South or in defense of the civil and military groups in the area, will detract from our desire to attain a peaceful settlement. That has been our goal and our policy all throughout the conflict, and the present crisis is neither so overwhelming nor too formidable to sway us from this path.

In this regard, we invite once again the rebel representatives to resume the dialogue in search of a just, honorable and peaceful settlement.

The government cannot and will not condone the criminal activities of outlaws and terrorists. But in applying the full measure of our laws upon these groups, it will not lose sight of the larger tasks that confront us in Mindanao.

We are not talking only of peace in Mindanao but of progress. And to achieve both, we shall have to apply the full weight of a political leadership that enjoys the steadfast and genuine support of the whole nation. That leadership will have to take swift and immediate decisions, and it will not always be possible for it to consult with this body and with the nation before such decisions are made and implemented.

I ask of this body to provide guidance and counsel on the most judicious manner of determining the popular will.

I ask the entire nation to consider these matters that I have submitted to you with utmost gravity and care.

Let us together take heed of the crisis that we face, and together let us apply with dispatch the response that befits the situation today.

Now, I ask that we proceed with the matters that are pending in the agenda of the Batasang Bayan.

May God in His wisdom guide us in our deliberations.

Address of President Marcos at the Third Conference of the ASEAN Chambers of Commerce and Industry,
November 3, 1977

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Third Conference of the ASEAN Chambers of Commerce and Industry

[Delivered on November 3, 1977]

Towards a Community of Asean Businessmen

IT CERTAINLY IS an honor for me to be able to address this Third Conference of the ASEAN Chambers of Commerce and Industry. This organization stands high in the life of our ASEAN community, as the collective representation of the private sector in our region and as a manifest of its desire to serve the cause of regional cooperation and solidarity in our part of the world.

The honor therefore of hosting this conference, is great not only for the Philippine Chamber of Commerce, but also for the people and the government of the Philippines. And it is an added source of pride for us to learn that during the next two years, Manila shall be the seat of the ASEAN-CCI presidency.

And this—at a time when many new exciting developments are taking place throughout our region, when new opportunities for interaction are opening before our peoples and communities, and when the climate for economic enterprise is everywhere brightening in Southeast Asia.

I cannot let this opportunity pass without commending, on behalf of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and of the ASEAN heads of governments, the constructive work which this organization has exerted in bringing the private sector of our whole community to the service of the goals, the programs, the very vision of our ASEAN community.

Long before the affairs of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations is sued in new initiatives to accelerate the process of regionalism in our part of the world, this organization already commenced exploration of the ways in which the private sector can participate in the building of our ASEAN community. Before we formulated our ambitious ASEAN Programme of Action, the private sectors of our respective countries already sought to organize themselves into one regional body, and to study the ways and means whereby their collective action could serve and learn from the evolving life of the region.

I do not find it therefore in the least surprising that in the wave of ferment that has overtaken the region and ASEAN during the past two years, we should find this organization at the forefront of efforts to shape the future of our regional community.

And I am not surprised to find the business leaders of Southeast Asia today in the thickets of deliberations and discussions vital to the immediate and long-term prospects of our regional economy.

The strength of this commitment to ASEAN goals and purpose is well-reflected in the theme which you have chosen for your conference and council meetings' here in Manila. ASEAN-CCI in professing to respond to the ASEAN Summit of 1977 underscores a concern that is of equal import to the association: and that is the need for fullest participation of the private sector in the implementation and fulfillment of ASEAN programs and projects.

It is of course only logical that a region roughly homogeneous in the character of its economic life and institutions and seeking greater harmonization in economic activities, should look to the vigor and vision of private enterprise in the achievement of community.

But sentiment and theory are no substitute for the realization of harmony and cooperation. And we must judge the true beneficence of what we profess in common by the kind of structures we are able to build in our region now and in the years to come.

As in the case of the ASEAN governments, we must test the rapport and the understanding that you have built among the private sectors of the region in terms of concrete projects and programs that will have practical effect on regional economic cooperation and development.

And then, too, we must extend beyond the sphere of consultation the relationship that you have developed and are developing with the ASEAN machinery and the ASEAN governments. For while we have started a wide-ranging process in the private sector, the specific projects, the specific ways in which our communal hopes can fructify into action remain to be defined and unleashed.

This is not an expression of impatience on my part on the progress of economic cooperation in the region, but only a cautionary note useful as a way of reminding ourselves that the vital and the sticky part of our work is not behind, but before us.

For there is a real danger, particularly in this heady period of euphoria, and of optimism about ASEAN, that we may fail to consider this and fall prey together to the disease of failed expectations, that we may mistake shared ideals for the ramparts of community.

ASEAN did not remain for so long in incubation for nothing. For we took as our starting point the wide differences of perspectives and priorities of our respective countries, the problems that had dogged lofty plans for regional solidarity in the past; and if we persisted in our quest for community, it was because we realized it to be the common aspiration of our countries, though we immediately recognized it to be a difficult objective to fulfill.

I note, however, that the private sector, either on its own initiative but with the help of governments, has begun to cooperate in establishing closer communications between our countries. At the same time, it is also moving into communications and shipping. Shipping is one of the principal obstacles to more intensified trade within the regions. I refer to this only as examples of immediate and concrete projects that the private sector can move into outside of industrial complementation in which governments are very actively engaged.

But since we knew the course of regionalism to be a difficult one, we did not fall into the trap of forcing the process of cooperation or of establishing artificial structures that in a fortnight would collapse. And in time, we were well rewarded by the patient and even plodding work of laying the foundations for our ASEAN community.

This is why, almost nine years after its birth, ASEAN could forge the historic declaration and agreements in Bali, and why a year thereafter, in the second summit of ASEAN heads of governments, we could raise another step the ongoing work of the community.

The important point to remember is that we are working on a long-term vision of the future, and that at every step of the way a harmonization of viewpoints is an essential condition for success. Regardless of the kind of cooperation we have achieved, we must ever acknowledge that the relative strengths and weaknesses of our economies are discrete, and there will be points on which some member countries will readily agree to which other member countries will not be able to similarly respond.

But it bears pointing out, after acknowledging this formula, that a declared initiative, once adopted by the association, ought to be implemented and pursued resolutely. That certainly applies now to the ASEAN Programme of Action, particularly on economic matters.

Some of our problems of implementation have to do with the quality of our machinery, and it is certainly a critical part of the ASEAN agenda to improve and to recast where necessary the efficiency of our consultative and implementing apparatus.

Progress in the industrial complementation scheme is certainly a case in point. The status of projects that have been approved is widely different, and in the case of the Philippines, it is necessary to seek approval for a different project altogether.

In the area of trade liberalization, initial progress has been made, but it remains problematical how soon and to what extent the stimulation of intra-ASEAN trade can be pushed.

In the emergency sharing of vital resources, such as food and petroleum, a major breakthrough has been made through the agreement on an Emergency Sharing Scheme. And it remains only to establish now the precise ways in which the scheme can be implemented. Recently, it was our pleasure to host the annual meeting of the ASEAN Council on Petroleum, at which new decisions were made by the governing body.

I stress the improvement of the processes and apparatus of consultation and decision-making as a central key to the acceleration of regional economic cooperation. For it is at this level, where initiatives of the community sometimes fail to fructify. As our initiatives multiply, so must we widen the scope and extent of consultation among governments and sectors.

And I would say that it is at this level where the ASEAN Chambers of Commerce and Industry can most effectively show participation in ASEAN affairs.

I personally believe that the more effectively ASEAN consults with the private sectors of the region, the faster can we ride over the various problems that detain cooperation in certain areas, and the more speedily can we implement decisions by the governments.

Anxiety on the part of the private sector that it is not consulted enough on vital matters affecting the ASEAN program, and doubts on the part of the public sector about the readiness and real capacity of private enterprise to undertake regional endeavors can be considerably eased if a continuing process of consultation and counsel is maintained between the two sectors. And this is only possible if the private sectors are well organized in our respective countries and if they can speak with a single voice in ASEAN.

My hope, and I believe this is shared by all of you, is that eventually the ASEAN-CCI, as an organization of the national chambers, will be the principal consultative machinery for the private sector concerning regional endeavors, that its activities will be a sieve for the association to judge the climate of opinion in your sector, and that it will serve as a primal instrument for implementing ASEAN programs.

Certainly, I can promise you that here in the Philippines, the government will continue to consult with the private sector represented by, what I hope, will be the united Philippines Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

I am certain that your discussions here in Manila will have much to say that will not only be of value to your own regional organization, but to the work of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations.

In the work of the individual governments and of the ASEAN Committees and the Secretariat, let me say that I am certain that you have much to contribute to the development of economic, social, and political activity in the region.

I therefore encourage the participation of the private sector in all matters which may have any bearing whatsoever on economic matters, whether directly or indirectly.

And I hope that you will have a pleasant and fruitful conference.

And what I see today when I look across our country is a people and a nation, alive to the challenges of the times and confident about their prospects for the future.

I sense new life taking root among our rural masses, those for whom life until now has been a continuous struggle against adversity.

I sense it among the young, who not so long ago spilled into the streets to challenge our government and our institutions.

And it is finally this resource — vital, dynamic, and expectant — that we shall be privileged to harness in the attainment of our goals.

Address of President Marcos at the fifth anniversary celebration of the Philippine Council for Agriculture and Resources Research, November 10, 1977

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the fifth anniversary celebration of the Philippine Council for Agriculture and Resources Research

[Delivered on November 10, 1977]

For A Dynamic Research System

SINIKAP KONG LUMAHOK sa ika-limang anibersaryo ng Philip pine Council for Agriculture and Resources Research sa araw na ito upang ipagbigay-alam sa buong bansa na ang isa sa pinakamahalagang programa ng ating pamahalaang pambansa ay ang PCARR.

Alam naman ninyong tayo ay naghahabol tuwing Nobyembre at Disyembre, ang huling dalawang buwan ng taon. Sa taong ito ay napasama pa ang ligalig sa Mindanao, Basilan, Sulu, Tawi-Tawi, at Palawan. At napa sama ang "referendum." At gayundin ang kasalukuyang debate tungkol sa ibat't ibang bagay na bunga ng "referendum."

But anyway, I have come here. Kung maaari, pahintulutan ninyong humingi ako ng paumanhin sa inyong lahat sapagka't "hinila" ko kayong lahat dito.

I brought you here. Unfortunately, I am rather hard up for time these days. You will note that I came from other appointments, which I could not cancel, before I could come here. And then many other appointments have suddenly come up which I could not avoid.

Thus I am happy that you are here in Maharlika Hall where I usually meet the most important personages. Sa bulwagang ito natin tinatanggap ang matataas na pinuno ng ibang bansa — mga hari, mga emperador, mga embahador. Nguni't sapalagay ko ay lalong mahalaga ang mga dalubhasa sa "research at science" na naririto ngayon.

Tinatawagan ko ang mga mamamayang kilalanin ang utang na loob ng ating bansa sa inyong lahat at sa inyong mga dalubhasang katulong.

We recognize this indebtedness. This is the reason why when the invitation was extended to me, I immediately realized this was an occasion to call the attention of the nation to the efforts of our national government to coordinate and synchronize research in our country.

For a dynamic research system is an imperative for every nation seeking to develop and modernize. It is to the Philippine Council for Agriculture and Resources Research and the entire national community on research that our country must turn for the development of our research capabilities and programs.

Many people think of researchers as absent-minded professors working in a dusty laboratory just for the sheer curiosity of looking for the ultimate wisdom, without any connection whatsoever with our daily requirements. And of course, this ivory tower conception of research has been somehow dissolved by the now dramatic advances in agriculture. For once, the country is self-sufficient in rice. The term probably should be self-reliant, not self-sufficient, as I explained to some during the meetings in Los Baños. You know, Bong Tanco came to me and said: "We are now self-sufficient in rice." That was 1975. I am like the apostle, Thomas. I do not believe anything until I see it or feel it.

But anyway, I looked at the figures and I realized that we were indeed self-sufficient in rice because part of the rice that we had imported sometime ago had not yet been consumed. But now, we are producing. And that is a different thing. We are now producing more rice than we require. From 1972 to 1977 we have increased our production by about 42 percent. To you, statisticians, this is part of your discipline. But I merely wanted to point out to our people exactly what research means to a country. Research makes up for many deficiencies in resources — natural and even personal — in a small developing country like ours.

This is the reason why I think all of us should pause and consider the value of research in the country today. Unfortunately, the matter has not received too much attention. And now, I intend to call attention to this synchronization that is going on.

Noong sinabi kong pupunta ako sa PCARR, itinanong sa akin kung ano raw ba ang PCARR. Ito ba ang nagbibigay ng “dole-out?” You know, these acronyms are very confusing. But just the same, it indicates the low level of knowledgeability of our people on the meaning and importance of research. And yet, we are a people that must depend on research if we are to progress and modernize, for that matter, if we are to survive.

Anyway, the only problem in the modern world is that when you speak of research there is also the other aspect of the coin. You speak of research on the weapons of war. Kapag tungkol na sa mga sandatang ginagamit sa digmaan ay ibang bagay na iyan ho ay alam lahat ng tao. We must try and do away with this mental block on research on agriculture and other aspects of economic life.

Five years have passed since PCARR was created by Presidential decree that was meant to coordinate and consolidate research efforts in the fields of agriculture, fisheries, and forestry in our country. And I still vividly remember the various reasons which prompted me to create this Council.

It was the view of the Presidential Review Committee that the agricultural research policies and programs of the government were in grave need of re direction and planning. Despite the enormous amounts being annually spent on agricultural research, the level of research output was having no substantial or palpable impact on the agricultural economy: there was little planning and co ordination of research at the national level. And most revealing of all, the little that was being achieved by various research agencies and projects was not being effectively utilized in the critical sphere of agricultural development. Instead — perhaps I should quote the study itself— as the study sadly noted, most research efforts in the country appeared to be more earnestly directed “to satisfy the curiosity of individual researchers.”

Is that not an interesting aspect of the problem? Here you have dedicated individuals who, from sheer curiosity, are in search of wisdom and of nuggets of knowledge that could be of value to the nation at large. Yet, these are kept away from those who could utilize them in order to implement the noble objectives of modernization and advancement.

It would be an understatement for me to merely say that I was shocked by the results of that review by the Presidential Review Committee. For I knew only too well how much attention had been given by the government to agricultural research, and how many agencies and bureaus had been created by legislation to service research requirements. Again from shock, I was alarmed that in the midst of an intensive push in food production in 1972, the country did not have a substantial research base to rely upon for its sustained support.

To make a long story short, the Presidential study concluded with the re commendation that a national agricultural research program be formulated, and that a mechanism to streamline and coordinate agricultural research activities in the country be created.

It was under those circumstances that the Philippine Council for Agricultural and Resources Research was created — to serve as the central coordinating agency and spur the development of a dynamic national research system.

It takes, of course, more than half-a-decade to develop and erect such a dynamic national research system. Today, at this anniversary, we will say at once that we have not arrived at any magical formula to replace methodical construction and effort in this area. But if we have not produced miraculous remedies, we can at least claim now that we understand our problems better, that we are moving in the right direction, and that given time our research policies and programs will have their real impact on the national economy.

I notice with interest the outline of problems that were presented by Dr. Madamba here. He was sort of apologetic when he came to the last item as if he had caused all these deficiencies and these defects. But actually this was an alluvium of weaknesses and failures over the past several decades. And we are happy that now PCARR is doing something about it and succeeding. This is the important thing. We are doing something about it, and we are succeeding.

And the truth about it is that in the last five years our achievements in research are not at all insignificant. Whatever may be our reservations, the level of our research output has been very high. And it is justly regarded in Asia as one of the most advanced and progressive, particularly in the area of food production.

Looking back over its first five years, we can be gratified by the speed and dispatch with which the PCARR has moved to assist in accelerating our country's development. Three months after it was organized, for instance, it convened the First Agricultural System Research Congress in Los Baños. I am certain that some of you here were among the more than 500 research administrators, policy-makers, scientists, researchers, educators, and producers from both the public and private sectors who attended that convention.

The main output of the February 1973 Congress was the first national agricultural research program we have today, the first to be formulated in the history of our country. This has set into motion the research mechanism of our entire government. For what followed were regional congresses that tackled research programs that were relevant to their own particular regions. Convened with the cooperation of the National Economic Development Authority, these congresses were capped by the Second National Research Congress held in Los Baños about a year ago.

It pleases us considerably to see government agencies, like NEDA and PCARR, pooling their expertise and resources in mapping out development programs for the agricultural sector. Knowing fully well our scarce resources and the seemingly formidable constraints that impede our development thrusts, this move is indeed very essential, especially at this stage of our development. This is one approach for maximizing the utilization of our resources towards the achievement of meaningful results.

The NEDA-PCARR collaboration has chalked up another "first" in that experts from the research and planning sectors have, for the first time, joined hands in formulating a relevant and meaningful development plan reflecting the country's requirements at both the national and regional levels.

PCARR, I understand, has also been extending a most welcome assistance to the Budget Commission task force in agriculture, fisheries, and forestry. I take this as a healthy manifestation of the sincere efforts of members of the research community to inject relevance in government operations. Through such endeavor, they can share their own innovative ideas with the government in its budget restructuring scheme with the end in view of rationalizing support for research. Through such efforts, financial assistance for research has been identified. And this will make it easier for us to monitor research inputs as well as outputs.

The process of streamlining the total research effort has opened the eyes of government to the tendency of its budgeting and auditing procedures to become cumbersome for almost the entire spectrum of the research community. Researchers believe and, perhaps, justify that they should not unnecessarily be detained by such things as red tape. This is one persistent problem that the government is trying to do away with in order to facilitate the smoother operations of research institutions and thus render them more productive. Of course, this problem does not appear only in research. It appears in almost every other area — the question of red tape, bureaucracy. We are now engaged in a series of training programs. Yesterday, I met with 40 governors, mayors, treasurers, executives, and the like. And they are going through this local administration development program. We are teaching mayors and governors how to run their municipalities and provinces and do away with red tape. We are also putting the civil servants through a series of educational and training programs in order that they may do away with the old bureaucratic attitude towards paper work.

You know, I receive more than a million communications in my office every year. And every communication has to have a long-winded transmission letter. What does a transmission letter say? Nothing. Yet, it is a whole page and it takes one day to write it. Can you imagine all the waste? So I have done away with all these transmission letters. I have told some of the people who are engaged in transmitting communications to me: If I see nothing contained in a transmission letter to me and you put in it more than three words, you better look for another. This waste of time in the bureaucracy is appalling. I do not know where we got this inclination towards paper work. No wonder we spend so much on stationery, typewriter, typewriter ribbon. You would be surprised. One time, I checked on how much money we were spending on typewriter ribbons and pencils.

Well, you know I am an Ilocano at heart. It is not only because of the money spent but the time. Money, you can earn. But where are you going to get the time?

Anyway, this is a problem which affects the entire government. And I am very happy that the researchers — because they are personally affected — are beginning to work on this. In view of this, government policy makers are taking note of this problem. I, for one, am spending time on this particular aspect.

There are many department secretaries and high-ranking officers in government that are taken aback when I call them up by telephone and say: The decision on this particular matter is as follows. Take your pencil and paper and take it down. I will sign it tomorrow when you put it down in writing. And they take it down. They often complain that I have reduced them into clerical aides. But that is the fastest way to go about it.

I have here some kind of a decree. Let me see. There is a proposal that as part of the administrative reform to promote efficiency and productivity of scientific and technological research, there should be special provisions for the hiring of retired scientists and technical personnel, hiring them through contracts and exempting them from civil service rules especially on nepotism, sabbatical leave, honoraria, and travel insurance as well as other provisions. And then without benefit of public bidding. I have not read this very well. This even includes authority to purchase large cattle. Is this going to research? Yes, it does. Construction, repair of infrastructure.

I am going to sign this, subject to amendment. But I want to emphasize the fact that I am ready to give all possible incentives to all our researchers under the NSDB and PCARR combination.

Therefore, to remove you from the red tape of the civil service and the bureaucracy — this is the principal purpose — as well as to give you the leeway to move fast in the procurement of both equipment as well as raw materials needed for your research and the needed expertise, I hereby sign this decree in your presence.

Now also worth considering are the people that go into research — both from the public and private sectors. We must create the environment. It is all right to speak of giving the proper incentives and the like. After all, man does not work for dollars and cents and pesos and centavos. But the mere fact that their work is appreciated is often sufficient for many of the dedicated public servants.

In the past, many members of the research sector had opted to cling to their ivory tower and work independently of one another. There was too much duplication in research work arising from the absence of a coordinating mechanism.

Now, I know that the PCARR has started to work on this. The advantage of working within a research structure is very obvious, and I need not go into this. The government is not alone in providing resources for the strengthening of the country's research structure. We are tempted to conjecture that our initial success in setting into motion a viable national research system must have encouraged assistance agencies to help us in his endeavor.

Now, to cite an example. Early last year, the plan to enhance our country's agricultural research capability received a big push when the United States Agency for International Development granted a $5 million soft loan for the development of four of the 14 centers under the national network of agriculture and resources research centers in the country. While the loan may not be as substantial as the others we have received for other sectors of our economy, I took time out to personally sign the loan on behalf of our government. I found it vital in view of the novel and unique purpose for which it has been granted.

This loan — usually the corresponding counterpart from the government is at the very least on a 50-50 or 60-40 basis— is now being used to upgrade the La Granja Agricultural Research Center in Carlota City, Negros Occidental; the Bicol Agricultural Research Center in Pili, Camarines Sur; the Southern Mindanao Agricultural Research Center in Kabacan, Cotabato; and the Central Luzon Agricultural Research Center in Munoz, Nueva Ecija.

At present, we are negotiating another $ 10 million loan, with a counterpart fund from our government, to improve the research capabilities of seven research centers in the Cagayan Valley region, Mountain Province, Ilocos Norte, Los Baños, Palawan, Eastern Visayas, and Davao.

We have no doubt that the capabilities of these centers will soon be bolstered because considerable resources are now being poured into them. Furthermore, these centers can now count on the expertise of some of the best scientists and researchers in the country.

Again, I presume this is the time I can take advantage to say that so long as I am President, we will continue to build up research centers throughout the Philippines, and the national government will support it.

Talking about research centers, I probably should not miss this particular proposal that I have just received from both the PCARR and the NSDB. This refers to the research center on tobacco in my own province. To be frank with you, I did not know about this. I think this was their way of saying that this also affects you.

Anyway, there is a proposal to implement the originally approved program to establish a tobacco research center in a college that has been named after my late father. He graduated from that high school. He was actually inclined towards agriculture and research — and so was I — except that I got derailed somewhere along the way.

By this decree, we now hereby create a tobacco research center in the Mariano Marcos Memorial College of Science and Technology. And before you, I sign this decree.

Since this was also proposed by Dr. Magno, I presume that this means that he will support this project with the funds of the National Science Development Board.

There is one aspect that I wanted to talk to you about. And this is the fact that there is still a wide gap that exists between what is being chalked up by researchers in experimental and field-testing stations and the actual output of our farmers and producers. In the 60s, the high-yielding rice varieties initially developed by scientists of the International Rice Research Institute as well as the University of the Philippines at Los Baños, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and the Philippine Atomic Research Center promised just about the best that our farmers could hope by way of increasing their harvest. Yet after more than a decade and many research advances, the members of the scientific community are still at a loss to explain why a good percentage of our rice farms is not planted to the new varieties. Moreover, while researchers are producing as high as eight tons per hectare in experimental farms, farmers, planting the same strains can only produce a yield of a little more than one ton. The experimental results, eight tons: The actual results in the farm, one ton. And I have always asked the question: Why? I know that you are engaged in checking why this is so. And you point out to me many of the variables. You scientists always use this flexible term “variables”. There are many variables.

All right, we will patiently wait for the results of your researches. But the same is true with other farm products, like carabeef, root crops, vegetables, and fruits. Likewise, aquaculture and reforestation are major research areas that require priority attention. And doubly disconcerting is the fact that not much attention has been given by researchers to these commodities notwithstanding their potentials as food and cash crops.

You know that I came from Sabah. While working on this problem in the South, I decided I might just as well go to the very root of the problem. We talk about Sabah, North Borneo, the Muslim question. And so I decided to go to Sabah and find out what was happening there. What is its atmosphere? How are its people? Are they really antagonistic towards us? And perhaps I could talk to some of these leaders. And I did. But one thing I also found out: They claim that they produce the best cacao throughout the world. And you know what they told me? They even suggested that the best cacao peels could be found in the Philip pines. And yet we do not produce cacao. I was taken aback, I was shocked. They produce the best variety of cacao which they say is resistant to disease and pests better than the Ivory Coast coco, as they call it among the English. And so we took some of the seeds.

I am sure that the Bureau of Plant Industry is listening — is Director Panganiban here? — with a little concern. You know what they told me? They grow best in volcanic soil under the shade of coconut trees. And where are the coconut trees? In the Philippines. But is there any cacao? None. Why? Here again, we are met with some of your variables.

Whatever it is, I think that it is about time that we look into the differences between the results and experiments and the actual production in the field. You know, we always figure that what we produce in Los Baños, we will produce in Nueva Ecija, Bulacan, Pampanga, and Pangasinan. But you and I know that it is not so. Of course, the question of rice, that is a little extreme— one to eight. That is a little bit too much. But it is true in almost every crop, and we must look into this.

I present this to the PCARR. I know that you are already working on it, but I want you to know that I am watching you on this particular aspect. It is a very disturbing phenomenon. It is one of the things that I am looking at. Talking about cacao, I think you better take note of the fact that I want to know why you are not planting cacao under the coconut trees. Of course, you are going to tell me again that cacao cannot stand the strong winds and typhoons in Eastern Philippines. Well and good. How about Mindanao? How about Davao? There is no strong wind there. How about Western Leyte? How about Biliran? There is no strong wind there. Typhoons do not get there. How about Quezon, Batangas, Laguna? Batangas used to produce a lot of cacao and coffee. Then, what happened? Now, they are producing other crops. Let us look into this again.

But whatever it is, we must now bridge the gap. This to me is one of the most searching challenges before the research community and the government today. We should move into it as fast and with the same intensity as we have moved into other areas of research. We must always think in terms of the needs and problems of the farmers. And this we cannot overemphasize. For they carry the burden of producing the food needed by our rapidly increasing population.

We have, of course, always set up the small farmers as the measure of all our efforts. If we can help the small farmers, then we have succeeded. If we have helped only the big fellows, whether they are farmers or not, we have not succeeded. This is the measure of our success. And when I say we, I mean not only government, I mean you. I mean the PCARR and the researchers. For he is our target. He is the symbol of all our effort at diligence, discipline, and sacrifice. It is for him that we are doing all of this.

We launched the Masagana 99 in May 1973. This was followed by the Masaganang Maisan and the beef-carabeef program. And now a recently launched emphasis on fisheries production to complement our recent success in achieving self-sufficiency in rice.

Therefore, in the name of the small farmers and the marginal fishermen, the government must now pour more resources, more attention, more time to this problem.

I am certain that the PCARR on its fifth anniversary has this in mind.

I am happy to note that the small farmers are now represented in the planning of the country's research efforts through PCARR's commodity research teams as well as its Technical Program Planning and Review Board. Never before have farmers been given the opportunity to involve themselves in the planning of agricultural development programs.

We have to marry more and more the thrust of research projects to actualities of farming conditions. And the descent of the scientist from the ivory tower which we now see happening more and more is inevitable and, of course, necessary.

Only last month, at an international conference in Italy of scientists and research administrators from the developing countries, the historic Conference Declaration stated the challenge succinctly and I quote:

“While concepts and basic research material can be adopted by one country from another, the precise technology will have to be developed locally and tailored to the conditions of each area in such a way that the ecological strengths of an area are maximized and the ecological risks and handicaps are minimized.”

We cannot resolve the agricultural challenge by simply repairing to the achievements of scientists in other lands. We have to work within the mold of our conditions, and from there attain our deliverance. We must depend upon our indigenous talent.

That we accept this now is a credit to our research community. That we have the capacity to gather our efforts in one concerted push forward — this the PCARR has demonstrated.

Nothing could gratify us more than to learn that at the Bellagio Conference in Italy, our national agriculture and resources research system was singled out by this international conference for its proven viability. The verdict is an augury of what we can legitimately hope for from research efforts now and in the years to come.

But as we claim this achievement for the nation, let us make it our common resolve, the resolve of the PCARR and the research community, and we in government — never to let up in our efforts to improve, to strengthen, and to develop our national research programs.

Your efforts, I assure you once again, will be matched by the assistance and support required of the national leadership. May I say again, so long as I am President, you will have the complete support of the national government.

I have today received from the Philippine Council for Agriculture and Resources Research two proposals designed to accelerate our programs in this area. A proposed decree providing for incentives and administrative reform to promote productivity of scientific and technological research. A proposed decree granting authority and incentives to the PCARR in its generation of foreign funding for research.

At the same time, I close by providing for the completion of the PCARR membership. As of now, you have two vacancies in the PCARR. The vacancies are for the membership of the private sector. Upon the recommendation made by not only the NSDB and PCARR but also by the private sector and the research community, I hereby appoint the following as members of the private sector in the PCARR. I refer to Mr. Manuel Lim, Jr., and Mr. Francisco Y. Panolo. And this finishes the work that I have set for myself this morning.

I am sorry that the First Lady and I could not come to cut the ribbon for your new building. I understand it is a very impressive building. I will go there to have my picture taken later. I will go there and inspect the premises, possibly with the First Lady. Or, in all probability, it will be the other way around. The First Lady will go there without me. I am sure you will like that better.

In the meantime, may I direct Dr. Magno to do the honors of cutting the ribbon on my behalf so that you can use the building. And once again, I congratulate the PCARR. I look forward to the continuing advances of our country in research and in science, principally because of the efforts of the PCARR and the NSDB.

Address of President Marcos before the graduates of the first CSC-NDCP “Future Leaders Program”, November 18, 1977

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
Before the graduates of the first CSC-NDCP “Future Leaders Program”

[Delivered on November 18, 1977]

For A New soldiery

FIRST OF ALL, allow me to congratulate the graduates, ang mga nagtapos sa pag-aaral sa National Defense College of the Philippines. Tinanggap ko ang paanyayang dito ganapin ang seremonya ng graduation ng future leaders program upang bigyan-diin ang halaga ng palatuntunang ito.

I do not attend graduations anymore; even the National Defense College cannot get me to its graduation rites because I am rather busy these days. We are in the middle of many important things — the negotiations with the United States, ASEAN, the problems in the South, the problems with respect to the referendum, and the like. However, I think the future leaders program is just as important as any other problem that confronts the President.

Baka akalain ninyong pabalat-bunga lamang ito — some kind of consolation for all the work that you have done. At para sa mga lalaki ay tila bayad sa kanilang buhok na ginupit.

You know, one of the problems of any leader is the continuing programs already initiated as well as their pervasiveness. One must watch the soft portion of the population: these are the people who do not commit themselves to the programs. We are busy, let us say, bringing the new gospel of the New Society to the small people who may understand it, but those on whom we depend as the source of initiative and orientation — the implementors as well as the originators of new ideas for new doctrines and new programs — may themselves be the weak parts of the chain.

And this is why the civil service has often been observed as a drag on reform. The bureaucracy is seen by political and social reformers as the conservative sector of any society. It believes in the status quo, in routine of work. These, precisely, are the impressions about the civil service. The bureaucrat routinizes and institutionalizes functions so that reaction becomes automatic. Whenever there is any change, there is an awkward pause and dislocation in the forward movement.

Today, we are engaged in radical reforms. When I proclaimed the New Society, I said: “We will dismantle the apparatus of the rebellion and extirpate the causes of rebellion. To do this, the leadership cannot act alone; it must motivate the greater number of the people — and the most valuable group are the young, those who will carry the burden because they understand. For we do not expect that many of the radical reforms we have instituted in the New Society will be fully realized even in my lifetime. I know that many of these reforms will ultimately have to be assumed by those who follow in my footsteps and those of my generation. My generation, however, will have fulfilled its mission and accomplished its objectives — to lay the foundation of the New Society.”

We are not so naive nor so sanguine as to think that we can finish all the work that has to be done. It is necessary that the leaders must look to another group to carry on the fight, the group that will be the successor, that will carry the same burden and raise the standards of the New Society.

I say that you who constitute the vanguard of this group of new leaders are showing the way for those who will follow. I understand there were 3,000 who applied for this schooling and that could accommodate only 300 for the time being. So you can see the high standards that characterize this training.

Ikinatutuwa kong malamang kayo pala ay higit na masugid sa matatapang na kawal ng ating bansa. The graduates of the Philippine Military Academy are known for their military discipline. Now that you have outdone these PMA cadets, I probably should start thinking of commissioning you for a new type of armed forces.

Talagang pinahirapan nguni't nagtiis. Ang mahalaga nga naman ay may halaga. There is a saying that there is nothing valuable or priceless in this world that is not actually paid for, if not in pain and tears, then with something else. It could be your life. Perhaps it is a part of your valuable time, but you pay for it. And I am very glad that you have invested in the new leadership of our country with the time you have devoted to this kind of dedicated and intensive study.

I do not need to tell you that your presence in this palace of our people is symbolic. Incidentally, this is a leaky old palace. Huwag lamang umambon ay gumagamit na kami ng raincoat. But it is the symbol of power and authority in our country. That I have asked you to come here—this place that has seen the passage of the leaders of many countries and the transfer of sovereignty in our country — from one country to the other, from the Filipino to the American, from the American to the Japanese, from the Japanese back to the American, and from the American back to the Filipino, we hope for good — indicates the value which I place on this program. I need not stress in words the fact that this program fills up a hiatus in the development program of our country.

We are moving forward in our economic and social development programs. We have a five-year, 10-year, and 23-year economic and social development programs. These programs are being prepared on the economic and social fronts.

I am concerned that on the socio-political front, we do not have a publicized program — that of utilizing all the resources of our people for strengthening the political foundations of our country.

The programs that we think of are written on paper, and they are nothing without the minds, hearts, and hands of human beings. But human beings, by force of nature, must depend upon leadership. I need not quote to you such writers as Toynbee who said: “The great developments in civilization and the forward movement of mankind depend not so much upon the mass who often look up to the leaders who, in critical moments, must make up for the lack of orientation, dedication, energy, enthusiasm, and talent of many of the mass.” This is the role of the leader—to sacrifice and offer whatever God has endowed him in order that he shall utilize the great force of the mass. For a noble objective may be unseen by the great many but is quite clear to the leader: this is the reason why you must go through this training. And do not think that because you have received your diplomas, you are finished with your training. You have just started. You have just been accepted to the group of men who must now forever aspire and work. You can no longer rest. This is the stigma that is upon me. Since you have accepted the brand of leader, you are no longer lazy, you are no longer weak, you are no longer corrupt, you are no longer shallow. You have style, you have something to live up to. And having something to live up to, you must continue to exercise your energy, your talent, your dedication, and your will-power.

It is therefore presumed that all of these have been developed in your training. For as you move forward, these will be required of you. I am certain that you will live true to this challenge. And as a matter of recognition of these qualities, I hereby sign a Letter of Instructions which directs the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission and the heads of the departments and agencies concerned, that the upper 50 percent of the graduates of this program, who have been exemplary in both academic and non-academic pursuits, shall each be assigned to a career service officer, if from Manila, and to a regional director, if from a region. They will be rotated and given an opportunity to serve with the different regional directors to expose them to the different government programs.

If after six months of special assignment, it is determined by the career service officer, concurred in by the Civil Service Commission and the National Defense College of the Philippines, that the Buklod member has provided outstanding service, he shall be entitled to a merit increase in accordance with guidelines established for the purpose.

I hereby also order all heads of departments and heads of agencies to now immediately make provisions for the further development of the career of these young people. And this Utter of Instructions, which I sign in your presence, is effective immediately.

And so once again. I congratulate each and everyone of you, the new soldiery of the New Society.

Marcos, F. E. (1980). Presidential speeches (Vol. 8). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Message of President Marcos at luncheon in honor of Prince Alberto of Belgium, November 26, 1977

New Opportunities for Development

MRS. MARCOS AND I are happy to be able to represent the Republic of the Philippines in honoring our guest of honor His Royal Highness Prince Albert of Belgium, and the members of his delegation, as well as the other distinguished guests in this luncheon in which we are offering these glimpses of our culture.

And when one sees these impressions of overwhelming beauty, we who belong to, shall we say, the older generation dare not show indifference nor demonstrate weariness of age. It is easy to submit oneself to languor and daydream and believe that technology, industrialization and balance of payments are irrelevant to life. But it takes such hardy and reformed characters like me to bring one back to hard reality, and to remind our countrymen that ours is a small developing country with the problems of, according to some, security, — although I don't see any problems of security — but more of balance of payments, economic development and the utilization of limited resources — the development not only of the natural but also the human resources of a country.

Thus, we are happy to be able to welcome the delegation from Belgium headed by His Royal Highness who, incidentally, is not unknown to us, for he has been here five times — four times before this — and has represented His Majesty the King, head of state of Belgium, in many important conferences in which the Philippines has participated.

The Philippines, is most likely most of the members of the Third World, understands the need for foreign capital and foreign technology in order to attain its dreams of development; the need for agro-industrial balance — that very difficult tenuous balance which must be attained in order that a population that is fast-growing may be absorbed into productive enterprise, which agriculture alone cannot do.

And, like most other countries devoted to private enterprise, the Philippines seeks such foreign capital and such foreign expertise, and welcomes the members of the delegation of His Royal Highness as they bring to our country new openings and opportunities in development.

For far too long the Philippines has devoted most of its efforts at strengthening the old ties that existed between the United States of America and the Philippines, and more recently between the Philippines and Japan — the U.S. and Japan being the two principal partners of the Philippines. But at the instance of these great trading partners who find this monopoly of international trade unhealthy for the economy of any small country like the Philippines, we now seek to diversify economic growth.

And so, we look towards Europe, we look towards Africa and also the rest of Asia.

We are indeed happy to welcome this delegation.

I therefore request you to rise and join me to a toast.

In accordance with protocol, may I first raise our glasses to the continued health and success of His Royal Majesty the King of Belgium; next to the health and success of our guest of honor and the members of his delegation, and to the continued friendship and cooperation between Belgium and the Philippines.

Address of President Marcos at the 20th general assembly of the Veterans Federation of the Philippines, November 26, 1977

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 20th general assembly of the Veterans Federation of the Philippines

[Delivered on November 26, 1977]

A New Role for the Veteran

BINABATI KO KAYONG lahat sa ika-20 taon ng ating Federation. Sa araw na ito ay ating naaalala ang ating mga kapatid na nag-alay ng buhay noong huling Digmaang Pandaigdig.

We are gathered — a little older, a little stouter, a little more gray. Si Simeon ay pulos puti na ang buhok. Ang sabi niya sa akin ay hindi bale na, basta't may buhok pa. Baka may tinamaan dito nang banggitin kong "basta't may buhok." Huwag kayong magagalit at hindi ko naman tinu-tukoy itong si Frisco.

Nguni't ito 'y biro na mula pa noong kami ay nasa Kongreso. Ang wika nga ng mga "photographer" sa kanya: "takpan mo naman iyang helmet at nasisilaw ang kamera." Nguni't higit na malakas pa ang tuhod nitong si Frisco kaysa karamihan sa atin. Si Marking naman ay mukhang bata pa rin sa hitsura at kilos hanggang ngayon. Si General Fred Santos hanggang ngayon ay naggegerilya pa. Naaalaala ba ninyo ang nangyari noong panahon ng gerilya? Siya ang naglabas sa akin sa Maynila na nakasuot ng Constabulary uniform — a puppet Constabulary lieutenant. Kasama namin si Colonel Fidel Cruz, at umabot kami hanggang Malolos, kay Delfin Argao, Bulacan provincial commander. Ano na nga ba ang nangyari kay Delfin? Saan naroon si Delfin? Aba, ayan pala. Napakatagal ko nang hinahanap itong si Delfin. Napakahirap pala nitong hanapin. I have been looking for him. I had a Christmas gift for him about five years ago. Hindi ko pa naipaabot sa kanya ang pagtanaw ko ng utang na bob. Sukat ba namang itinago ako roon sa tabi ng kempetai sa Bulacan. Sino pa ba? Si Santiagong Bulag, si Benny Santiago ng Malolos also helped me. And then Ante Roque, former "Congressman." Naging "Congressman" pagkatapos ng digmaan. hinago niya ako won sa kisame. Mainit pala roon sa kisame.

I remember all of these today. Marami sa ating mga kasama noon ang naririto ngayon na nakakaalaala sa lahat ng ito. Naririto si General Ramos. Bata pa siya noong panahon ng ating paggegerilya. His father engineered my escape from Manila with General Santos. Alam ninyo, hindi ko pa nabibigyan ng "citation" ang mga taong ito. Now, come to think of it, I think we should give citations to all of them. Mahirap din naman iyong ilalabas mo si Ferdinand Marcos sapagka't ang lahat ng outpost ay may larawan niya.

General Espino, I think that is one thing we should do immediately. Sino pa ba ang tumulong? Si Emong Salvador. Colonel Fidel Cruz is there. And Colonel Tabije took me from Bulacan. Who was with him? Inigo Ventura was with him. Mayroon pang isa. There was another officer.

But I would like to give proper recognition to all those who risked their lives — Secretary Ramos, Emong Salvador, General Santos, Fidel Cruz, and Delfin Argao.

Alam ninyo, itinago nga ako sa hospital because I had black water fever. This is the kind of sickness na lumalabas ang dugo sa lahat ng butas ng iyong katawan. I do not know why I got it. But whatever it is, I had to get out of the hospital. I was practically dead. I was not capable of moving alone.

I remember all of these. I remember, too, our dreams. Ano ba ang sabi natin sa ating mga kasamang sundalo? We always told them that we would build a bright and brave new world after the war. Tayo ay magtatagumpay at pagkatapos ay magtatatag tayo ng bagong lipunan.

Alam ninyo, ang mga katagang “bagong lipunan” ay nagsimula noong panahon ng digmaan. It was something which was a catch phrase to us. It was our inspiration. We told everybody that it would be a better world after the war. We became independent. And becoming independent was something which we thought was going to be the miracle that would solve all our problems — both national and individual. But after the war, ang kinilalang gerilya ay ang mga taga-Escolta at hindi ang mga tunay na namundok.

Alam naman ninyo ang nangyari. Hindi na natin pagtatalunan ang mga bagay na iyan. Aba, nakita kong nakaestrelya ang dating mga hina-hunting natin. Kamuntik na naman tayong mamundok. Hindi nga ba namundok sina Luis Tame at ang ibang hindi nabigyan ng recognition? Kung minsan nga naman ay mahina ang mga nasa pamahalaan. Bakit hindi nila kinilala ang mga taong talagang lumaban? At iisa lamang ang kinilala — ang Banal Regiment na talagang lumaban. Kasama natin sa ibang labanan.

One time I was talking with Luis about all of these. You remember when we were fighting in the underground? We used to say: “Hayaan mo na ang mga iniisip mo para sa mga magsasaka. Ang Bagong Lipunan ay para sa lahat. Para sa mahihirap at mayayaman. Hindi naman lahat ng mayaman ay masama, may puso rin sila. Ang kailangan ay huwag nating hatiin ang ating mga mamamayan. We should not divide our people. The tendency is: A, kasalanan mo ito. Ikaw ang may gawa nito. Wala tayong magagawa. Lalo na ngayong bumabalik na naman tayo sa pulitika. Ano na naman ang naririnig natin? Pati ako ay pinagbibintangan na rin ng puro kalokohan. Kabalbalan daw lahat iyon.”

I speak of this because we should now think in terms of the problem we are confronted with. You know, the veteran is a natural leader in his community. Kagaya noong tayo ay pumasok sa pulitika, hindi na tayo kumampanya dahil sa beterano na tayo. Basta’t beterano ka, you are elected. Wala ng problema. Buhat noong 1946, 1947, at 1949 ay hindi na kinailangang ku mampanya sapagkat glamor boy pa tayo noon. Ngayon ay hindi na.

Si General Aguinaldo ay nakausap ko bago siya mamatay. I asked him about Bonifacio. Sinabi niyang binawi niya ang execution in Bonifacio. At hindi na raw niya kasalanan kung ang kanyang order ay hindi nakarating sa firing squad.

Anyway, what he said five years after the war was: “Alam mo, bata, hanggang ngayon ay tanyag pa kayo. Malaki ang pagkilala ng buong bansa sa inyo sapagka’t nagtagumpay kayo. Bumalik kayong taglay ang watawat ng ating bansa. Kaya’t hanggang ngayon ay kilala pa kayo. Ano kaya kung hindi kayo nanalo? Pagbibintangan pa kayo. Kahi’t na kayo ay nagtagumpay, asahan mong malilimutang lahat ang inyong paghihirap pagkatapos ng ilang taon.”

Totoo nga naman. Siya ay nanunood na lamang sa tabi, ngumt napupuna niya ang lahat ng mga nangyayari. Pagkatapos ng ilang taon, ang mga beterano ay pinagsisipa na lamang ng ating pamahalaan.

But the truth of the matter is that we have been fighting since World War II. You study our present situation. During World War II, we fought in Bataan and Corregidor. I was so disappointed when I read some of the histories of the battle in ordinary magazines and ordinary books. There was not a single mention about Filipino troops, whether in Bataan or in Corregidor or in the underground. And I immediately wrote to all the authors informing them about my disappointment.

We fought for four years. And after that, you remember we were so bitter against the Japanese. Ano ang nangyari? Sumama ang loob natin. We could not accept the Japanese in our society, in our country. But then we started fighting our own brothers who were just as brutal, as merciless, and as insensitive as the Japanese. So I noticed a dissipation of the hatred that we felt for the Japanese. I felt it within myself. Pati ako.

Those who were in the kempetai’s hands knew the treatment we received from the kempetai. For instance, I did not hate the Japanese as much as I did after they brutalized me by torture in Fort Santiago. Kaya’t ang nangyari ay pinaghahanap namin noon iyong lintik na sarhento doon sa Fort Santiago. Maski na sina Marking also wanted him. Nguni’t sinabi ko sa kanilang lahat na kung maaari ay hayaan na sa akin ang taong iyon sapagka’t ako naman ang sinaktan at hindi sila.

But the reason for that was the sadism that the Japanese showed us. At talagang galit tayo. But when we fought against the Huks, we found that our own brothers were the same. They were torturing us, raping our women, pillaging our own villages. Dahil doon ay namulat tayo sa katotohanan. We realized this is something that goes with war. And now we see the same things all over. So we had fought all the way from World War II. In 1950, they almost took Manila — these HMBs, you remember? And you captured Balgos, Lava, and all the others. But still the fight went on. There were ebbs and upflows of the strength of the Hukbalahaps.

Alam ninyo, ang akala ng ibang puti ay nakasalalay ang lakas ng underground on number. Itinanong sa akin: Ilan ba ang kalaban ninyo? Ang wika ko ay isa o dalawang libo. Aba, ang kakaunti lamang pala. Kung minsan ay hindi ko mapigilan ang sumagot: Kaya pala natalo kayo sa Vietnam ay dahil sa ganyan pala ang inyong pag-iisip. Akala ninyo ay nakukuha sa dami ng sundalo iyan. Guerilla warfares are not determined by the number of soldiers you commit. How many times did you and I attack a bigger detachment? It was an ambushade. Maski na tatatlo o aapat lamang kayo, kung may isang tagahawak ng communication at ammunition ay tapos naang inyong mga kalaban.

Anyway, we have been fighting all along. Our veterans convene yearly. Ang nahahalata ko sa atin, we come together no longer to brag about our achievements, but to nurse the wounds that our pride has suffered when the people do not seem to realize what we have done for the country.

Now, just the same, you and I keep on working in our own individual ways, kung ano ang maaari nating maitulong sa ating bansa. Even if sometimes we have been rejected by our own society. I know how you feel, especially the guerrilla leaders. Hindi ba noong gerilya lider ka ay isang ganoon ka lamang at patay ka na? You determined the power of life and death over people. Pagkatapos noon ay pinagsisipa at minamatamata na lamang tayo sa pagka't hindi naman tayo gumawa ng pera noong panahon ng gerilya. Ang sabi nga noong ibang kasama ko sa Ilokos: Makuha nga kaya iyong mga mapang itinago ng Hapon doon sa KP-90. Naalaala ko na naman iyon. Ah, narito si Simeon. Ang lahat ng presong Hapon ay sa kanya bumagsak. Mayroon silang sari-saring mapa. Diyan daw nakatago ang gold bar at kung anu-ano pa. Hindi naman nila alam that most of those were booby traps. At panay kalokohan lamang iyang mga mapa. Ang mga Hapon, just to be able to get out of prison, would make a map. Wala namang nakikita. Nguni't noong minsan ay may nakita. Ipinamigay namin doon sa mga sundalo. Ang sabi nga noong ibang sundalong may hawak na isang bagay: Gold bar po ito. Ang wika ko: Sige nga, hatiin ninyo upang mapatunayan natin kung gold bar iyan. Tingga pala. Itinapon. Pero naalaala kong iyon nga palang ibang gold bar ay may tingga sa labas. Ipinakuha ko uli at ipinahati ko. Nang mahati ay ginto nga ang gitna. Nagtakbuhan ang lahat upang hanapin ang mga tinggang itinapon nila.

But these were few and far between. Tuwing nagpo-poker sina Simeon ay brilyante ang kanilang petsas. Wala namang nakakaalam kung talagang tunay o hindi ang mga petsas na iyon.

But what I am saying is that nobody made that kind of money. And so we were treated in a cavalier manner. Some of our comrades joined the communist movement. You remember, in 1946, everybody was complaining against the Americans because we were cut off from veterans' benefits. And many of our veterans were threatening: Let us take over the government, let us take over the treasury. We burn all our medals, or return them to the Americans. Let us keep them out of here. You know, that is an old song.

But, anyway, because of that I went to the United States. Tinulungan na man tayo ng mga beteranong Amerikano. Sinu-sino ang tumulong sa atin? Si Mike Mansfield who was formerly majority floor leader of the Senate. But before that, he was a young congressman from Montana. And there were other groups who helped us. They immediately gave back our benefits. And the Bill of Rights was passed in our Congress. And that was all right. We returned to our normal stage.

We were then fighting the Huks and the HMBs. Now, we are fighting the Moro National Liberation Front. There is a question raised, and I suppose this will be the story for tomorrow's newspapers — they have asked me to lift martial law. Itong mga taong hindi napapalaban sa digmaan ay maiingay. Lift martial law! Madaling sabihin ito. There is a time for imposing martial law, there is a time for lifting it. I am a veteran and the President. I know the consequences of taking away the advantages of the military against the guerrilla fighters. I know because we were in the guerrilla movement. You remove that advantage and, perhaps, our Armed Forces and citizenry will suffer.

Martial law is the difference between continued harassment and depletion of personnel in our Armed Forces and, possibly, repeated injury and casualties.

Those people who are for the lifting of martial law do not know that the soldier fighting against a very elusive enemy prays to God for just a little advantage to be able to fight back. And that any negligence on his part or on the part of the policy planner will mean not only the doubling or tripling of casualties but possibly a tenfold increase in the number of casualties.

If I were to lift martial law, it would mean that the military would have to be ready to suffer 10 times the casualties they are suffering now. Now, being a veteran and knowing all the consequences of such an act, I say that we will come to the point when we will be able to lift martial law. But now is not the time to lift martial law.

The soldier is known for his physical courage. The soldier exposes his body to the danger he meets to be the shield of protection for his country and people. But there are times, too, when the soldier needs the help of the civilians. The civil leader must support the soldier who has nothing to hold on to except his belief and faith in the principles for which the civil leader has committed him to battle. So the soldier meets the bullets of the enemy, but the civil leader must stand firm and resolved against the criticisms of the well-meaning. He must back up the soldier.

This morning, in the mass held for the children's medical center, I said that moral courage is often more valuable than physical courage. The soldier has physical courage, but the civil leader must maintain moral courage and believe in what he stands for, the principles for which he is accountable. And the soldier will not be able to reach out and understand completely why he is fighting. But it is the civil leader who understands. And so long as the civil leader backs up the soldier, he will fight and die for his country, if necessary. But the soldier also asks that the civil leader be as resolved as he is. If the soldier is willing to die, then the civil leader should be able to stand a little criticism.

This is the division of labor now. And here is where you and I can help the men who are fighting for our country. But while they are risking their lives in facing the enemy, you and I can no longer lead patrols. We kid ourselves that we are still strong, that we can go out and fight, that we are good for another war. You and I know that we cannot. Isang araw lamang na hindi tayo kumain ay mamamatay na tayo. Hindi gaya noong araw na kahit na tatlong araw tayong hindi kumain at inom na lamang nang inom ng tubig. Hindi kagaya ng iba ryan na iba ang iniinom. Hindi na natin kaya. Bagama't malakas ang loob ay mahina naman ang tuhod. And the soldier has to go.

Now, that is the role of the soldier in uniform. We veterans must stay behind. We are now relegated to the role of the men who guard the rear of the soldier. We stand pat and face the crisis — those who would disrupt the policy, who would eliminate from the soldier his budget. You are spending too much for the soldier, they say. You stand pat and say: No, we have to give him the best arms. We have to give him the best equipment. And if he gets wounded, he must get the best medical attention. And if he dies, his family must be given the best support. And we maintain this so that the soldier can be backed up from behind. This is our role now.

And that is why, when anybody says we must now lift martial law, at least in places where there is no fighting, I say that we place this at issue without people. Those who are in favor of lifting martial law should vote "No" in the referendum. And those in favor of supporting the position taken by the political leadership of the country, those in favor of fighting to the limit and fighting to the death should vote "yes" in the referendum.

I repeat that the simple advantage we give to our military may be the difference between success and failure in the operation. Do not underestimate the enemy because he is supported by a foreign power.

Now, this is the big difference. If we were just fighting among ourselves, yes, hayaan mo na at hand-to-hand na lamang. Wala nang gagamitin pang armas. Magbunuan na lamang tayo. Subali't pumapasok sa labanan ang ibang bansa. That is why we cannot take any risk here. I will not allow the increase in the casualties of our Armed Forces by buckling down before criticism and lifting martial law prematurely.

Of course, I encourage everybody to say his piece. You have to accept the fact that we have to learn to be more tolerant. We should be tolerant. We should listen to everybody. But after the decision is made, we should proceed with it.

So they keep criticizing us veterans. All right, you criticize me, that is a part of my role. I am the buffer. Ang sabi nila: Tanggalin si Marcos. Well and good. Ano ang gagawin ninyo? Sino ang magpe-presidente sa inyo? Puro kayo parang batang maliliit. Iyan na lamang inyong mga ginagawa ay hindi ninyo maayos, ang bansa pa kaya ang maayos ninyo? Mahirap.

But inasmuch as this is a democratic country, my answer is: All right, all those in favor of removing Marcos, vote “No” in the referendum. Ito angisyu. I put it now as an issue in the referendum. You want Marcos out, good, campaign for his removal. I promise you that if the “No” answer in the referendum predominates, then you have removed Marcos as President. He becomes a mere delegate to the interim Batasang Pambansa.

Ang first issue ay ang martial law. They want to eliminate martial law. Okay, we submit it to our people sapagkat sila ang mapipinsala. Hindi iilan lamang ang mapipinsala kundi ang lahat ng ating mga mamamayan. Sila ang mahihirapan. Ang ating katungkulan ngayon is to see to it that the greatest number of our people will attain what we are dreaming for our country. Hindi iyong para sa iilan lamang. The second issue is remove Marcos as the incumbent President. Tama rin naman sila sapagka’t ito ang kanilang iniisip. Maalis lamang natin iyang si Marcos, naku, madali na. Tayo na ang may kapangyarihan. Iyon ang akala nila. Aba, higi tna maraming matatalinong bata riyon ngayon. Itong mga matatandang pulitiko ay hindi na natuto.

Anyway these are the issues. And I am very happy that these issues have come up. Ang sabi nga ng ating theme: “The VFP supports the government in national development.” Before we can work together in national development, we must continue the program of the political leadership in order to continue the national development. And this is the third issue: Should we continue with the programs instituted by the political leadership for national development?

I say this because marami silang sinasabi: Marcos has bungled the whole thing. Wala namang mga plano. Ang mga plano nila ay panay paninira, panlilinlang. All right, that is what they say. So we place it before the people. Ang mga tao ba ay malilinlang sa pamamagitan ng mga salita at talumpati? Hindi. Alam at nakikita nilang lahat ang ginagawa. Kung may magnanakaw, alisin natin ang mga magnanakaw. Kung may won man tayong hindi natutulungan, isama natin sa ating palatuntunan. But the third issue is: Do we approve of the national development programs of the political leadership? Maliwanag iyan, hindi iyong mga personal. Ang mga medyas ni Marcos ay pula at hindi itim. Ano bang kalokohan iyan? Sapagka’t llokano raw. Talaga namang llokano ako. Pati ba naman iyon ay babanggitin nila na walang kinalaman sa pagpapatakbo ng ating pamahalaan. At sari-sari ang sinasabi. Ang sabi pa nila: Iyang si Marcos ay masyadong maraming sinasabi, nguni’t noong pulitiko iyan at kasama natin ay marami ring ginawang puro kalokohan sa halalan. Diyan kami nagkahiwalay. Ito ang dahilan kung bakit ako umalis sa Partido Liberal. Katulad noong “Operation Sunshine.” Na imbestigahan diyan ang kung sinu-sinong opisyal ng ating Armed Forces. And some of the officers were investigated. What was this? Many of you know about this project where our Armed Forces were arming the groups of Commander Alibasbas and Commander Sumulong. Ako ay nagitla nang ipakita sa akin ang mga investigation report. Ang wika nila: Marami ka pang sinasabi. Hindi ba noon ay ikaw ang presidente ng Liberal Party? Presidente nga ako nguni’t wala akong kapangyarihang tumutol sa mga ginagawa nila. Naaalaala ba ninyo noong mag-away kami sa Senado at tinanggal akong presidente ng Senado? Dahil nga sa tinawag ko ang kanilang pansin sa mga gawaing hindi tama. Paano mo bibigyan ng sandata ang kalaban mo? Binibigyan mo ng sandata iyong dalawa, pagkatapos iyong ibang kawal mo ay lumalaban sa kanila. Aba, ito ay kalokohan na hindi maaring tanggapin. At saka many others. I was not going to talk about this, but to bring this to the level of a dignified democratic debate, let us debate the issues.

That is the way to do it because we are a domestic country. Kung dadalhin mo sa laban iyan, tatawagin ko na si General Espino at siya na ang bahala. Iyan ay hindi nakukuha sa lakas ng bisig sapagka’t ang pinag-uusapan natin ay ang tungkol sa pamahalaan.

Our theme comes with the issue of development program. I say that we have organized a systematic development program in all aspects of national life. Those aspects are economic, social, and political. In the political field we have created a new institution, the barangay, which is the political foundation of our democracy. We have given to our people, including the illiterate, the right to participate in government. We have given 15-year-olds the right to be consulted. We have given the people in the villages the right to choose the men who would advise in legislature through the Batasang Bayan. And we are moving towards the election of the members of the interim Batasang Pambansa. That is the political aspect.

In foreign policy, they talk about the Tripoli agreement. Ang sabi nila: Iyang si Marcos, tingnan mo, uto-uto. Inu-uto ng mga miyembro ng Islamic Conference. Tinawag niya ang Islamic Conference upang makialam sa ating suliranin sa Timog. Walang katotohanan iyan. You know very well what happened. We are here just fighting with the MNLF. All of a sudden, there was a resolution by the Islamic Conference condemning the Philippines for genocide, and calling upon the Islamic countries to help the MNLF. Peligroso iyan. Ang dapat ay gawin natin ang lahat upang matigil ang tulong. Whenever there is an indigenous rebel force within your country, your first attack should be to cut and sever the lines of the enemy to the foreign source of supplies and equipment.

That must always be remembered by any leader. Never mind about the internal rebel because you can handle him. But your first point of attack must be his foreign source of equipment and support. So long as this source stays and continues, you have a serious and critical opposition through violence. You are facing, more than anything else, exported war, the newly created mechanism for destabilization in a country.

That is why we maintain the ceasefire. Why do you think they are violating the ceasefire? First, they lost in the referendum. Second, if there is to be an election in that area, they would lose all the seats. May mananalo pa ba sa mga musmos na iyan? Walang mananalo. Ngayon pang hindi na sila nabibigyan ng tulong katulad noong araw. Kay at pinalalabas nilang hindi na maaaring masunod ang Tripoli agreement. But we want to continue with the ceasefire, although we are engaged in police action. Maaari ba nating pahintulutan ang mga outlaw na patayin na lamang ang ating mga opisyal, sundalo at sibilyan? We cannot allow that. We have to maintain the law.

I have explained this to you because these are matters which I know are of interest to you. And I would like you to convey this to our people. Sabihin ninyo sa ating mga mamamayan ang mga nangyayaring ito. The Tripoli agreement was a diplomatic victory for the Philippines. Nakuha nating lahat ang gusto natin. One, ceasefire. Two, referendum. Ang sabi nila ay wala raw usapan tungkol sa referendum. Maliwana na naipaloob ito sa mga kablegrama ni Colonel Khadaffy sa akin. We will reveal it in good time. He even recommended questions which we incorporated in the referendum. And there was a good referendum. Ang sabi nila ay wala raw kabuluhan sapagka't farcical ang referendum na iyan. Paano magiging farcical iyon samantalang ang lahat ng foreign diplomats ay naroon sa Mindanao? Nanood silang lahat.

Then, sa military bases natin ay alam naman ninyo ang ginagawa natin. Huwag nating habaan pa ang usapan. You know that we have a treaty which says that they will continue there until 1991. Aba, pababayaang ba nating magpatuloy nang walang palit ang kalagayan ng mga kinatawan ng ating pamahalaan sa bases na iyan? Mahirap namang sabihin nating: Umalis kayo riyan! Tingnan ninyo ang Guantanamo base sa Cuba. Wala na sigurong hihigit pa sa galit ni Fidel Castro sa mga Amerikano. Ngunit talaga namang ayaw umalis ng mga puti. Naroon pa rin. Many of us do not know that the Americans are still in the Guantanamo base in Cuba. Pinaalis na anglahat ng mga kalaban ni Castro, nguni't naroon pa rin ang Guantanamo base because it is covered by a treaty.

Iyan din ang mangyayari sa atin kapag hindi natin gagamitin ang utak natin. Kung puro daldal at salita lamang ang gagawin natin ay walang mangyayari.

Kaya't sa mga policy na iyan, we are moving slowly and prudently. Gagawin natin ang lahat so that they will recognize our sovereignty over the military bases. Otherwise, the military bases will continue as they are. Nakikita ninyo ang mga pang-aaping nangyayari sa ating mga mamamayan. Magpapatuloy iyon kapag hindi natin inayos iyan. Kaya't tayo ay nagdahan-dahan tungkol sa bagay na iyan. Is there any secret agreement between the United States and the Philippines? There is none. Ang lahat ay alam ninyo. Wala riyang secret deal. Ako ay hindi naniniwala sa secret deal. So, while we are all negotiating, we should never compromise our position by bragging about our position, as if we were Lord and master who can dictate to anybody. You and I have been too long in public service.

And so today, we present those three issues—the lifting of martial law, the Presidency, and the development program. The opposition says I have bungled the whole thing and I am not a good administrator. The programs and plans that we have prepared are no good. I place these issues squarely now before our people. Now that these issues are joined and the referendum campaign has started to roll, I call upon every Filipino who loves his country, especially our veterans, to support the administration and vote “Yes” in the coming referendum.

Bago ko makalimutan, there has always been some kind of a feeling that we have not done right for our disabled. They are still receiving up to now P100 a month. I hereby order that this amount be doubled immediately. At the very least, starting next year, if there are no appropriations now. And I congratulate those who have been working for these patients. We will start working on the problems of the widows as we move along. This is a promise to you. I will attend to this personally.

At the same time, we will now review the operations of all disabled veterans.

Mabuhay! Kaya nasabi kong masigla pa ang beterano kahit matanda na. I am very happy to see your enthusiasm. Anuman ang sabihin ng sinuman ay huwag nating pabayaang ang ating pinanindigan noong digmaan. Ang gusto ng MNLF ay ihiwalay sa Pilipinas ang iba nating pulo — like Mindanao, Palawan, Basilan, Sulu, Tawi-Tawi. They want to create a new state with Sabah. Anong kalokohan ito? Aba, papayag ka ba namang agawin na lamang ang mga ito? That is their purpose. And anyone who places any obstacle on our Armed Forces by all these unfounded criticisms of the policies of our government, which lead to the protection of the territorial of the Philippines, I question the motive.

I doubt the sincerity of any man who does this for his own personal satisfaction or aggrandizement. Nagyayabang ka ngunit ang sariling kapakanan mo lamang ang iyong iniisip. Maaari ba naman iyan?

My friends, I am glad that I was able to come here. I congratulate General Espino and the other officials for the management of the Veterans Federation of the Philippines. Noong araw, si Simeon Medalla ay magpapatuloy pa sanang president. Nguni't talagang kaibigan natin siya. Siya na rin ang nagsabing humanap tayo ng iba, nang mawala ang gulo sa Veterans Federation of the Philippines. I ask you to congratulate him for his self-sacrifice. And the other officers who are just as qualified — sina Marking, Frisco, Simeon, Alex. Narito ang manong natin. All of them are qualified. Nguni't nagkakagulo. Naaalaala ba ninyo noong panahon ng guerrilla? Hindi natin mapagbuklod-buklod ang mga guerrilla sapagka't lahat sila ay matatampang. Gayundin noong araw ang Veterans Federation of the Philippines. Ngayon ay nagkaisa na sa ilalim ng pamamatuagot ng ating Chief of Staff na walang iba kundi si General Espino. Kaya binabati ko siya. I congratulate all of you. And I assure you that so long as I am President, or in whatever capacity I am, I will always hold dear and treasure my memories as a veteran, and will help each and everyone of you in your individual problems as much as I can.

So, once again, I say that your comrade and friend will always be there to help and protect your rear and, if necessary, fight your battle.

Address of President Marcos at the 4th anniversary of the Armed Forces of the Philippines, December 21, 1977

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the 4th anniversary of the Armed Forces of the Philippines

[Delivered on December 21, 1977]

A Renewal of Faith and Loyalty

SA ARAW NA ito, ako ay lumahok sa ating seremonya upang batiin ang buong Sandatahang Lakas ng Pilipinas sa kanilang ika-42 na kaarawan.

Ang araw na ito ay hindi lamang kaarawan ng ating Sandatahang Lakas ng Pilipinas, kundi ito ay araw din ng muling panunumpa ng bawa't isa sa atin sa ating Republika, sa ating Saligang Batas, at sa ating mga mamamayan. Tayo ay muling manunumpa na ang lahat ng gawain ng Sandatahang Lakas ng Pilipinas ay batay sa ating Saligang Batas at ukol sa kapakanan ng lahat ng mamamayang Pilipino. Sa ganitong paraan ay masasabing ang Sandatahang Lakas na iyan ay lakas ng mamamayang Pilipino.

Today, we come to celebrate Armed Forces Day in the Philippines. This is the 42nd anniversary of the Armed Forces of the Philippines. We come not merely to celebrate but to pledge anew our faith and loyalty to the Constitution, to the Republic, and to the people of that Republic. For the Armed Forces of the Philippines are the armed forces of the people of the Republic of the Philippines.

Nothing could make this day more festive and meaningful than the fact that we observe this in the wake of the successful national referendum held throughout the country.

In one single exercise of the people's right of suffrage, which is the most important we have held since the proclamation of the national emergency five years ago, the nation has shown that it can conduct an orderly and free determination of the popular will and that it will not be deterred in the pursuit of stability, of normalcy, of progress.

The peaceful and orderly holding of the referendum is a joint triumph of the people and of the forces of law—of the people because they fully seized the opportunity to exercise their political rights, and of our peace-keeping forces because of their vigilance in ensuring the integrity of the vote in spite of and against efforts by some to disrupt it.

To you, therefore, I express my thanks today for the role which the Armed Forces played in the conduct of this national political exercise—the referendum.

Yet the meaning and significance of the vote transcends the question of how it was conducted. For its deeper, far-reaching implications are many.

Though the results of the polls are not yet completely tabulated, the verdict of the national electorate is already overwhelmingly clear. Our people have given the crisis government a new mandate to lead and govern. In our cities and countryside, they have voted for the continued pursuit of reforms under the programs of our new society.

Of equal importance, we may note the new maturity with which our people debated the issues and exercised their rights.

And we know where this mandate will direct the cares and affairs of the nation henceforth.

For in endorsing the programs of the New Society and the leadership of our crisis government, our people have in fact decided not that martial law must be prolonged indefinitely, but that our pursuit of normalcy must unfailingly continue but within the framework of the reforms we have begun and must conclude.

We have not set back the full realization of our democratic order; we have rather established a solid framework upon which to build it.

And so I say, we have reason to be optimistic and confident that we can now move resolutely towards the next step of our program of normalization.

That step is the crucial election of the members of the interim Batasang Pambansa and of the officials of the local governments throughout the country.

Verily, the popular mandate is also a challenge to us to determine how the matter might be submitted to the people and to set up the mechanism for the conduct of such a crucial vote.

As the issue stands today, there is a fair division of opinion as to how or when these elections should be held. There are some who have proposed that the elections for both the Batasang Pambansa and the local governments be held in June or earlier, while there are others who propose the holding of the elections in the latter part of 1978. There are those who have proposed separate elections for the Batasang Pambansa and the local governments, while there are others who are of the opinion that the elections should be simultaneous for we cannot hold two elections in one year.

To resolve this, the Batasang Bayan will meet before the end of January, this coming year.

In line with the coming session of the Batasang Bayan or the Legislative Advisory Council, the chairman of the Committee on the Revision of Laws has been instructed to prepare his report on the results of the hearings on the matter conducted throughout the country. On the basis of the findings and recommendations, we are confident that the Batasang Bayan will decide upon the course of action that will be the most prudent for the nation to follow.

But there should be no question now that we shall hold national elections in 1978. In the meantime no clear decision has yet been reached and no precise guidelines have been formulated for such an election. It is important, therefore, that we do not allow the forthcoming elections to get ahead of us. I specifically warn against all premature campaigning by prospective candidates and other forms of electioneering. I understand that even during the voting in the last referendum, some of the prospective candidates were already handing out name cards and that they had their posters plastered at the voting places. I warn that this is one of the offenses punishable under the Revised Election Code for which the prospective candidates may be disqualified motu proprio, or on their own initiative by the Commission on Elections. I also warn that pictures have been taken of these activities and that such premature campaigning may be constitutionally illegal.

Likewise, campaign spending will be governed by election regulations, and we will either eliminate or limit such spending. Overspending which did such havoc on the electoral process in the past will be severely punished. Nominations will be governed by the election code, and no one can nominate himself now and proceed to campaign by way of circumventing the regulations.

The point is that we must take the greatest care in conducting the coming elections of members to the national legislature and the local governments. We must take care that we do not fall prey once again to the electoral practices of the old society, and that the organs for community power, the political reforms we have been at such pains to sow, will not be summarily erased by lapses into the excesses of the past.

If I interest the mandate of our people correctly, and if we appreciate fully the needs of the nation today, the normalization of our political life must come as an organic development of the wave of reforms of our society. It must never come at the expense of what has taken us five years to achieve.

This leads us to the important question of the lifting of martial law. In the discussions preceding the recent referendum, I told the nation that I would lift martial law in certain parts of the country that are not facing problems of insurgency and peacekeeping, should our people return a negative vote. Conversely, I said that I would view an affirmative vote as a verdict in favor of the gradual phase-out of martial rule, as conditions allow and require.

The affirmative mandate of the referendum irrevocably commits us to this gradual course, and it is in this context that we must now discuss the process of normalization, including the lifting of martial law.

Clearly, it will not be possible, from my point of view, to lift martial law unless there is first of all a legislative body in existence. And it is in this light that the creation of the Batasang Pambansa has become a priority agenda before the nation.

It is of course contended that Amendment No. 6 to the Constitution in the plebiscite of October 1976, as approved, suffices to ensure presidential competence to deal with any crisis situation, and therefore to allow for the early lifting of martial law. Let us look at that specific amendment.

Amendment No. 6 reads:

“Whenever in the judgment of the President or the Prime Minister, there exists a grave emergency, or a threat or imminence thereof, or whenever the interim Batasang Pambansa or the regular National Assembly fails or is unable to act adequately on any matter, for any reason that in his judgment requires immediate action, he may in order to meet the exigency, issue the necessary decrees, orders, or letters of instructions which shall form part of the laws of the land.”

From my point of view, the most that can be said of this amendment is that the power of the President to issue decrees and laws, when there is no legislature, arises out of martial law power. And that the moment martial law is lifted, the power of the President to promulgate decrees, letters of instructions, and orders with the effect of law is in doubt.

The amendment authorizes the President to issue the necessary decrees, letters of instructions, and orders “when there exists a grave emergency, or a threat or imminence thereof, or whenever the interim Batasang Pambansa or the regular National Assembly fails, or is unable to act adequately on any matter, for any reason that in his judgment requires immediate action.”

There are some who say that there is no doubt about this power of the President. Considering the situation, I say that power should not be resolved in favor of its existence. And that it is necessary that we prudently elect a Batasang Pambansa before martial law is lifted.

Moreover, we have to bear clearly in mind the implications of the lifting of martial law in regard to the continuing conflict in the South. The seriousness of the situation in Southwestern Mindanao and Sulu, which gravely impinges upon the integrity of the Republic, makes any action to prematurely lift martial law not only imprudent but foolhardy. It is doubtful whether an early excursion into full political normalization will be spared the challenge of immediate and pervasive crisis and anxiety.

Government today, with the full backing of our Armed Forces, is taking the necessary steps to stabilize the situation in Mindanao and Sulu. It has taken steps in addition to those which are already known to the public, but for reasons of their confidentiality or delicacy these steps cannot yet be divulged. But we are convinced that these measures will be productive of tranquility in the area, and we have reason to hope that peace may be fully restored to the area by next year.

It adds momentum to this peace initiative that the recent national referendum has handed a new mandate to the crisis government. For as I took care to explain to the people in the days preceding the vote, the times require the most resolute leadership in government, leadership that may not have the time to consult with the people before decisive action is taken.

In essence, therefore, we may also see in the new mandate the ratification of the government. It is a commendation of the vigilance and care with which our Armed Forces have ensured the stability and security of the Republic. And it is a mandate for the nation to hold fast to those policies of vigilance, of prudence, and of care.

Though in many ways, the national security situation has considerably improved during the last five years, and our policies have had considerable success in meeting the many threats to national security, there are new developments that require reassessment of the overall national security situation. In the South, the secessionist rebellion has rapidly turned into a wave of terrorism. And there are evidences, uncovered by military intelligence, of efforts by the NPA and the Mindanao terrorists to tie up and form a common front.

We have substantially decreased this threat and this possibility, but new evidence indicates that we are not yet ready today to say that aid and help coming from outside the country for the subversives and the rebels has stopped.

I am not ready to say, I repeat, that such help has stopped.

For this reason, we have to lay great emphasis on our machinery for home defense and peace-keeping on a self-reliance basis. And one of its major requirements will be the strengthening of local communities to resist insurgency and terrorism.

Action in this regard are encouraging, and they are in our view adequate to the situation today. For I have announced publicly the organization of the Kawal Barangay, which is already playing a critical role in checking the link-up efforts of the insurgent-terrorist forces, and in strengthening local communities.

On the part of the Armed Forces itself, there has been substantial development of defense and peacekeeping capabilities, such that our long-term program of self-reliance need not be an inaccessible dream.

Today, I would like to announce that starting January 1978, we begin a new five-year development program for the Armed Forces of the Philippines, and this is mainly designed to accelerate the attainment of national self-reliance on matters of peace and security.

The main thrust of this development program is twofold: first, the unrelenting pursuit of counter-insurgency efforts alongside the process of political normalization; and second, the consideration of the continuing internal threat and uncertainties in the context of international situation, especially those affecting Southeast Asia.

It is, therefore, our mid-range and long-range objective to develop the Armed Forces so as to make it truly effective in its task of national defense, an unfailing force to meet internal threats and a credible deterrent to external aggression. And to attain this objective, we must develop our Armed Forces on the basis of the resources available to us to acquire, maintain and operate a modernized military organization.

The plans have been drawn up and the details are now being worked out. This includes our capabilities not only on land but also in the air and in the sea, at least to make any aggression upon our shores so unprofitable that a prospective aggressor will think twice before launching an attack.

In the light of this development plan, the negotiations with the United States of our three military agreements are considered critical. And I am pleased to report to you that the continuing negotiations are moving along very well. As has been very well and aptly said, a new page has been turned in the relations between the Philippines and the United States. And this is reflected in the new atmosphere of the negotiations now being conducted.

There is some objection from certain quarters about the position of the present administration with respect to the continuance of military bases in our country. I take this opportunity to restate the reasons for that position.

The military bases in the Philippines, used by either the Armed Forces of the Philippines or the United States, form part of a vital peacekeeping apparatus in the region of Southeast Asia and throughout the world. We do not allow their continued existence for reasons other than the needs for security and peace and more especially for the region and the world. We are a sovereign and independent country, and we believe that the continued maintenance of the bases is our signal contribution to the peacekeeping effort. It is the price which every nation must be prepared to pay, but if we must pay it, it must be on the basis of self-respect and sovereignty which are basic in the negotiations now being held.

As we look at the situation in Asia and in the world, we see the United Nations and other global peace-keeping agencies as yet incapable of maintaining international order, least of all in our part of the world which so recently was the scene of conflict. In view of this, the equilibrium of power is critical to the peace and security of the region. In line with such balance of power, the American presence in Southeast Asia must retain sufficient sway to check any possible dominance by any single power in Southeast Asia or, for that matter, in Asia.

This national perception of regional realities is the same policy, I repeat, as that adopted and maintained by the Association of Southeast Asian Nations—that no single power should dominate and that the balance of forces be maintained in equilibrium.

Our decision, therefore, to maintain the bases under our sovereignty must be interpreted in this light, and not as a threat to other countries. We will co-operate with all the powers without losing our friends. We wish to be friendly with all nations and powers. And on matters of security as well as the promotion of the progress of all peoples, we join all countries and all states.

I feel all the more strongly after the referendum that our decision to normalize our relations with the Socialist countries of the world and to strengthen our ties with the United States on a new basis of national respect and mutual benefit is overwhelmingly endorsed by our people, just as much as they have endorsed our program for domestic normalization.

Our Armed Forces today may indeed regard themselves as a fitting reflection of the strivings of our people today, and you need never doubt that you wage a lonely campaign for the peace and security of our country.

I know there has been some criticism of our military from certain quarters abroad. There are those among our friends, not only in the United States but everywhere abroad, who plead for a free and just hearing for certain individuals. But we also submit that our country and our government deserve a fair and just hearing before we are summarily singled out for criticism.

But if the record is fully looked into, there can be no source for shame in what our crisis government has done or accomplished, nothing to detract from the nobility of the devoted service of our Armed Forces to the people and to their Republic. At the same time, we also believe in the sense of justice and fairness of the American people, as well as their media and their decision-makers.

The facts will survive the distortions and misrepresentations of events and developments in our country as purveyed by what at present may be a deficient means of communication.

And though such distortions may sometimes appear too gross to tolerate, it is still best that we keep our peace and retain our patience. The record stands, and in time the truth and the sense of justice of the international community will vindicate us.

These are the plans for the Armed Forces of the Philippines. And as I thank the people, including the members of the civil government for the conduct of the last referendum, I also say that we must accept this mandate with humility. For the task of reforms for the New Society has just begun. We have barely scratched the surface of the mountain of problems we are confronted with. We face new threats and new dangers as the world slowly slips into what may be a new crisis. The programs have become more urgent.

It is necessary that as we go into the specifics and details of reforms, we do not forget that our principal goal is to establish new economic, social and political institutions that will meet the requirements of our people, that will fit into their character and be molded into their tradition.

While we may be waylaid by day-to-day problems, we must not forget this long-term objective.

And so, today, I announce that it is my intention, in accordance with the mandate of our people, to once again engage in a clean-up of our government. This is a periodic exercise and no one need be surprised about it. There will be those who might say that this clean-up may be aimed at those who had voted “no” in the referendum.

Let it be clear, now and for always, that there will be fairness; there will be justice.

I hereby order immediately the organization of the Tanod Bayan and the Sandigang Bayan. A Tanod Bayan or the ombudsman shall have the power to look into every anomaly, either on his own initiative or on the complaint of anyone. The Sandigang Bayan is a court that will try all cases of dishonesty and corruption in officialdom.

It is necessary, therefore, that we start this work.

I also order the review of all contracts entered into by the government, whether pending or already entered into by the government to determine the existence of any anomaly. And any contract found deficient with respect to the standards of morality that we have set for the New Society will be cancelled. I exercise these powers under the provision of the Constitution, which allows the President to review existing contracts and rights that have been granted over the exploitation of our country’s natural resources.

Today, I stand once again before you, the Armed Forces personnel, both in uniform and in civilian clothes, to salute you for and in behalf of our people. For you have indeed become the Armed Forces of the people—a true people’s army for the Republic of the Philippines.

Once again, I acknowledge that without you, the New Society will not succeed. The Armed Forces of the Philippines, through their officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees, have set up a higher standard of conduct of loyalty to our Republic. They have set an example which must be followed by the entire citizenry.

Let the Armed Forces of the Philippines continue with this noble example for the entire nation.

Today, I, as your Commander-in-Chief, stand before you and salute you. Carry on!

Address of President Marcos at the opening of the 18th Session of the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council, March 8, 1978

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the opening of the 18th Session of the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council

[Delivered on March 8, 1978]

Regional Cooperation for Fisheries Development

IN BEHALF OF the people and government of the Philippines, I would like to extend to all of you our warm felicitations and welcome, and our most profound appreciation for the honor you have bestowed upon us in meeting here in Manila for this 18th Session of the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council.

It is of special meaning and significance to us that on the eve of its 30th founding anniversary, the Council should meet here in our country where the "Agreement for the Establishment of the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council" was first drawn up under the auspices of the Food and Agriculture Organization.

When we reflect upon the years that have passed since that historic meeting in Baguio City in January 1948, and the many achievements that have marked the operations of this Council since its inception, there is much that makes our countries justifiably proud, and there is much that should sustain our belief and our commitment to the programs and the work of the Council.

Initially conceived as a regional undertaking to assist member countries in the development and rational utilization of living aquatic resources in the Indo-Pacific area, the Council has served over the years as a major catalyst of development in our part of the world, linking together our countries in a program of exchange and cooperation that has vastly mobilized and expanded our capacities for food production. With every passing year, this sphere of our concerns has vastly gained in importance and meaning, and today, as we move to meet the gathering global challenge of food crisis, the Council may be fittingly considered as perhaps our most effective vehicle today for ensuring that our region will be equal to the challenge and the crisis of our time.

We began as eight countries in 1948. Today we are sixteen. And those who have since joined us in this Council are among our most committed partners today. And we have been able to expand the scale and scope of our programs to an extent unprecedented and unimagined at the start of this undertaking.

These facts are of great moment to this meeting of the Council, because we know that while some major gains have been made over the past 30 years, we stand today before many critical challenges that shrouds the work of the Council and the future development of our region.

In practically every conference that brings our countries together these days, our attention is irrevocably called to the persistent theme of crisis and challenge in our region today.

There is no one word to describe this state of crisis and challenge, but we know it to be perhaps the most urgent that we have had to face in common.

It calls our attention first to the fact that here in our region, which is the most populous in the world, food supplies have reached a critical point, where the average increases in food production is daily outstripped by the rise in population.

Here in the Indo-Pacific region, we see written in gigantic dimensions the food crisis that haunts the human family today. Today, there are more than 2 billion people living in the region. At the end of the decade, it will be close to 3 billion.

The impact of this explosion in numbers upon resources is so profound that the Director General of the FAO was to observe at the 13th FAO Regional Conference held here in Manila in August 1976, “so precarious is the food supply from season to season, that millions of people are struggling just to ensure survival.”

This underlines the other aspect of the current crisis which is the abject poverty and undernourishment of so great a part of the population of the region. Of the more than 2 billion people in our region, about 80 percent live in the rural areas. Of these, 400 million are estimated to earn less than $50 per year, a condition of “absolute poverty” that goes to the heart of the challenge.

In a recent joint study undertaken by the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization, it was shown that one out of four people in our region suffer from “serious malnutrition.” In simple terms, too many are simply not receiving the necessary food requirements they need. Too many are hungry and underfed.

The paradox of the crisis that confronts us is that at a time when the human capacity to produce food has been vastly improved by advances in science and technology, and in an area where there are great human and natural resources to tap and utilize, we have not done enough to arrest the persistent drift of our region into crisis.

Much of our vast manpower resources — up to 20 percent — is unutilized; at least 50 percent is estimated to be underutilized.

Accentuating this is the relative infancy of our capacities to tap the seas and the oceans of the planet as a potential source for food. It is a great paradox that man today knows more about the moon and space than of earth’s oceans and seas.

It is easy to say that the key to the problem is “development” — the great production of food and its more equitable distribution among our billions. The crux of the challenge, however, is how we are going to achieve this objective, and on a scale and pace equal to the crisis — given the conditions under which we live and the resources at our command.

For there is no question that separately and together each of the member countries of the Council has been trying over the past so many years to answer the call of development. There is no question that each of our countries recognizes now the priority that this problem must receive in our concerns and in our efforts, and that each of us is striving earnestly to implement availing strategies and programs to turn the situation around.

Indeed, as has been well demonstrated in the performance of the developing economies in Asia, there has been substantial improvement over the past few years in the region in the specific area of food production.

What is evident now is that there is a critical need at this time for sustained support of these promising starts in food production within the region, and that from hereon our efforts should expand into the exploration of new areas of endeavor, into intensive research and planning, and into greater regional collaborative efforts that conceivably can extend and broaden the process of development.

We ought to recognize now that what has been begun in our respective countries as an effort to meet the challenge is a process on which a broader and greater effort can be built. For only by these means can we ensure that the gains we have made are not summarily eaten up, but rather lead us on towards greater gains.

I think that in some ways what we have learned in this regard here in the Philippines, and what we have acquired through intensive cooperation with other countries and with international assistance agencies, is very much instructive of the strategies available to us.

Let me then focus briefly on some of the highlights of my country's efforts in food production, and in the specific area of fisheries development.

As a developing country, we perceive the fundamental challenge to inhere in the need to boost agriculture and to enhance the incomes of our rural sector. Both objectives cannot be achieved in separation, they are joined. And so we set as critical priorities of our national development program the sustained stimulation of agriculture at the rural base, by such measures as will both enhance rural incomes and increase production.

We turned our attention first to the problem of insufficient rice supplies, which had chronically plagued us for years.

With our strong determination to achieve self-sufficiency in rice, we were able to harness our government machinery, including our financing institutions, and our farmers in a joint effort to increase our rice production so that now, for the first time, we are self-sufficient in rice and are even able to export some surplus quantity to our needy neighbor countries.

Rice production was only one part of a much broader program, however. After our success in achieving rice self-sufficiency, we have turned our attention to achieving self-sufficiency also in fish; for although we exported 28,000 metric tons of fish and fishery products in 1976, we still had to import over 64,000 metric tons in the same year to fill our national requirements.

Our basic aim is to utilize now an increasing part of our resources to farm the seas and our inland bodies of water, for we believe that with a relatively productive area of 1,655,300 square kilometers of marine resources alone, we should be able to bring about self-sufficiency in fish.

Our people have since described this program as "the Blue Revolution," and there is some point to it. As perhaps most of you know, the Green Revolution in rice saw headway in our country and we hope that we might also success fully push through this other revolutionary effort.

In line with this effort the extension workers of the Bureau of Fisheries and Aquatic Resources covered 7,000 of our so-called "survival" fishermen in 1977 alone; moreover, a total of 4,000 survival fishermen were trained in 1977 under the Municipal Fisheries Programme.

In the Fishermen's Training Centre in Cavite, the establishment of which was assisted by FAO, 102 skippers, master fishermen and boat engineers were graduated in the fifth session conducted in 1977.

To meet technology needs, our government is continuing fishery resource assessment of the waters of many of our seas and bays in collaboration with the UNDP/FAO South China Sea Fisheries Programme which is a sub-regional project of IPFC.

In order to help our thousands of survival fishermen find alternative sources of employment and job opportunities, 30 sea farming projects which serve as demonstration centers were established and are operated by the Bureau of Fisheries and Aquatic Resources in strategic coastal areas of the country. Oysters, mussels, seaweeds, crabs, shrimps and lobsters are produced in these farms. And behind this effort is the recognition of the vital role of fisheries in our economy. Consequently we have transformed the Bureau of Fisheries and Aquatic Resources into a prime mover of fisheries development in our country. The budget of the Bureau of Fisheries and Aquatic Resources has, in fact, "quadrupled" during the last five years.

The result of this intensive push of fisheries development has been not only to increase substantially national fish production during the past four years, but to lay the basis for a long-term and broadly-based fisheries development program in our country.

This is a change that parallels in many ways the policy changes and program developments that have also been taking place in your respective countries. And it is no doubt this kind of adjustment in our sights that mainly accounts for the significant improvement of fisheries production in our region in recent years.

It is surely not insignificant that today fish production in the region has quadrupled from 7 million tons in 1950 to 28.4 million tons as of 1972, whereas total world fish production has only trebled during the same period. Were the production statistics in recent years available, it will not doubt show an even greater increase in regional productivity.

Significantly too, as was noted in Bangkok in 1975, the improvement of fisheries development in the region during these years has benefited much from the cooperative linkages that have been developed by the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council. The programs it has developed, the exchanges it has promoted, the pioneering work it has engaged in — all these have been important inputs into the total effort to farm our oceans and our seas.

It is my view, however, that these steps are only the beginning of a much larger effort we must wage on a vastly broader front. Our responses to the challenge of extracting the bounties of the seas and developing fishery resources are limited compared to what we must still undertake, individually and together.

We have to build on what we know and what we have now, and this must surely mean the expansion of our capacities.

What the Council has eminently promoted over the years — the Cooperative Programme on Research on Aquaculture; the Cooperative Programme on Fish Product Development, Processing and Marketing; the Cooperative Information Exchange Programme; and the South China Sea Fisheries Development and Coordinating Programme — should rally us now into intensive efforts at accelerating programs and developing support schemes.

We should also concern ourselves more with technical cooperation designed to develop appropriate technology to our circumstances as developing nations. For the dangers of an approach based simply on Western technology are only too well known, and it will certainly not suffice to get us what we want.

And I think too that as we push toward more intensive exploration and development of fishery resources, we should bear in mind the need to protect the environment. The experiences of fishing villages laid to waste by pollution are many. The exhaustion of marine resources because of inadequate conservation measures are only too familiar.

Finally, let us take note that we have yet to really make a concerted effort towards bringing down the challenge of fisheries development to the level of people in our rural areas, on a scale equal to what we have done in the farming of the land.

In all this, I see the growing importance of the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council as a forum to link our efforts together, to make each of our countries and the region beneficiaries of the aid of established international agencies, and beneficiaries of our individual successes and experiences.

We in the Philippines have expressed our support to this Council in various ways over the years, and we are glad to acknowledge that we have benefited much from its work.

It is an index of our commitment to the goals of the Council that our country should serve today as the home for the UNDP/FAO South China Sea Fisheries Development and Coordinating Programme, the Aquaculture Department of the Southeast Asian Fisheries Development Center, the International Center for Living Aquatic Resources Management, and the soon to be established Asian Institute of Aquaculture.

On this occasion of the 18th session of the Council, I take the opportunity to reaffirm my country's abiding commitment to the work of the Council.

And it is in this spirit, taking due note of the words of the Council Chair man, that our government would like now to inform this body of its willingness to serve as host country of the Council Secretariat.

May you have a fruitful and pleasant meeting in Manila.

Speech of President Marcos at the convention of the National Federation of Sugar Cane Planters, March 15, 1978

Speech
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the convention of the National Federation of Sugar Cane Planters

[Delivered on March 15, 1978]

The Crisis in the Sugar Industry

FIRST OF ALL, allow me to congratulate our outstanding sugar cane variety breeder, Mr. Felipe Aahla.

You may be surprised why there is only one recipient of a plaque here and that's him. Because he symbolizes the individual's efforts at trying to work out the problems of the sugar industry of which there are many. He is a graduate of the University of the Philippines, College of Agriculture of 1934. And he has been patiently working for more than 10 years to produce this variety. Perhaps, all of you know about this variety which they are apparently trying to get me to approve to be called "Marcos Variety," with the idea, I guess, that this will increase my support for the sugar industry.

Well, I want you to know that it will not increase my support for the sugar industry because the support for the sugar industry coming from the President and the administration is already a hundred percent.

However, I am happy to be able to officially announce this variety as having been tested on a large scale. And the results have been very gratifying. Mr. Aahla should be congratulated for this effort because the old variety, as compared to this new variety is indeed quite inadequate to meet our requirements.

Let me present to you some of the specifications about these varieties. You remember that if we were to compare it to the Philippine varieties of 562 to 566 which I presume, we are all planting, besides other varieties. Of course, the maturity period is 12 months; the produce in tons of cane per hectare is 149 tons for the new variety, 6607 as compared to 80 to 99 tons of variety 56226 and 100 tons of variety 58260. As the average piculs of sugar per ton of cane — the new variety 6607 gives 249 piculs as compared to 136 up to 168 piculs of the Philippine variety, 56226.

You can see for yourself the impact of this new variety on the sugar industry. That is, if you can increase the piculs of sugar per hectare from 136 to 249, then this man may be contributing more than anybody else among us to the solution of the crisis of the sugar industry.

We have listened to Ambassador Benedicto and also to Congressman Gustilo. Of course, Congressman Gustilo, as usual, calls attention to the crop loans. That's his favorite subject. He comes to see me almost every day and since then I had to move out of this Palace because the roof is about to fall on my head, which they are now trying to repair and rehabilitate. He has been here not less than a dozen times, I think, trying to follow upon this matter of a loan. And I am very happy to come to Negros or any other place to tell our planters to replant sugar, to participate in this effort. But we are in the middle of a state visit. The Vice-premier of the People's Republic of China is here, and as you know, we have this awkward problems pertaining to both a leftist rebellion, the NPA., and the Spratley island problem which we hope we can manage so that it will not explode into an international incident.

You know that we also invited Vice-Premier Nguyen Nuy Kien of Vietnam sometime ago precisely, again, because of the Freedom Island or Kalayaan or the Spratley depending on how you look at it. Vietnam has occupied some of the islands after we had occupied seven of them. And there's the foreign press trying to involve us in a very embarrassing situation with China with the news that we occupied on March 4th a new island, which is completely false. It involves the island of Patag, which is small island, without water where every now and then we have to rotate the people who are staying there to resupply them. And naturally, on March 4th, there was a change of the guard as it were and there was a resupply. And the Western press considered this a new occupancy which is not true, because we have been occupying this island since 1971. And even earlier than that, as far back as when Admiral Cloma entered the international scene.

But whatever it is, this is a matter which could blow up in our faces. And so we talked to Vice-premier Nguyen Nuy Kien of Vietnam and we agreed in writing that any conflict or disagreement or any misunderstanding would be settled diplomatically in a spirit of a spirit of friendship and cooperation. And now we have been able to reiterate this agreement that I had with Vice-premier Teng Hsiao-ping in 1975 that any conflicts that we may have in an of the islands in South China Sea will also be settled through normal diplomatic channels, which means by negotiation and in on atmosphere of friendship and cooperation.

I am indeed very glad that you agreed to come to Manila because thereby, I save on travel time. I would like to say that the industry is in need of support from everyone. The ambassador, the chairman of the commission did not explain to you exactly to what extent the crisis of the industry has severely affected our government.

You know that in this political campaign in Manila, there have been speeches criticizing me for bringing down the liquidity of the Philippine National Bank because of the support of the sugar industry. (Notwithstanding the fact that the prices went down to seven cents, I insist on maintaining the purchasing price at P90 per picul even at a loss to the government.) My answer to them is: The sugar industry has been supporting the economy of the country in good times as in bad times; it's about time the government and the people of the Philippines supported the sugar industry.

I have had to answer the criticisms: that even today, the Philippine National Bank is still indebted to the tune of more than one billion pesos because of the sugar operations. And we must admit that the market price rise from 56 cents in 1974 to 70 cents is something about nobody asked for or which nobody expect ed. We need something — the will power to bear up with the cynicism. Let all the critics of the sugar industry and the critics of the administration moan and wail and quash their teech and pull at their hair. But the thing is, the sugar industry cannot be abandoned, and for any one, for any right-thinking Filipino to say that the government should pull out of the sugar industry is, to say the least the most irresponsible statement ever made by any politician in the country.

Because that has been the theme of the opposition, that Marcos is supporting the sugar industry at the risk of the entire economy of the country. My answer is: No, it is a calculated risk. It is not at the risk of the entire economy of the country, that is, could be more serious, and the results could be more severe if the sugar industry were to collapse and if we were to abandon more than 60,000 laborers working on 300,000 hectares, plus some 240,000 more laborers engaged in marginal occupations. It would certainly be disastrous to the entire economy of the Philippines if the sugar industry is not helped during this period of crisis.

Yes, I have had to admit that we are losing one cent per pound on every pound of sugar that we are exporting. Because that is the fact, that is the truth. We are selling our sugar at eight cents, and we buy it from you at nine cents. But the truth of the matter is, if we lower the cost of procurement from you today, there would be worse suffering on the part of the sugar planters.

I have therefore, come here today to assure you once again that no matter what the temptation, no matter what the criticisms, no matter what the attacks against my administration, it is my intention to maintain the support of the sugar industry and to continue buying at 90 pesos per picul from you for the purposes of the export and domestic sugar.

But that is not all; it is my intention to see to it that the prices should improve, and I have reason to believe that the prices should improve. The trouble of course is that when the United States imposed this tariff duty on sugar last December, everybody tried to send their sugar into the American market before the tariff was collected. And what happened was an oversupply of sugar in the American market, which is a premium market. Before the IGA limits, our quota was 1,400,000 minus 15 percent which brings it down to 1,190,000 tons. And our consumption quota in the domestic market was increased from the original 180,000 tons in 1972-1973, to 1,200,000 or 1,100,000.

Whatever it is, it is now quite obvious my friends that all of us should get together and help out in the industry. The problem with some of our people is that when you meet a little obstacle, everybody starts crying out. That should not be the attitude of the new Filipino. That is not the attitude of the new economist, the new planner, the new worker for the New Society. I can only say to those who are spreading the gospel of pessimism that the sugar industry is going to recover, and we will be able to re-stabilize the sugar industry, I hope within the year. But the government and the people of the Philippines must continue to support the industry.

Now, it is easy for anyone to say, "We will support the industry." But how do we intend to support this industry? The technicians know all about your problem. And I am surprised at this statement that not all the sugar crop loans have been issued.

Whatever it is, whoever is responsible, I would like to see to it that now and in the next crop loan, we do not delay any further. I understand that the crop loans supposed to be released sometime in September, but that you released some of the crop loans in December or was it March? Well, I can tell you this, though, the Philippine National Bank had a little problem of liquidity because of the losses in sugar. And perhaps that had something to do with it.

But, whatever it is, it is my hope that the sugar bank become operational — I have ordered precisely that we follow the example of the coconut people. The coconut people have now established a strong bank. A bank with assets and with very much more cash than most other bank. I understand it is now the second biggest bank in the country. I do not see why, if this can be done in the coconut industry we should not be able to do it in the sugar industry.

So now, I hereby order that this bank be immediately rehabilitated, and whatever amounts are necessary to make this bank operational within the year should be advanced by the Budget Commissioner and the government of the Republic of the Philippines.

You are going to raise the money for this bank. But this will probably need some time. You are now borrowing about 600 million every year. And I have just issued an order that all the necessary schemes be utilized to be able to obtain the funding, if not from the Philippine government then from abroad.

I did not want to announce this today but it seems as if you are all so engrossed in financing. Last Monday I authorized the PHILSUCOM and the other banks to obtain the funds that will be necessary for the lending operations. I now direct that these funds be immediately obtained by the new bank, the sugar bank or if it is not yet operational, the Philippine National Bank through the PHILSUCOM, and the PHILSUCOM should see to it that all the crop loans are given out in good time.

We are still lucky that the credit of the government is pretty good. Our republic has been extended a $200 million accommodation for purposes of trading only. I hope that this will be sufficient to meet the requirements. But beyond this, it will be necessary for the Philippine National Bank as well as the Central Bank to come in. I am certain that this arrangement will work out and that your problems will be solved this year, at least with respect to funding. Now, that's one problem.

But the important thing still is pricing. The price of sugar dictates the strategy of all men who are engaged in sugar production and sugar trade. The price of sugar has tended to move downward even after the signing and implementation of the international sugar agreement. The question that have been raised are: Why have sugar prices declined? And the answer to this is, there is just too much sugar in the markets of the world. And in all probability this will be true up to the middle of this year. But by July the forecast is that the price of sugar will go up. I have it from our experts that this is the opinion not only of our experts in the Philippines but from all over the world. Right now, we see the efforts on the part of the big countries to purchase sugar at a low price. They are hurrying up. They are trying to bring us down to eight cents and to sell at eight cents, so that when the prices go up next July they will be able to save quite a lot of money. All I can say is, we need immediate solutions to this problem — short-term and long-term solutions.

From my point of view, the immediate solution to this problem is to attend to the requirements of our sugar planters. We have explained to you all the plans. There is an immediate need to increase the efficiency of sugar production — from the sugar planters to the sugar mills. Many of the sugar planters will have to now start working on the new sugar varieties and increase their production, improve their efficiency. Most of our sugar mills I understand, are below par in their efficiency. The survey indicates that the sugar mills are contributing to the increase in the cost of production. The new mills, of course, will bring down the average cost. But they are not sufficient to overcome the inefficiency of many of the old mills. This is one of the medium-term problems which we have to settle immediately.

With respect to the immediate problems of the industry, the increase in production will come not only from the new variety but from the improvement of present technology. I do not need to go into all of this. We have the technology and the technicians of the Philippine Sugar Commission. And at the same time you are more aware of all these problems than anybody else. You know more or less that we have not tried intercropping seriously. Some of you have, but in general nobody has taken the problem of intercropping seriously.

It is now about time the sugar planters and sugar producers thought seriously of adding a second crop to sugar. Then, in addition to this, it will necessary to utilize what are now being used as waste products. In short, to increase your income from sugar and to add other sources of income. I gather there are studies going on for the utilization of waste products of the industry from which additional income can come.

I urge the sugar planters now to think not only in terms of support coming from the government which the government is already giving, but also in terms of improving the efficiency of the industry — the planters and the sugar mills. We are at present finalizing the implementation of the plans that have to do with this aspect of the problem.

As you know, the problem goes all the way to 1974. At midnight of July 3, 1974, the trade agreement between the Philippines and the United States terminated. Subsequently, the sugar legislation also terminated. This terminated America as a premium market for sugar. All our problems now go back to the problem of America encouraging us to plant sugar and then leaving us out and alone, apparently dictated by either domestic policy or confusion. But whether it is, we are challenged to diversify our markets, and we tried to do so. And in the first few years we succeeded.

But the termination of the Laurel-Langley Agreement also raises the question of the production aspects. And again, we come to the more controversial question: What is the cost of production of one pound of sugar. I have been asking this since I became President in 1965. Up to now I have not received a clear and exact answer. The reason for this is, your cost of production can never be averaged. Many of you can produce at a very competitive price or cost; the other claim that they cannot. Now, these claims always raise the question of attitude and that of government policy.

It is not the policy of government to find fault with the producer. We will take your word for it, provided it is not overdone. But sometimes it is a little bit overdone. Now, I would suggest that the sugar planters and the sugar millers work out by areas and by regions the average cost of production of sugar because we can no longer continue on the basis of elastic figures and statistics. You know that the economists and the financiers will not work with uncertain figures. They always ask us: What is your average cost of production? And, of course, Ambassador Benedicto and Congressman Gustilo always have a disagreement. They cannot agree on the figure. And how then can I come to a figure if the planters and the sugar millers, and the sugar commission cannot agree? I now ask that you agree on a figure, perhaps not immediately because we should not compound your sufferings by making you go through this exercise, this fearful and difficult exercise of determining which is your average cost of production. You will probably say, why do we talk about the average cost of production? Because the government must know how much losses it will entail in the next two years. I have told our economic managers that we will entail losses in the sugar industry in pesos, but we must continue to earn the dollar. Now, this is the balancing of the whole thing. We will lose in pesos, but we will earn in dollars. The question has been posed to me pointedly: Is it worth it to lose P150 million pesos every year in order to earn those dollars? And I have always maintained that yes, we should probably do so because we anticipate that in the coming year we are not going to lose P150 million. But if we continue to lose P150 million every year, if the government continues to put up this subsidy, we must face it with candor and deliberation and say: This is the price that we will pay temporarily, but later on, we will recover.

I wanted you to know my difficulties, because I know that you are also in difficulty. I am going to try to hold my ground. While we are fighting a common enemy, I will hold my share of the line. I want you to hold yours. And we will work out a solution to all these problems. I am not the overly optimistic type as you know. I always prepare for a rainy day. I prepare for any contingency. Whenever there is a situation, like a good guerrillero I immediately look for a way out. That was what was taught us from the beginning. You will remember, when we were fighting the enemy, we knew they were superior and so the tactics were — hit them as hard as you can and prepare your route for withdrawal. Well, that's what we are going to do. We are going to prepare our outs and options. And as far as I can see, we will pull out of this crisis with everything intact. We will pull out with honor and we will win a few medals in the process.

That sounds like an exhortation that I usually make to my men just before a desperate battle. Now, don't get me wrong, this is not too desperate a battle. This is not a do-or-die business. No. It is just that we need some results. We need a little will-power. We need a little manhood. We need a little patriotism. We just need a little dedication. And we, of course, depend upon each and everyone of you to continue your faith and trust in the leadership of the government. Because I am afraid that if you change leadership, this industry will collapse in no time. That I can tell you. And I am almost sure about it, considering what their speeches sound like. But no matter what it is, now we have come to the point where each and every one of us must continue to share in the solution of the crisis. I know that you have shared the difficulties, the sacrifices, the embarrassments, the awkwardness. I know that you are asking and your families are asking how long this is going to last. And my answer is: I believe this is a crucial year—1978. This will be the turning point in the sugar industry.

I came here to tell you that this is my belief. And I think we are supported by data and statistics and so my advice to you is, hold on. We will hold on for this year. Things will turn around and the prices may improve and the crisis will be over and before we know it we will wake up from this bad nightmare and say, "what was that all about?" It is always so after every crisis, just like when they were kidnapping everybody around here. They tried to kidnap Secretary Carlos P. Romulo in 1972, and all the Cabinet members were asking for security. I don't think they will kidnap you, I told Secretary Romulo, because they know I won't pay a single centavo for you.

Now, that the whole thing is past and he is campaigning around here in Manila without security and delivering speeches, making fun of the fact that he cannot speak in classical Pilipino or Tagalog because he is a typical example of the product of the colonial period.

But we are a new country now. We are in a new society. We are moving into normalization. I gather some of the candidates were here. And the mayors are here and the governor of Negros is here. I don't see the governor of Iloilo. Whatever it is, Region VI has been committed. I note the pride with which they announced the fact that Region VI is committed to KBL. I am gratified. I am very happy about it.

I want you to know that you are committed to the right cause. I want you to know that this dream that we have of the new Philippines is not just my dream. It is your dream. It is the dream of every Filipino. It is the hope and the plan and scheme that every right-thinking man from the beginning of our history has been dreaming of. Everybody, every generation or every set of generations often have their own peculiar history for that period.

In writing the history of the Philippines in the book Tadhana, I broke up our history into hundred-year periods. Actually, when I started working on this book I realized that the history of our country can be divided into 50-year periods. Five generations — one generation is usually one decade, and each generation, I noted while working on this history, had its own dreams about the Philippines. And these dreams evolved. All these fascinating ideas about freedom, about democracy peaked when we had our revolution of 1896, and yet we established a dictatorship. You know that we were motivated by freedom and yet our republic was a dictatorship. Why? Because it was necessary that we tie up all the various tribes together, the various factions. It was not only a dictatorship that Aguinaldo put up; he had to eliminate rivalry. You will remember that on Mount Buntis, the two Bonifacio brothers were liquidated by Order of a court martial. It was a forcible unification of leadership.

On the other hand, under the New Society we are trying to unify our people by voluntary mandate of our people through referendums, plebiscites and now the elections. Because it will be necessary, in order to meet the problems of our country, to be united. The idea of factionalism may be correct in big countries. The idea of various groups clashing and finally ending up with consensus speaks a maturity which discards the quarrels arising out of temporary political and partisan strife. What I am saying is: We Filipinos do not seem to have acquired the habit of banding together after an election. Even after an election, the schism, the division is there. You look at all the mayors who are here. Whenever I campaign, if the mayor is not with me, can always expect to find somebody who is against him. In every town, this is my experience and also the experience of every politician I have talked to. When I ran for senator in 1959, I would go to a town and if the mayor is not there with me, I ask about the opponent in the last election. And more or less you'll find the town divided into almost evenly two factions. Why? Because this is the weakness of the Filipino character, that after an election there is no forgiveness for the excesses and abuses, exaggerations committed in a political campaign. And it is again factional warfare that brought us down before the colonizers, whether Spanish, Japanese or American. For the Spanish, any faction could always be taken in to either spy or fight for the Spaniards. Who fought the Dutch when they attacked the Spanish navy off the Visayas? Filipinos. They were in the pay of the Spanish. But those same Filipinos also fought the rebellions that were fought by their own brother Filipinos, because we were divided. There is always some kind of factionalism throughout our entire history.

The Americans came, what happened? The same thing. Who captured Aguinaldo in Palanan, was it the Americans? No, Filipinos captured Aguinaldo.

And this is why you saw the same thing happen during the Japanese occupation. Who killed who? There are instances where there were more killings by Filipinos against Filipinos than Filipinos against the Japanese. You and I are aware of this. And now that same fatal weakness, sickness of our people, that same fault in our character is beginning to show. There is always a tendency to envy the leadership. There is the tendency to bring him down to the common man's level. If he is brilliant, they degrade him; if a leader, they turn him into a common part of the common mob. Factionalism, is if it is not me, then it should be nobody else. This is our principal weakness as a people. And unless we discard this fault our people will remain the workers, the hewers of wood, and the bringers of water for the united, for the strong. And it will always be like this no matter what we do, no matter what kind of a government we put up, whether it is a democratic government or any other form — unless we remember that we belong to one race.

Look at the secessionist movement — can you imagine anyone who is brown like me, who speaks almost the same tongue as I do, who can stand before his own tribe and people and claim he is of a separate race and, therefore, must put up a separate state? This, to me, again, demonstrates the weakness of our people. That he can kill a brother Filipino to assert this claim— this, to me, is the tragedy of the Filipino as an individual, and the tragedy of the Filipino as a race.

It shall be our purpose — yours and mine, whether you are a sugar planter or not — it shall be the duty of every Filipino to assume this obligation to cast away this devil of factionalism that has haunted us for many centuries and many years. And this is why we now seek to achieve this unification, not by force that was known to the revolutionaries of 1896 and the guerrilla fighters under the Japanese. You remember how it was with the guerrilla fighters — I know, because I was a part of that force — even when there was doubt about the guilt of collaboration on the part of a Filipino, often he was liquidated. And this thing should never have happened. But they happened and they haunt us. They will continue to haunt us to our dying day.

But the next generation of Filipinos, I hope, will be more broadminded, more tolerant, more patriotic, more intelligent, more competent, more forceful, more courageous. Our generation will lay the groundwork. Our generation, you and I, who knew the war, who knew its deprivation, its difficulties, who know these economic crises, who know the troubles, the hatreds, and the obstacles that confronted us — we are going to face all of them. And by our example, it is my hope, we will unite our people; irrespective of all these harassments, this small harassments that arise out of individual conflict, we will be able to weld our country into a single nation. That is what we are working for. That is what the Bagong Lipunan is all about. That is the meaning of the Kilusang Bagong Lipunan.

When you say KBL, you mean many things. It is not just the fact that the KBL, the Bagong Lipunan will support us. It will support our country. It will support the dream of our nation. And it has started to build the nation which is dignified, which is truly independent, which now has a plan for a destiny. That is our purpose. More than anything else, we have rationalized, we have dignified and ennobled the Filipino people.

Why do they listen to us now in the international council? When you, for instance, send a representative to the international sugar council, why do they listen to the Filipino representative? Because he represents a people that now have a front of unity. Because he represents the Filipino people that have suddenly liberated themselves and realized their capabilities, and who now seek to fully develop their God-given faculties. This is the meaning of the KBL. This is the meaning of the Bagong Lipunan.

Why do you see all these roads being built and why do we have so much funds available for infrastructure? Why do we talk about, say, geothermal? Because there is a plan, and that plan leads to our destiny. That plan must be implemented by each and every one.

And, therefore, to each and every one of you, I say, yes, let us support the Bagong Lipunan. Let us work for a new society. Let us work for our country more than anything else. Discard all these temporary harassments. We shall face crisis after crisis. If necessary, we will fight to the death, for our bodies are at the disposal of our motherland; but more than that, our honor. Our honor, more to be valued and treasured than even our lives and our possessions. This has been the pledge of those who treated this trail ahead of us. And this pledge, we also make before our people.

And so, to each and every one of you, I say thank you once again. And may you continue to help in working out the problems of the New Society. Rest assured that so long as I am President, so long as I lead this government, we will continue to help and support you in your legitimate desires, especially for the sugar industry.

Address of President Marcos at the Second Annual Conference of the Philippine Export Council, March 29, 1978

Address
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
At the Second Annual Conference of the Philippine Export Council

[Delivered on March 29, 1978]

The National Economic Situation

IT IS TIMELY and fitting that this second annual conference of the Philippine Export Council should be convened on the eve of national elections, rather than after, for this gives us an opportunity to allow the deliberations of this assembly to shed light and understanding on various issues in our national life today.

We have here in this conference a very broad representation of the private sector in our country, whose collective efforts have been eminently successful in generating national consensus in dealing with problems affecting the national economy. Here has been exemplified the effective partnership of government and the private sector in the resolution of major national issues, along the principle of participation and cooperation in the making of policies and the implementation of programs.

In the light of this experience, I am therefore confident that the judicious and prudent assessment of the Council concerning national affairs will contribute much to the burning questions that engage the nation now in this election campaign.

With your kind permission, I would like to direct my remarks today to the national economic situation, with a view to inviting your attention anew to problems that engage us in common, and with a view to clarifying some matters that have been needlessly embroiled in political controversy in the course of the campaign.

In much that has been said during the past four weeks concerning economic issues, one cannot but regret how willfully the issues have been distorted and misrepresented by certain groups under the guise of free debate and free speech.

In this first electoral test that the nation undergoes after five years of crisis government, we have already seen many of the old practices and tactics that in the past had mocked and disgraced electoral processes in our country. We have reason to regret the use of mudslinging and character assassination in this campaign, which has apparently singled out the First Family for special attack. But even more alarming than this to my mind are the efforts being employed now by the opposition to sow confusion and misunderstanding in the public mind, and to deny the public a coherent and objective view of the economic situation in the country.

These efforts would deny us what our collective efforts during the past five years have succeeded in injecting into the national economy; they would deny us our creditable economic performance during the period of pervasive crisis and challenge in our country and in the world, by singling out isolated features of economic life for comment and attack.

In this vein, they have tried to alarm our people about the level of our external debt and the price situation in the country by falsely suggesting that we have manifestly failed to control both, and that these are features that mar the record of economic performance during the last five years.

We have repeatedly stated that the fundamental issue in these elections is performance: the performance of crisis government during the last five years in terms of managing the various sectors of national life for the paramount goal of national development.

We have invited the most searching analysis of our policies and programs, of how well they have succeeded or where they may have failed in promoting the goals of our society, for we believe it vital that the national electorate in these elections must provide a mandate concerning national directions.

In the national economy, this is most essential and urgent, for we are engaged today in major endeavors, the outcome of which can only be fructifying if new determination and resolve is given to the directions and the plans we have set.

This is a matter that resides close to the heart of this assembly, but it is perhaps important that before we delve deeply into the special concerns of this body, we put to rest what the opposition has raised as issues regarding current developments in the national economy.

As a way to meet the issue of performance, the opposition would have our people believe that the level of external debt today has placed in hock future generations among our people. They would have our people believe that the economic achievements reached during the last five years are small compensation for the loans that we have incurred in achieving a measure of national development.

It is indeed unfortunate and ironic that one of the most effective policy decisions of our government, and one in which it has shown probity and judgment, should be subject to the most myopic interpretation.

We cannot isolate the matter of foreign borrowings from what they serve to engender in our economic life. For they form part of the development strategy that we have aggressively pursued.

The national economy has stood resilient amidst the battering of international recession, inflation, rising oil prices, and growing protectionist tendencies in the industrial world. Real growth of our Gross National Product has been sustained at an average annual rate of 6.2 percent over the past five years. The planned growth rate envisioned in the Development Plan for 1978-1982 has been set at 7.7 percent—a historical high but realistic. It is the only acceptable rate that will allow our economy to absorb the annual influx of more than 600,000 into our labor force.

The key factor to the growth in national income and in employment opportunities is investment. You are very well aware that as in business, corporate growth can only be sustained if fresh investments in capital and resources are poured into the enterprise. This likewise holds for our national economy. To attain a growth level of 7.7 percent, we will need funding in the amount of $43 billion in the next five years.

For a developing nation like us, we can only tax our people so much. Available savings that can be mobilized from our millions of households can reach only a certain volume. Even our export receipts, which will have to bear the burden of foreign exchange requirements for our developmental projects, are subject to constraints. To draw the funding, we will have to turn to foreign savings, to direct foreign investments or to borrowings from foreign financial institutions. This is the rationale, the economic logic, the humanistic justification for assuming external debt. The alternative to this is contraction or retrenchment in economic activities, which means stasis and stagnation, or in our case further underdevelopment. This alternative we rejected because it does not deal effectively with needs, and because it postpones and aborts what our country so urgently needs: development.

And so external debt for developing nations, which for us now stands at $6.5 billion, is welcome as long as the most prudent of debt management measures are maintained, as long as the foreign credit obtained is used to finance productive ventures, and as long as the resulting amortization and interest payments are within the country's capacity to service. Our increased external borrowings have been most significantly poured into productive use, creating job opportunities for 2.13 million in the five-year period from 1972 to 1977 and providing solutions to the most endemic of our problems. Of the fixed term credits going to the private sector, 87 percent has been channeled to manufacturing, public utility and mining with their respective shares averaging at 46 percent, 25 percent and 17 percent, respectively.

The further allegation that the majority of our foreign borrowings have gone only to the most elite in our business community is false and constitutes a gross oversight of the realities of international finance.

The fixed-term credits allocated to the private sector have been farmed out to 642 firms in manufacturing, public utility, mining, services, construction, agriculture, commerce and finance. And to further give a developmental bias to the allocation of foreign-sourced capital resources, 12 percent of fixed-term credits obtained by the public sector have been lent to an innumerable list of agricultural, industrial, and export-oriented industries.

Our debt servicing ability has likewise never been impaired. We have restructured our foreign loans to keep amortization and interest payments within the statutory limit of 20 percent of gross export receipts. In no period in the next five years will our debt service ratio exceed the statutory requirement. In fact it will even level to 17.7 percent at the end of the five-year plan period.

Our debt servicing position and our economic prospects have been subjected to the most rigid of analysis by multilateral financial institutions and creditor countries such as the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund and the consultative group of creditor countries to the Philippines. As a result of trust in the credit-worthiness of our economy, the official development assistance committed by the consultation group members to the Philippines in the last five years has been substantially larger than what was extended in the preceding 20 years.

And moreover these institutions have been one in forecasting accelerated growth of our country in the next few years and beyond.

The same misrepresentation of the situation is true of what the opposition has been saying about prices. They lift the issue out of the context of international crisis during the past five years. They ignore the oil crisis and the inflationary pressures that have troubled all countries, developed and developing alike.

And they neglect to point out that we have one of the most creditable records in controlling inflation and stabilizing prices of key necessities. They neglect to note that incomes have risen much faster during this period of crisis government.

The totality of our efforts in the economic sphere does not and has never merely concerned itself with coping with crisis. For beyond surmounting them, we have set before ourselves ambitious targets, many of which we have achieved.

Given our targets for economic growth and employment you can then understand the importance of exports in financing our development projects. Medium- and long-term availments will only service seven percent of our funding requirements in the next five years. Fifty-nine percent of financing shall have to come from export receipts. I hold the greatest faith that our foreign trade sector can assume this critical role, particularly now when trade prospects are improving.

Our remarkable performance in the past is a testimony to my firm trust in our business community. Over the past five years, exports have grown tremendously at an average annual growth rate of 14 percent, from a level of $1.1 billion in 1972 to $3.2 billion in 1977. In that span, the percentage contribution of export receipts to Gross National Product has increased to 18 percent. Over the next five years, in the span of the Philippine Development Plan from 1978 to 1982, exports will increase at an average annual growth rate of 20 percent, reaching a level of $7.9 billion and contributing 19 percent to GNP.

Preliminary figures released by the National Census and Statistics place last year's exports at $3.15 billion, a 22 percent increase over 1976 export receipts. Traditional products still accounted for the bulk of 1977 export receipts, posting a total of $2.15 billion in earnings. Centrifugal and refined sugar retained its premier position as the country's top dollar earner at $511.7 million, followed by coconut oil with $412.1 million.

The most dramatic performance was recorded by non-traditional exports which climbed up to $966.7 million in 1977 for an increase of about 30 percent over the previous year. The annual increase in non-traditional exports has been most dramatic when one considers that in 1972 this category amounted to only $135.5 million. The upward climb was steady, registering $282.20 million in 1973, $745.2 million in 1976, and finally $966.7 million in 1977. Top earners were garments, clothing, and electrical machinery and equipment parts.

Equally remarkable is our success in rice production. Rice was in critical supply in 1972 when a large segment of our people stood in long lines before rice stores. Only recently, we have concluded export contracts involving 29,000 metric tons with Indonesia and 10,000 metric tons with Malaysia, with an aggregate value of more than $ 11 million. With an estimated production of 161 million cavans for crop year 1977-78, we stand prepared to consider additional exports particularly to our ASEAN partners.

The significance of the country's export performance last year is to be seen not only in the value and percentage increases but also in the changes of its structural and market composition.

From a share of 9.4 percent in 1970, non-traditional exports accounted for 22.2 percent of total country exports in 1975 and well over 30 percent in 1977. Although Japan and the United States still absorbed over half of total country trade, significant inroads on new markets have been made. The European Economic Community, the Middle East, the ASEAN and socialist countries absorb increasingly higher shares of total Philippine exports. ASEAN market share for instance, was only 2.2 percent in 1975 but in 1977 went up to about five percent. Middle East countries accounted for 11 percent of total exports while the socialist countries had over four percent.

And I regard this record of performance of the export sector as one more testament of the vitality of the economy today and of the lightness of the directions we have taken.

If last year's export performance was remarkably good, credit goes to one homogenous group of individuals whose privileged company I have the pleasure to be with today.

Setting up export targets may be a prerogative of government but it is this hardy stock of individuals who make export targets come true. Upon them lies the burden of wheeling and dealing in the negotiation of export contracts and in activating production lines to meet shipping schedules and delivery commitments.

I take this opportunity to lay before you, the foreign trade program of the government in the five-year period of the new development plan. We have called it the National Export Strategy for 1978 to 1982. It is a strategy that has been drawn not in the isolated rooms of policy makers but in working tables where industry associations meet with our national export bodies. And it is a strategy that has been drawn not from conjured figures but from proven records of historical export performance. But they remain as mere mathematical figures unless government and the private sector work in a concerted and coordinated effort toward their eventual attainment.

The National Export Strategy, being the first one ever to be drawn up, is an indicative plan of the general directions Philippine exports should take within the next five years. It contains annual performance targets and basic action plans needed for attaining these targets. I now promulgate this Letter of Instructions adopting the five-year Indicative National Export Strategy.

The critical area of any plan is in its implementation. Integral to the national export strategy is therefore the monitoring system that will take into account the environment in which exporters operate, the activities and programs pursued to implement plans, the logistical support required to make implementation efficient.

I am deeply and personally interested in seeing the strategy made to work. To this end, I hereby direct the PEC Governing Council to submit to me directly its reports, specifying the issues discussed at each Governing Council meeting and the final recommendations proposed.

I expect the Philippine Export Council to increasingly assume its role as the primary agency on exports. Its mandate requires it to be the focal point for all export activities and it must therefore be the central clearing and coordinative body for all export development and promotion activities.

As added earnest of government's desire to involve the private sector in the planning and implementation process, I hereby announce the expansion of the Governing Council to include five additional members from the private sector, in addition to its Chairman-President, Mr. Domingo Lim. I hereby direct the PEC to submit the appropriate measure needed to implement this decision.

We must now be prepared to move into the international trade on a scale larger than we have always assumed. On this occasion, I sign a decree providing for the development of large-scale and integrated trading companies through a system of accreditation and provision of incentives to be administered by the Philippine Export Council.

This move to encourage bigness in international trading is borne out of the noticeable deficiencies of our trading practices. The large majority of our export industries, many of whom are now pushing our non-traditional manufactures, consist of small- and medium-scale firms which have adequate combined production capacities but lack the base to meet bulk demands and the marketing organizations to clinch large contracts.

What our external trade sector eventually needs are large trading companies or trading houses which will realize economies of scale in international trade by directing volume exports to their markets, sourcing imports at bulk, providing trade credits to small producers, maintaining extensive market research net works, and absorbing substantial capital risks. It is towards these ends that this decree is directed.

Another innovative improvement which government is now preparing to introduce to our trade system is that of export financing. Our export-oriented industries are now moving to clinch contracts of substantial amounts. As our current and potential markets consist of developing nations in the ASEAN and even in Africa, the need for financing by our buyers is becoming a necessity. Let not these opportunities pass. This is one of the reasons why we created the Philippine Export and Foreign Loan Guarantee Corporation, I therefore order the PEC, the Central Bank and the government financial institutions to submit for my consideration, a package of financial assistance designed to encourage further the export of Philippine products and services.

I also direct government financial institutions, particularly the Development Bank of the Philippines to afford high priority for export-oriented projects. In addition to some manufacturers, I understand exports of processed foods such as fruits have great potential. By all means, let us promote these ventures.

About two years ago, when the oil-rich nations of the Middle East started pouring their wealth into massive infrastructure programs, we saw good opportunities in engineering and construction of projects. We organized the Philippine-Overseas Construction Board to lead, organize and regulate the national effort. I am now ready to permit our government technical personnel to join private Philippine companies for specific assignments as consultants in foreign projects when the needs of the service so permit.

Many developments have happened which make the economic environment more conducive to the expansion of exports. In most instances, they came about because the export community articulated its needs and sat down with the public sector to map out solutions.

We have now simplified export procedures and documentation designed to cut down the process by at least 50 percent.

The rediscount window has been eased to make it more attractive to both the exporters and the commercial banks. As I intimated earlier, there should be a constant effort to monitor the financing support to Filipino exporters so that they can compete effectively with other countries.

The operational guidelines for ASEAN preferential trading arrangements have already been threshed out. This should open the avenues for more substantial trade with our ASEAN neighbors.

Country requests for concessions on tropical product exports are constantly being negotiated. We are also pursuing the expansion of product coverages under the various Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) schemes, pushing particularly the products with comparative advantage. We actively express our trade interests in many other venues, as in bilateral negotiations with our established trade partners and with new ones. Although we are now beleaguered, by textile quotas, we are constantly negotiating to get the best terms for our exports.

Finally, we deem it more and more important to lobby in international forums for greater liberalization of global trade.

As a developing nation earnestly trying to expand its exports, we express particular concern about the increasing protectionist tendencies among so many of our developed country markets. Several of the industries on which protectionist measures now converge are important export industries of the Philip pines, and of many other developing countries who, like us, are trying to generate more export earnings.

GATT has warned that industrial nations will worsen rather than ease their present economic problems by adopting protectionist measures. Trade liberalization, and not protective trade barriers, will promote economic recovery and reduce inflation and unemployment.

We therefore ask governments to restrain protectionism and adopt instead more orderly international open market policies which will result in free trade.

We have a tax incentives system for exports which is easily negated by the countervailing duties imposed on our products by the importing countries. The net result is: we lose the taxes and a foreign government imposes the taxes.

The wise approach should be to re-think our export incentives system so that countervailing duties can be avoided. Fiscal incentives may not work but a more realistic credit system may. The idea is to think of a problem-solution mix that a protectionist importing country cannot nullify.

The resolve and the scale with which we are now prepared to move in the export sector are possible because we have laid the basis for such a strategy in our national economy, and in the effective partnership of the private sector and government.

Here I find more indelible manifestation of the growth of national capabilities that has marked the five years of crisis government.

Here we can perceive what performance means when we say that this must be the fundamental issue of the coming elections.

For performance imply not only results but also prospects. They embody what we have attained, but they also suggest the capacity for greater challenges that our changing and growing society possesses by virtue of its experiences.

A certain continuity is certainly needed, now more than ever, between what we have undertaken in the past, and what must undertake now, for the process of development to continue.

The choice is for our people to determine whether the reforms we have initiated and the programs we have launched must be sustained and nurtured, or set aside in favor of other courses of action.

But this seems only good for speculation today, because in fact, in spite of the loud alarms and charges that have been made by the opposition in this campaign, they have not offered an alternative, they have not even hinted to us that they understand what is truly needed by the national economy at this time.

To the real and substantial achievements that crisis government has produced in five years, they can only repeat the same old cry: Bring down martial law.

All this time that we have labored and struggled to bring our society closer to progress, justice and equality, they have stood by, praying for our efforts to fail.

Now they ask the supreme honor within the gift of this nation: the privilege to serve in public office.

For what deed, I ask, for what sacrifice to people and country, must we reward this men with our mandate?

I say let us reject these false prophets in our midst. I say let us remain true to our covenant and our pledge, made at the start of crisis government, and repeated year after year ever since, that we shall continue to work and to build together the structures of our New Society.

My friends and fellow citizens, the time is opportune for us to seal this bond with one another once again. Let the elections reflect our unity of purpose and ideals.

Marcos, F. E. (1980). Presidential speeches (Vol. 8). [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Address of President Marcos before the Rotary Club, March 30, 1978

Speech
of
His Excellency Ferdinand E. Marcos
President of the Philippines
Before the Rotary Club

[Delivered at the Manila Hilton, March 30, 1978]

On the Status of Our Country

I GREET ALL the officers of this distinguished organization and greet the candidates of KBL who happen to be here as well as any candidate of the op position who may also be here.

I gather that they have been frequenting this organization lately, which is understandable. I would presume that this organization offers some kind of a respite from the confusion that now attends this political exercise.

You know, during the last five years, I believe I have appeared before the Manila Rotary almost every year. I am always fascinated by the guidelines and standards of your tax policy. I am certain that if any government followed the mischievous and almost, shall we say, unguided missile type of taxation proposed by Toting del Rosario there would be reason for the Opposition to take over the government.

Talking about the Opposition, there were some definitions here of states men and politicians which evoked lighthearted laughter and also might have reflected upon the present administration. You know, this reminds me of Churchill, in the latter years of his political career. He met a similar situation. You will recall he had been identified with the liberal groups, then later with the conservatives. Anyway, he said that he had to comment on what had been thrown about as a definition of statesman and politician. And he said: Well, a statesman is a man who is in power and wields power and guides the government for the people and very wisely. But a politician is a different breed; the politician is the man who is in power, is obsessed with power, wants to be in power, and will say anything to be in power. And he said: I have been both.

I, too, have been both. But I do remember we were a little elegant when we were engaged in opposition, as a minority floorleader of the House of Representatives and later on as the opposition candidate for President in 1965. You will remember. I left the presidency of the party that was in power to join the opposition party because of unimplemented promises which I thought were fundamental.

Well, today, we have the Kilusang Bagong Lipunan which is actually a movement, an umbrella organization, under which we had hoped we would be able to gather the majority party and the opposition party, and organized a joint responsibility group for government. Perhaps, I should tell you that this idea is, of course, not new. Way back in 1972 before I proclaimed martial law, I offered a coalition government to the opposition, the Liberal Party. I offered 40 percent of the membership of the Cabinet to the opposition party, and this was peremptorily disregarded. The reason given was that they were going to win the elections in 1973, anyway. I did not tell them that there would be no elections.

Now talking about consultations on martial law — I understand that some members of the opposition claim they were never consulted about martial law. I do remember that I called a caucus of the members of Congress, the Senate as well as the House of Representatives, to inquire whether they had any opposition on the matter of martial law. I went around the country. Everybody knew about this, I asked the members of the judiciary, some anyway, before martial law was proclaimed. And the answer that they gave me was: The legislative does not have the power to proclaim martial law. It can give you emergency power. But martial law can be proclaimed only by the President under the commander-in-chief provision of the Constitution. And the judiciary gave me the same answer. And this is why martial law was left for the President to act on. And naturally, whenever one now talks of martial law, one talks of the presidency. And this is the reason why I can come to an audience like this and speak of this from personal experience.

Of course, I am at a disadvantage here because I understand, the First Lady spoke in the national language. Nais ko sanang bumigkas din sa ating sariling wika, ngunit napakaraming dayuhan dito. Baka akala nila ay may itinatago ako sa aking ipinaliliwanag sa inyo. Kaya kung maaari ay isasalin ko sa ating wika ang mga iba at ganoon din, magsasalita ako sa hiram na dila — Ingles.

Alam po ninyo, sa ating sariling wika, kung minsan ay lalong maiging magbitaw ng salita. Sa Ingles — talagang hiram na dila iyan. Wala tayong magagawa.

Allow me to speak now of matters of interest to you. When we organized the KBL, we offered to the opposition party some positions in the 21-man slate for Metro Manila. This is the first time I will be revealing this. Because I have been watching from a distance to see how these elections would turn out. As you know, when the elections were finally decided and confirmed by the Batasang Bayan (which as you know was elected by the barangays to be the legislative council), I inquired whether any of the Liberals would want to join the 21-man state. I did so because we were sincere about allowing participation of the opposition. I believe the First Lady will someday, not now but probably later on, after the elections, reveal with whom she conferred. She was authorized to offer to the Liberal Party a participation in the 21-man slate.

The reason I am revealing this today is because of the claim that there is need for an opposition in the interim Batasang Pambansa. And it has been made to appear as if we were opposed to the participation of the opposition party whatever they may call themselves now, Liberals or LABAN or independent, whatever it is. But the thing is, we offered the opposition participation in the interim Batasang Pambansa. But instead of accepting this, they immediately organized their own group. Or rather, the Liberal Party decided now to participate and then organize a group similar to the KBL, which then proceeded to question the validity of the entire martial law or crisis government, and even the validity of the Constitution. While running as candidate under that Constitution, and running in accordance with the laws approved by that government, they deny the legal and legitimate basis of that government. They appeared before the Supreme Court when I was brought before the Supreme Court. I appeared before the Supreme Court and argued about the legality of martial law. They participated in the proceedings thereat. They have not participated in any other government proceedings except to bring me to the courts.

But just the same, even after the Supreme Court had made a decision and had ruled that there was no obstacle to the enforcement of the Constitution of the Philippines, now we hear their candidates saying they have taken the oath to support the Constitution but they don't believe in the validity of the Constitution. This indicates, therefore, that there is some kind of an ulterior motive behind the actuations of those candidates.

But, anyway, while we are at this, I have notified the officers of the Rotary that perhaps the best way, the more interesting format would be that which we adopted for the Kapisanan ng mga Brodkasters sa Pilipinas two nights ago. I will deliver a main speech and then I will ask that anybody who has any questions should then address these questions to me. I will be ready to answer all the questions that many be directed at me.

I start out by calling attention to the fact that at the beginning of the campaign, they refused to make performance as an issue. Nowadays, however, they have come around to questioning the performance of the crisis government, the New Society. In the process they have questioned everything without offering an alternative. So I go along with them and now ask this question. We have run the government. I have run the government for the past 12 years as your President. You elected me in 1965. You reelected me in 1969. I proclaimed martial law in 1972. The plebiscite wherein we asked whether we should continue with martial law and the referenda of January 1973, July 1973, February 1975, October 1976, and December 1977 — in all of these referenda and plebiscite, the people's vote was: continue with the present administration and government. For this, of course, I thank our people. Ako ay nagpapasalamat sa ating mga mamamayan sa kanilang ipinagkaloob at ipinagkatiwalang kapangyarihan sa inyong abang lingkod. Kinikilala ko ang aking utang na loob sa inyong lahat lalo na sa mga haligi ng ating business community, all of you, who are certainly the people most interested in the health of our economy.

And, therefore, let me start out with the statement that whatever we have done or will continue to do is in accordance with programs that were organized since 1967. In 1968-1969, I organized the National Economic Development Authority, you remember. We centralized all planning. And for the first time, we introduced rationality in planning. We adopted short-term and medium-term answers to all the problems.

So whatever plans we have now are not plans that were organized and prepared only a year ago or yesterday. They have been worked out since 1967. I became President in 1965. Why do I speak of 1967? Because it takes you two years to get used to the presidency. Any man who thinks that he can solve the problems of the country by being President for only one or two years is being over-optimistic. And I cast no reflection of course on Presidents who have been in office for only one year like the American President. No, I am merely saying that it took me two years to learn the ropes as President.

And so we started in 1967. Whatever plans we have now, we prepared in 1967. There were several factors that came into the planning though, and these were the economic crisis and the secessionist movement in the South. Two factors that we did not anticipate in 1967. In 1967 we knew about the new Communist Party being organized by the young group of Peking-oriented communists. But we could not anticipate the oil crisis of 1974; the worldwide grain deficiency in 1973; the floods of 1972 and the drought of 1972. But all of these were thrown in and worked out in the plans that ultimately came out with the National Economic Development Authority. In the Constitution of 1973, the National Economic Development Authority ultimately was institutionalized and became a constitutional body. This is the principal planning body.

Now when we speak of progress it is usually economic, social, and the political will is set aside. On political stabilization, I need not say anything. You, more than anybody else, are sensitive more to the questions of political stabilization than to anything else. I have here some notes on the status of our country and I would like to read them to you. They are taken from the book that I just wrote; it is entitled Five Years of the New Society.

For one thing, notwithstanding the low prices of our exports, foreign investments, as you are well aware, have continued to expand, creating work opportunities. Over the last five years, we opened up jobs to accommodate 600,000 workers every year. I would think that a total of about a little over two million jobs have been opened over five years and this is all worked out in the book.

The reason I wrote that book is because I know that in a political campaign every candidate says the most scandalous things and then disavows them later on. This is happening now. I gather that Comelec is looking around for the tapes of all the speeches of both KBL and Laban. KBL, today, I understand, will send in all the tapes of their speeches. But Laban denies saying anything scandalous, libelous, slanderous or seditious.

Whatever it is, I put down in writing and in book form all these points in order that in the deliberations in your private rooms or studies, you can review and check these figures. And this book has been serialized, I understand, in all the metropolitan papers.

Tax revenues alone reached an amount of P23 billion which is double or treble that of 1972. And the cost of government, meaning, what we refer to as current funds — you would probably call it operational expenses in your business, or your housekeeping expenses. These are for salaries, the things that you pay in one year. When you say capital expenditures, what we mean is expenditures for things that last more than one year — irrigation, roads, water system, flood control, hydroelectric power, etc., etc.

Anyway, the cost of government was brought down. Do you know that there was a time, after I took over, when the cost of government was 75 percent of the budget? This went to salaries. We reduced this, I imposed a compulsory savings of five percent. Then later on, another 5 percent, and we have kept it there. We have reduced it further, and all the savings we have put into capital expenditures — outlays for public works like roads, bridges, irrigation systems, power — have increased five times since 1973. This is the reason for the sudden flowering of roads and other infrastructures throughout the country.

We have shifted the emphasis from current expenditures to capital expenditures. Now, I have often wondered whether the Opposition had had time to study this particular aspect which is one of the changes in the budgetary system. I have waited to listen to any intelligent discussion of the new budgetary approaches, but nothing has been said about these.

Anyway, priorities now include power in view of the projections of the experts to the effect that there will be oil deficiency and scarcity, if not complete elimination of oil as a source of power about the end of the century. And all countries, big or small, developed or non-developed, are called upon now to exploit all sources of power. And so we have put power resources as No. 1 priority

Now there are questions in all these speeches about priorities being given to education and priorities being given to security, but nobody ever put a finger on power I have not heard any speech by the opposition questioning or seeking information on the power program of the government. It is because, I presume, they agree with this program.

Every country, whether the Philippines or the United States, Japan, England, or West Germany, any country whatsoever, must now look to other sources of power besides oil. This is exactly what we are doing. Of course, we are continuing with our aggressive oil search program. We have three oil strikes off Palawan. And we hope to be able to recover or take out oil within next year. I told the City Services officials that I won't believe that they have any oil until I can use the oil or gasoline in my car. They assure me that by the latter part of 1979, we will be drawing oil from the Palawan discoveries.

Of course, one of the most important, if not the crucial change, has been in the agrarian program. The agrarian program, whatever anyone may say, is something which we are proud of. I am very glad to see that the Opposition agrees with our agrarian program. You see, the Opposition agrees with everything that we are doing. They only want change us in power. This, apparently, is the big difference.

This program doesn't merely mean the transfer of land from one person to the other. The agrarian reform program is an entire package. It is a package involving infrastructure which means irrigation, flood control, farm-to-market roads. It involves agricultural extension. It involves credit. It also involves the establishment of cooperatives. It also involves human settlements. And when we speak of human settlements and cooperatives, we are referring to the effort to make the countryside so attractive that the people in the rural areas will not come to the urban areas like Manila. Manila has suddenly developed into a center for more than seven million people. And it now has a great number of slums. Undoubtedly, this is one of the problems of any city. But Manila has this problem to a disproportionate degree. This is why in Manila, you see us moving around in the slum areas. The First Lady, for instance, visited about 14 slum areas the other day with all the candidates. And the reason for this is, of course, that it is a part of the program.

The opposition has now come up with the statement that it is illegal and unfair for me to be releasing these lands just now at election time. But have they forgotten that I announced this more than six months ago? In fact, let us go back to 1971. In 1971 there was a fire in Barrio Magsaysay in the Tondo foreshore land. And I went to the 50,000 families who lost their houses and we were all in tears. We were crying on each other's shoulders, because how do you take care of these families who have just lost their homes? So right then and there, I went over all the plans and I promised some people there in Tondo, that given a little more time, we would reclaim part of the land and we would then distribute the land to them. The First Lady was with me. And one of the first priorities of the First Lady when she became Metro Manila governor in 1975 was what is now known as the ZIP program, the zonal improvement program. Do you know that there are 450 depressed areas in Manila? We have made 44 of these as priority areas. And I am certain that if you were in our place, you would immediately attend to these areas.

They also asked: But why do you release all of these funds? My answer is: They should have been released last January, but the Budget Commission was working out the programs so that these amounts could be released. For instance, in the Tondo foreshore land area, we set aside the total of P400 million. We could not raise P400 million. The only amount that we could raise was P200 million. And so I released P200 million. And it went to the Metropolitan Manila Commission which has a special task force for this purpose.

For Bagong Barrio and Caloocan, I released P40 million. Actually, the total amount that we were supposed to spend for all these depressed areas in Metropolitan Manila was several billion pesos. But right now, we cannot afford the entire several billion pesos. If you will remember, we borrowed from the World Bank a total of $65 million. It is called a "slum upgrading program." This slum upgrading program is the opposite of what the opposition party did when they were in power. You remember what they did when they were in power? They transferred some of our people to Sapang Palay and other places. And what happened? They deprived these people, the squatters as we refer to them, of their livelihood from the piers. They were brought to Sapang Palay. There was no water, no electricity, no source of livelihood, no employment. So before you knew it, they were back. Where? In Intramuros and in Tondo. I remember that I was at the time the president of the Senate. And there were almost violent demonstrations in Congress.

And so we have changed the approach. This is one thing about which we wanted the opinion of everybody. Would it not be the better approach to upgrade the slums without relocating the people? And that is exactly what we are doing in the Tondo foreshore land and in Magsaysay. Instead of throwing out the people from the land, we instead transform the entire community. We put in roads, sewage system, water system, electricity. And we put up a small chapel. We put up a high school, and then factory buildings for the labor-intensive types of manufacturing. And this is what is happening all over Manila now.

Again, I am a little disappointed to hear nothing but criticisms of why the President released this now just before the elections. Nothing whatsoever as to whether this is the right approach. Should we remove our people from the slums as what was done and bring them to Sapang Palay? Or should we continue with the slums upgrading program? It is the position of KBL, the Kilusang Bagong Lipunan, and of your servant, that it is best that we now continue with this program of upgrading the slums instead of transferring or removing the inhabitants thereat.

Now, what are the other signs of progress? I will not go into the foreign exchange reserves. You know that more than I do. I will not go into the increase in the budget of our government. We have increased it. And the increase in the number of people who are declaring their income tax, from 1.5 to 4.5 million over a period of three to four years. These are matters that you all know. Nor the increase in exports. We trebled our exports from about P1 billion to P3 billion in a matter of four years. And we created new types of exports, the non-traditional exports. From $ 150 million, we brought it all the way up to almost $ 1 billion. And, of course, the leading exports would be garments, electronics, textiles and the like.

With regard to other matters, you and I are aware of some of the reports indicating that there has been a shift from the low income group to the middle income group. This usually is the last economic or social indicator of how much we have increased the per capita income. Of course, we increased the per capita income from P1, 300 to P4,300 in a period of four years. And all of you know this since you are engaged in business and your market analysis would probably take into account the incomes of everybody.

I gather that the Private Development Corporation of the Philippines conducted this survey. About the low income groups, the total countrywide survey indicated that the total number of households in the low income group — meaning an income of P1, 000 to P3, 000 — was 71.5 percent of population in 1971. In 1975, this was reduced to 49.7 percent in the entire country. And the middle income, of course, originally 28.5 percent has now become 50.3 percent, a doubling of the number of the middle-income households. When you say middle income, you mean, they earn P4, 000 to P9, 999.

Now, in the countryside, in the control area, this was even better. From 80 percent for households belonging to the low income group, it has now been reduced to 30 percent. In short, in the rural areas, you have reduced the low income household from 80 to 30 percent or a reduction of 50 percent.

Now, you who are in business know what this means. You know more or less what obstacles there are, the difficulty of a pervasive change in the income of our people especially because of the atmosphere that pervaded our country in 1972.

But this survey is still going on. This was a 1975 survey. I am certain that now the survey will indicate a higher percentage of shift from the low-income to the upper-income brackets.

Savings and time deposits increased from 1973 to 1977, from P6.8 billion to P17.6 billion. I understand that in 1978, this went beyond P25 billion. With all of this, let me also talk about the GNP: from P55 billion to P153 billion from 1972-77. and capital investments, from P1.1 billion to P46 billion, 1972-77. Now, these are figures that are known to everybody and can be checked.

I refer to them merely because, now the opposition raises the question of performance. And they are the best indicators of the manner in which our society and our government has performed. However, they also raised some issues of policy. And this, I think, is something in which you should be interested. Do you know that the platform of LABAN includes a plan which provides that it shall support and initiate a program of socialization of the major industries of the country? I bet you didn't know that. That shocks you, doesn't it? Well, they haven't been talking about it, but it is Plan No. 6 of the LABAN platform.

Now, what does this mean? At least on this one particular point, there can be a competition for your loyalties and your beliefs between the Kilusang Bagong Lipunan and the LABAN. This merely means that it is the position of LABAN to adopt what is known as the classical socialist economic system.

Now, I raised this point before you especially. I have not talked about this at any other forum because I know that at any other forum this will be glossed over and not be understood but this is for the big businessmen of the Philippines. I think you will understand the implications of such a platform.

Let me go through this particular point in greater detail. There are all shades of socialism, but this is now the parent, shall we say, the standard, the classical type of socialism. It refers to the nationalization of major industries and public utilities. I would like to repeat those terms, "the nationalization of major industries and public utilities." I am not against spreading the ownership of public utilities and major industry. On the contrary, the KBL is in favor of the ownership of big corporations and public utilities being spread among the public so much so that we have directed the Meralco to go public.
